started aside on seeing Mr Trevor's intention. A mist seemed to cover my eyes, as I saw every one present rising from his chair. The room was, of course, in an uproar. The two who had quarrelled were the only calm persons present. Mr Trevor remained standing on the same spot with his arms folded on his breast; while Captain —— calmly wiped off the stains of wine from his shirt-ruffles and white waistcoat, walked up to Lord ——, who was at but a yard or two's distance, and enquired, in a low tone of voice, "Your Lordship has pistols here, of course? We had better settle this little matter now, and here. Captain V——, you will kindly do what is necessary for me?"

"My dear fellow, be calm! This is really a very absurd quarrel—likely to be a dreadful business, though!" replied his Lordship, with great agitation. "Come, shake hands, and be friends!—Come, don't let a trumpery dinner brawl lead to bloodshed—and in my house, too!—Make it up like men of sense!"

"That, your Lordship of course knows as well as I do, is impossible. Will you, Captain V——, be good enough to bring the pistols? You will find them in his Lordship's shooting gallery—we had better adjourn there, by the way, eh?" enquired the Captain, coolly—he had seen many of these affaires!

"Then, bring them—bring them, by all means!"—"In God's name, let this quarrel be settled on the spot!" exclaimed ——, and ——, and ——.

"We all know they must fight—that's as clear as the sun—so the sooner the better!" exclaimed the Honourable Mr ——, a hot-headed cousin of Lord ——'s.

"Eternal curses on the silly slut!" groaned his Lordship; "here will be bloodshed for her!—My dear Trevor!" said he, hurrying to that gentleman, who, with seven or eight people round him, was conversing on the affair, with perfect composure; "do, I implore—I beg—I supplicate, that you would leave my house! Oh! don't let it be said I ask people here to kill one another! Why may not this wretched business be made up?—By ——, it shall be," said he, vehemently; and, putting his arm into that of Mr Trevor, he endeavoured to draw him towards the spot where Captain —— was standing.

"Your Lordship is very good, but it's useless," replied Mr Trevor, struggling to disengage his arm from that of Lord ——, "Your Lordship knows the business must be settled, and the sooner the better. My friend Sir —— has undertaken to do what is correct on the occasion. Come," addressing the young baronet, "away! and join Captain V——." All this was uttered with real nonchalance! Somebody present told him, that the Captain was one of the best shots in England—could hit a sixpence at ten yards' distance. "Can he, by ——?" said he with a smile, without evincing the slightest symptoms of trepidation. "Why, then, I may as well make my will, for I'm as blind as a mole!—Ha! I have it." He walked out from among those who were standing round him, and strode up to Captain ——, who was conversing earnestly with one or two of his brother officers.

"Captain ——," said Mr Trevor, firmly, extending his right hand, with his glove half drawn on. The Captain turned suddenly towards him with a furious scowl. "I am told you are a dead shot—eh?"

"Well, sir, and what of that?" enquired the Captain, haughtily, and with some curiosity in his countenance.

"You know I am short-sighted, blind as a beetle, and not very well used in shooting matters"—— Every one present started, and looked with surprise and displeasure at the speaker; and one muttered in my ear—"Eh—d——!—Trevor shewing the white feather? I am astonished!"

"Why, what do you mean by all this, sir?" enquired the Captain, with a contemptuous sneer.

"Oh, merely that we ought not to fight on unequal terms. Do you think, my good sir, I will stand to be shot at without having a chance of returning the favour? I have to say, therefore, merely, that since this quarrel is of your own seeking—and your own d——n folly only has brought it about—I shall insist on our fighting breast to breast—muzzle to muzzle—and across a table. Yes," he continued, elevating his voice to nearly a shout; "we will go down to hell together—if we go at all—that is some consolation.”

“Infamous!”—“Monstrous!” was echoed from all present. They would not, they said, hear of such a thing—they would not stand to see such butchery! Eight or ten left the room abruptly, and did not return. Captain —— made no reply to Trevor’s proposal, but was conversing anxiously with his friends.

“Now, sir, who is the coward?” enquired Mr Trevor, sarcastically.

“A few moments will shew,” replied the Captain, stepping forward, with no sign of agitation, except a countenance of an ashy hue; “for I accede to your terms—ruffianly—murderous as they are; and may the curse of a ruined house overwhelm you and your family for ever!” faltered Captain ——, who saw, of course, that certain death was before both. “Are the pistols preparing?” enquired Mr Trevor, without regarding the exclamation of Captain —— . He was answered in the affirmative, that Captain V—— and Sir —— were both absent on that errand. It was agreed that the distressing affair should take place in the shooting gallery, where their noise would be less likely to alarm the servants. It is hardly necessary to repeat the exclamations of “Murder!—downright, savage, deliberate murder!” which burst from all around. Two gentlemen left abruptly, saddled their horses, and galloped after peace-officers; while Lord ——, who was almost distracted, hurried, accompanied by several gentlemen, and myself, to the shooting-gallery, leaving the Captain and a friend in the dining-room, while Mr Trevor, with another, betook themselves to the shrubbery walk. His Lordship informed Captain V—— and the Baronet of the dreadful nature of the combat that had been determined on since they had left the room. They both threw down the pistols they were in the act of loading, and, horror-struck, swore they would have no concern whatever in such a barbarous and bloody transaction. A sudden suggestion of Lord ——’s, however, was adopted. They agreed, after much hesitation, and doubt as to the success of the project, to charge the pistols with powder only, and put them into the hands of the Captain and Mr Trevor, as though they were loaded with ball. Lord —— was sanguine enough to suppose that, when they had both stood fire, and indisputably proved their courage, the affair might be settled amicably. As soon as the necessary preparations were completed, and two dreary lights were placed in the shooting-gallery, both the hostile parties were summoned. As it was well known that I was preparing for the medical profession, my services were put into requisition for both.

“But have you any instruments or bandages?” enquired some one.

“It is of little consequence;—we are not likely to want them, I think, if our pistols do their duty,” said Mr Trevor.

But a servant was mounted on the fleetest horse in Lord ——’s stable, and dispatched for the surgeon, who resided at not more than half a mile’s distance, with a note, requesting him to come furnished with the necessary instruments for a gun-shot wound. As the principals were impatient, and the seconds, as well as the others present, were in the secret of the blank charge in the pistols, and anticipated nothing like bloodshed, the pistols were placed in the hands of each, in dead silence, and the two parties, with their respective friends, retired to a little distance from each other.

“Are you prepared, Mr Trevor?” enquired one of Captain ——’s party; and, being answered in the affirmative, in a moment after the two principals, pistol in hand, approached one another. Though I was almost blinded with agitation, and was, in common with those around, quaking for the success of our scheme, my eyes were riveted on their every movement. There was something solemn and impressive in their demeanour. Though stepping to certain death, as they supposed, there was not the slightest symptom of terror or agitation visible—no swaggering—no affectation of a calmness they did not feel. The countenance of each was deadly pale and damp; but not a muscle trembled.

“Who is to give us the word?” asked the Captain, in a whisper, which, though low, was heard all over the room; “for, in this sort of affair, if one fires a second before the other, he is a murderer.” At that moment there was a noise heard ;—it was the surgeon who had arrived, and now entered breathless. “ Step out, and give the word at once,” said Mr Trevor, impatiently. Both the Captain and Mr Trevor returned and shook hands with a melancholy smile with their friends, and then re-took their places. The gentleman who was to give the signal then stepped towards them, and closing his eyes with his hands, said, in a tremulous tone, “ Raise your pistols !”—the muzzles were instantly touching one another’s breasts—“ and, when I have counted three, fire. One—two—three !”—They fired—both recoiled with the shock several paces, and their friends rushed forward.

“ Why, what is the meaning of this !” exclaimed both in a breath. “ Who has dared to mock us in this way ? There were no balls in the pistols !” exclaimed Trevor, fiercely. Lord —— and the seconds explained the well-meant artifice, and received an indignant curse for their pains. It was in vain we all implored them to be reconciled, as each had done amply sufficient to vindicate their honour. Trevor almost gnashed his teeth with fury. There was something fiendish, I thought, in the expression of his countenance. “ It is easily remedied,” said Captain ——, as his eye caught several small swords hanging up. He took down two, measured them, and proffered one to his antagonist, who clutched it eagerly.—“ There can be no deception here, however,” said he ; “ and now”—each put himself into posture—“ stand off there !”

We fell back, horror-struck at the relentless and revengeful spirit with which they seemed animated. I do not know which was the better swordsman ; I recollect only seeing a rapid glancing of their weapons, flashing about like sparks of fire, and a hurrying about in all directions, which lasted for several moments, when one of them fell. It was the Captain ; for the strong and skilful arm of Mr Trevor had thrust his sword nearly up to the hilt in the side of his antagonist. His very heart was cloven ! The unfortunate young man fell without uttering a groan—his sword dropped from his grasp, he pressed his right hand to his heart, and with a quivering motion of the lips, as though struggling to speak, expired ! “ Oh, my great God !” exclaimed Trevor, in a broken and hollow tone, with a face so blanched and horror-stricken, that it froze my very blood to look upon, “ what have I done ? Can all this be REAL !” He continued on his knees by the side of his fallen antagonist, with his hands clasped convulsively, and his eyes glaring upwards, for several moments.

* * * * *

A haze of horror is spread over that black transaction ; and if it is dissipated for an instant, when my mind’s eye suddenly looks back through the vista of years, the scene seems rather the gloomy representation—or picture—of some occurrence, which I cannot persuade myself that I actually witnessed. To this hour, when I advert to it, I am not free from fits of incredulousness. The affair created a great ferment at the time. The unhappy survivor (who in this narrative has passed under the name of Trevor) instantly left England, and died in the south of France, about five years afterwards, in truth, broken-hearted. In a word, since that day, I have never seen men entering into discussion, when warming with wine, and approaching never so slowly towards the confines of formality, without reverting, with a shudder, to the trifling, the utterly insignificant circumstances, which wine and the hot passions of youth kindled into the fatal brawl which cost poor Captain —— his life, and drove Mr —— abroad, to die a broken-hearted exile !

NARRATIVE OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE RUSSIAN MISSION, FROM ITS DEPARTURE FROM TABREEZ FOR TEHRAN ON 14TH JUMMADE 2D, (DEC. 20TH, 1828,) UNTIL ITS DESTRUCTION ON WEDNESDAY THE 6TH OF SHAHBAN, FEB. 11TH, 1829.

HOLDING the offices of scribe and accountant to the Mehmender, selected by his Royal Highness Abbas Meerza to attend upon the Mission, I left Tabreez on the 16th of the month of Jummaadee ul Saunce, in the suite of the Khan, to join M. Grebayedoff, at the village of Tickmadash, who had quitted the city two days previously to our departure.

The appointment of my chief to this situation was suddenly determined upon, Meerza Moossa Khan, the brother of H. E. the Cayim Mukam, having been originally directed to conduct the Mission to the capital. The Meerza, either from aversion to the charge, or conceiving it to be one derogatory to his rank and character of son-in-law to the king, evaded the task, by pleading the delicate state of his health, which rendered him unequal to it. It was on this resignation of the office that my chief was unexpectedly called upon to act in his place.

We were provided with every document of authority in the shape of rakums and orders to procure lodgings, provisions, and respectful treatment, from the different government officers and heads of villages on the road. The Prince was intimate in his instructions to the Khan at his audience of leave, that the Elchee should on no head have the slightest cause of complaint; and, to assist the Khan in the fulfilment of his highness's wishes, there were attached to him Mahomed Alli Beg, assistant to the Ferash Bashee, with six inferior Ferashes.

The Khan had previously a slight personal acquaintance with the Envoy, but on arrival at Tickmadash, the reception he met with was not very cordial, nor did he gain his good will or confidence, until services and more frequent intercourse during the journey had in some degree merited and gained his favour. This early coldness arose from the displeasure felt by M. Grebayedoff on the absence of Meerza Moossa Khan, whose rank was so superior to my chief's.

The state of the roads, as well as the severity of the weather, rendered our progress both tedious and painful. The country was deeply covered with snow; yet we did our best to administer to the comforts of the Mission, and to diminish the inconveniences travellers must be subjected to during the winter season.

The Mission formed rather a numerous body. Besides M. Grebayedoff, there were M. Maltzoff, the first secretary, M. Adelung, the second, a physician, Meerza Nerriman, Armenian interpreter, a Georgian prince, Dadash Beg and Rustum Beg, chief domestics, (the former absent at Resht,) a guard of sixteen cossacks of the line (Kuban,) and a retinue of about thirty servants, composed of Mahomedans, Russians, Georgians, and Armenians.

I had early cause to observe, that the domestics of the Mission were not held under strict control. The behaviour of the Armenians and Georgians was in general overbearing, and not conciliatory, towards my countrymen.

The duties of a mehmender are disagreeable and harassing; moreover it is difficult to give satisfaction, because each individual is to be kept in good humour. We had every day to procure from the villages a plentiful supply of provisions. For these my chief gave a receipt in full, which enabled the peasantry to make an equivalent deduction from the amount of their annual payments to the government. Rustum Beg was the person who received charge of, and distributed, these supplies.

For the use of the Mission we daily procured—

- 1 ox.
- 1 calf.
- 5 sheep.
- 30 fowls.
- 200 eggs.
- 84 lbs. or 14 muns of rice.
- 36 lbs. or 6 muns of butter.
- 36 lbs. or 6 muns of sour milk.
- 12 lbs. or 2 muns of cheese.
- 24 lbs. or 4 muns of sugar-candy.
- 3 lbs. or $\frac{1}{2}$ mun of spices.

240 lbs. or 40 muns of bread.
 6 lbs. or 1 mun of sour grape juice.
 6 lbs. or 1 mun of vinegar.
 1 bottle lime juice.
 6 lbs. or 1 mun raisins.
 3 lbs. or $\frac{1}{2}$ mun almonds.
 60 lbs. or 10 mun fruits.
 18 lbs. or 3 muns onions.
 3,600 lbs. or 600 muns wood.
 120 lbs. or 20 muns charcoal.
 1,800 lbs. or 300 muns barley.
 3,600 lbs. or 600 muns straw.
 18 lbs. or 3 muns candles.
 6 lbs. or 1 mun milk.
 300 lbs. or 50 muns wine and spirits.

The value of these articles arose to more than sixty tomans, or seventy-five Dutch ducats. They exceeded the wants of the Mission; besides, in the villages it was impossible to procure many of the items. In their stead money was frequently levied; and for the surplus, Rustum often received from ten to fifteen tomans in cash. This mode of proceeding appeared to us irregular; but as we conceived that M. Grebayedoff was aware of this conversion of his rations into money, it passed unnoticed by us.

However, I made a memorandum of the different sums paid to Rustum Beg in the journey. Their amount equalled one hundred and fifty tomans.

At Meana, Meerza Futha, the civil administrator of the district, and a son of Jehan Geer Khan, chief of the Shuggaguer tribe, came out of the town to meet the envoy.

The passage over the Kaslan Koh was difficult and painful, from the depth of snow on the surface of the mountain.

At Zunjaun, the Mission was lodged in the house of Nujjife Kooli Beg, son of Nussur Oollah Khan Afshar, who, at the head of a numerous cavalcade, advanced from the town to greet the envoy's arrival. He held the situation of deputy-governor. Meerza Ruffee, the Prince's minister, waited upon the envoy, who returned his visit.

On the day after arrival, M. Grebayedoff was introduced to the Prince Abdullah Meerza, who behaved towards him with kindness and attention. Besides frequent complimentary presents of sweetmeats, fruits, and eatables, prepared in his own kitchen, his Highness bestowed upon him a very good horse. To the servant, who brought the steed, a sum of sixteen ducats was distributed. We here procured from Abdullah Meerza, fifteen horses for the use of the Mission, in lieu of those furnished by Abbas Meerza. The hire of the forty-five beasts of burden was also defrayed by the Zunjaun government to the city of Kuzveen.

Officers of Abdullah Meerza had joined my chief immediately on crossing the Kaslan Koh, to assist him in providing for the comforts of the Mission, and in collecting the daily supply of provisions. They continued with us until we quitted Abdullah Meerza's country. On reaching the Kuzveen boundary at Sealdahun, we were met by similar people in the employ of Alli Nuggee Meerza, whose services were at our command to the vicinity of Tehran. To these subordinate officers, M. Grebayedoff never gave any present in recompense for their trouble and attendance. The envoy's means were probably small, which precluded the exercise of much liberality. To the proprietors of the houses in which he daily lodged during the journey, it was customary for him to give one or two ducats, and those, to my knowledge, were the only sums he ever gave away gratuitously.

I shall never forget the sufferings we endured, and the risks we encountered, whilst traversing the plains of Sooltaneeh in their whole extent. The cold was intense, our horses could scarcely proceed, from the great depth of the snow, and our safety was often endangered by violent storms of wind, accompanied by sleet. One morning we thought the envoy was lost. He had, with two cossacks, strayed from the road, and did not rejoin his party till late in the evening. Sometimes, with the greatest portion of his mounted suite, he would complete the day's march at a hurried pace. Of the horses, several often were unequal to the exertion, and used to knock up. We then replaced them by seizing the cattle of travellers whom we chanced to meet on the road.

The behaviour of the envoy towards the Khan and myself had gradually become more kind. He now treated my chief with familiarity and confidence; with me he frequently entered into conversation.

I could observe that he was a person of great abilities and acquirements; yet he appeared new in office, unaccustomed to command, and without dignity of manners. His retinue was also badly composed, and, certainly, they were kept under no control.

At Sealdahun, Mahomed Khan Afshar joined M. Grebayedoff on the part of the Shah. He had in the autumn been sent to Azerbejaun, to receive M. Grebayedoff on crossing the Arras, and had conducted him to Tabreez; but as M. Grebayedoff's delay there was longer than at first anticipated, he had returned to the court.

A numerous deputation left Kuzween to meet us. The principal personage was Meerza Nubbee Khan, the minister, who had in his train several chiefs of the military tribes, with nearly 300 horsemen. Five shaters, (running footmen,) and ten ferashes, (tent-pitchers,) had likewise been sent out to increase the envoy's cortège. A horse, richly caparisoned, was brought from the Prince's stable for his use.

The lodging assigned for M. Grebayedoff, was an entire new house adjacent to Meerza Nubbee's, which had been just completed for the reception of a daughter of the Prince, who was on the eve of becoming the wife of the Meerza's brother. The marriage festivals and feastings had already commenced, and of these M. Grebayedoff partook during a dinner that was given to him in the Peringhee style.

It was at Kuzween, however, that circumstances occurred which might have been productive of much evil. The envoy had a list of slaves of both sexes, who had been carried off from the Russian territories. Several Georgians or Armenians had joined his suite, for the express purpose of liberating, through his aid, their relatives.

Rustum Beg was generally the agent employed in the search of slaves. It had been ascertained, that a groom of Hoosain Khan, the late governor of Erivan, had brought a young German woman to Kuzween. The captive was demanded of this person, who stated he had sold her to a certain merchant of the city. The merchant, being called upon to produce the girl, explained that he had disposed of her to a sied (descendant of the Prophet) named Shaikh Abdul Ayzceez, cousin to the chief priest of Kuzween.

The sied was found, and brought by Rustum Beg, some cossacks, and two ferashes in the service of Meerza Nubbee Khan. In the open space before Meerza Nubbee's house, the sied was urged to give up the German woman, who had become his wife, and borne him two children. This he refused to do; menaces were used in vain, until Rustum Beg ordered him to be beaten, to induce him to give up the prisoner. A number of people, collected to witness the marriage entertainments, now thronged round the sied, and began to murmur. Meerza Nubbee, being informed of the proceedings, hastily quitted his house, to prevent the occurrence of any violence, and ordered Rustum Beg no longer to ill-treat the sied, as he should not be able to restrain the rising indignation of the bystanders. My chief was sent to M. Grebayedoff to apprise him of what had passed, whilst Meerza Nubbee persuaded the sied to produce his wife. She came with her two children, and was taken into the apartment of the envoy. Her husband remained in the court opposite the window, with a drawn dagger in his hand, declaring he would kill himself, should he by force be deprived of his wife; but if she wished to go, he would, without regret, relinquish his rights over her.

M. Adelung, the German assistant, appeared most anxious that the woman should express a wish to return to Georgia. The Khan had had some previous conversation with M. Grebayedoff, who, on entering the room where the woman was, asked her whether she wished to return to her country, or to remain in Persia; she replied, that if permitted, she would continue with her husband, as she could not separate herself from her children. The envoy then informed the sied that he restored her to him. This act produced a great sensation; for it was immediately communicated without doors to the people, who had crowded about with angry feelings, to see the termination of this affair.

At Kuzween also, after much trouble, was recovered a little girl, of about seven or eight years old, whom the envoy took much notice of, and used to treat as his own child.

Meerza Nubbee, at the dinner-party afterwards given to the envoy, frequently repeated how grateful the inhabitants of Kuzween were for his behaviour towards their sired.

Three days was the duration of our residence at Kuzween; we left the city attended by Meerza Nubbee, and a large cavalcade. Servants of the Prince accompanied us, to assist in collecting the soursant.

It was at Russeabad, a village of Kuzween, that an occasion was afforded to my chief to deliver a message on the part of Abbas Meerza. Rustum, as usual, had demanded money for the surplus quantity of provisions, or for articles of the daily supply that were not procurable. In this instance, eleven tomans were required. The villagers are always anxious to avoid this species of exactions, whether able to pay them or not; and an old man, instead of eleven, brought only seven tomans. He was, in consequence, struck violently over the head by Rustum, and playing deeply the part of a riant, (peasant,) shammed insensibility. The instantaneous uproar amongst the villagers, reached the ears of the envoy, who left his apartments to learn the cause; my chief informed him that the old man, having brought a sum less than required for a deficiency in the daily supply of provisions, had been beaten by Rustum.

M. Grebayedoff expressed his astonishment that Rustum received money, being perfectly ignorant that he did so. He likewise reprehended the Khan for not having before mentioned to him that money was ever taken from the villagers. The Khan answered, he imagined that the exaction of the price of articles of the daily rations was with the minister's knowledge, as this system had been pursued from the very commencement of the journey, and that his Meerza had a regular account of a sum of 160 tomans paid at the different villages to Rustum. The vexation of M. Grebayedoff was excessive. He declared his intention, on his return from Tehran, to repay at every stage the money that had been thus levied.

The Khan thought the moment opportune to deliver the sentiments of the Prince, expressed to him on the eve of departure, which were to this effect:—"You will mention to M. Grebayedoff the great satisfaction I have derived, both from his mode of conducting public business, and from his society; and, conscious of his talents and experience, I feel confident that nothing will arise from him to disturb the harmony existing between the governments. But I am apprehensive of his retinue; let him keep them under every restraint; in their feelings, there is much of party spirit, both religious and personal. He must recollect, that I was several years ago obliged to demand the dismissal of Dadash Beg from Tabreez, on account of his litigious behaviour towards the citizens. Rustum Beg is alike a very worthless character; and I cannot but be fearful that these individuals will involve M. Grebayedoff in quarrels and unpleasant disputes." The communication was received in good part, and M. Grebayedoff said he would cease to employ Armenians and Georgians on his return to Tabreez, but until then he could not dismiss them his service.

I had by this time gained a place in the envoy's good opinion. Whilst on horseback, during the day's journey, he frequently conversed with me. Amongst other topics, the difficulty of keeping servants in due subordination was mentioned. I observed, that menials in Persia were obliged to observe the greatest outward respect and distance towards their masters, which was productive of manifest advantages. This system not only kept them in their proper sphere, but tended to raise their employers in the estimation of the natives of the country. The English, with whom I had at times been intimately connected, understood perfectly the management of their followers. In proof of this assertion, I cited the establishments of the British ambassador and his suite, which, though very numerous, and formed of various tribes and inhabitants of different countries, yet were so overawed by the watchfulness of their masters, that they seldom ventured to harass others by the licentiousness so habitual to followers of personages in the enjoyment of high rank.

At length we reached the vicinity of the capital. Instead of going direct from Selleemania to Tehran, we proceeded to the village of Kund, still distant eight miles, to prepare for our entry. Much brushing and washing was here necessary. The best apparel was produced, and four or five horses were got in readiness to be led before the envoy.

The sun was in the constellation of Scorpion, a period highly unpropitious. It was Sunday the fifth of Rujjub. To the Khan, I noticed the evil tendency of the hour; but he remarked, "that the Feringhees had no faith in astrology; therefore it would only be a loss of words to attempt, from such causes, the postponement of their departure."

Within two or three miles of the city, we were met by several of the Shah's grooms, having in hand horses covered with the richest furniture, some running-footmen, and other attendants.

The appearance of the Mission, in consequence, became rather imposing and grand. Mahomed Wallee Khan, the chief of the Afshar tribe, with a vast body of horsemen, was sent out by the Shah to receive the envoy. He was attended by his relations, Umman Oollah and Hab-beeb Oollah Khan, both officers of the highest rank. A separate party was also conducted by Meerza Mahomed Alli Khan, minister of the Prince-Governor, and several of the most respectable inhabitants of the city.

The envoy descended at the spacious mansion of the late Mahomed Khan Zumborickchee Bashee, which had been entirely given up for his accommodation, with its bath and other conveniences.

In the principal rooms were placed various trays, covered with a profusion of fruits, sweetmeats, and sugar. It took some time to settle the members of the Mission in their respective apartments, particularly as the house was divided into several courts of different sizes.

Meerza Abdul Hoosain Khan, nephew of the foreign minister, was introduced in the character of Meh-mender on the part of the Shah's government. His uncle in reality was the person who superintended all the arrangements. He passed through the house during the day in a cursory manner, to see the due execution of his orders.

A company of Furahan infantry of about 80 men, nominally 100, commanded by Mahomed Alli Sultan, was placed over the house as a guard of honour; and his brother, Haddee Beg, Major of the same corps, came daily to inspect their conduct. Fifteen of the Shah's ferashes were likewise in attendance, to keep the premises from intruders. The Khan and myself had apartments allotted to us in the house, though his duties as Mehmender terminated on entering the city.

On the day after arrival, the first visit of ceremony took place. Meerza Abul Hussan Khan, the minister of foreign affairs, was the chief personage. Almost his equals in rank were Meerza Mahomed Alli Khan, Wuzzeer of the Prince-Governor Alli Shah; his brother, Mahomed Baucker Khan; and Mahmood Khan, commander of the guards, and chief master of the ceremonies. The interview passed off with great decorum, and with the proper exchange of compliments and civilities. Confectionery and sweetmeats, and abundance of fruits, were presented to the envoy in the course of the day.

The observances of the audience of presentation to the Shah having been satisfactorily arranged, it was, I think, on Wednesday the 9th day of Rujjub that this important event took place.

An hour before mid-day, the master of the ceremonies, Mahmood Khan, came to conduct the envoy from his house to the palace. He had in his suite eight Nussuckchees, fifteen Zarchees, eleven Ferashes, and a horse from the royal stables, on which M. Grebayedoff mounted. These attendants were furnished for the purpose of doing honour to the Mission. As the procession moved slowly along the extensive bazars, the shopkeepers stood erect, saluting the envoy in the Feringhee style, by doffing their caps. Whilst moving along the passages and courts of the palace, previously to reaching the glass-saloon, where his majesty was seated in state, every demonstration of respect was shewn by the Shah's servants in attendance. I could only follow the envoy to the door of the garden of the glass-saloon. Full fifty minutes elapsed ere the envoy reappeared. I gathered from reports that he delivered his credentials to the Shah, and that the ceremony was completed to the utmost satisfaction of all parties. It was indeed whispered that M. Grebayedoff remained too long seated in the presence, in the chair placed for his accommodation. The Shah had on his crown, and was arrayed in his finest jewellery; their weight was so oppressive, that, after the envoy retired, his majesty was obliged speedily to cast off these ensigns of royalty.

M. Grebayedoff, on quitting the palace, was desirous to wait upon H. H. Alli Shah, the Prince-governor. However, a postponement of the visit was requested, on the ground that the king's permission to receive him had not been obtained. He then proceeded to the house of the Ummeen-ed-Dowleh, whom, as I afterwards learned, the envoy supposed to be the first minister of the empire. Nothing could exceed the politeness of his reception. The visits of ceremony were thus nearly completed. Two or three days were allowed to elapse before the envoy went to the house of Meerza Abul Hussan Khan, the minister of foreign affairs. It was deemed strange that no communication was opened with Meerza Abdul Wahab, the Moatemed-ed-Dowleh, a minister of the first rank, highly respected for his learning and accomplishments, who was the Ummeen's rival, both in precedence and power.

The Prince-governor attempted to evade the honour of a visit. He requested it might take place on any day that the Shah was absent from the city on horseback; but yielded the point, on reiterated expression of the envoy's wishes to wait upon him.

A series of grand entertainments were given to the Mission at the houses of the Ummeen-ed-Dowleh, Meerza Abul Hussan Khan, and Meerza Mahomed Alli Khan. A spirit of emulation prevailed between these personages; each endeavoured to gratify their guests by unbounded attention, by the excellence of the repast, display of their choicest services of china, glass-ware, and household apparatus, by illuminations and by fireworks.

Till the second interview with the Shah, which happened on the twelfth or fourteenth day after our arrival, the attention of the Court was solely occupied in displaying every species of consideration towards the envoy. But from that period I perceived that the anxiety to please, gradually, though almost imperceptibly, diminished. At this audience the ratified copy of the treaty of peace was delivered. The envoy's prolonged use of the chair was again noticed. The word murrahkus (depart), used towards the envoy by the Shah, when his majesty considered the audience had been of sufficient duration, gave deep offence. The impropriety of this expression, when applied to the representative of his Imperial Majesty, was strongly commented on in an official note to the minister of foreign affairs; although it was explained that this word, from its general usage, meant neither indignity nor discourtesy. This explanation was not, however, considered satisfactory. On the other hand, the manner the envoy, in his correspondence, made mention of the king, by the simple title of (be hidmtee Shah) Shah, did not pass unnoticed by the Persian minister.

I had no opportunity of learning the precise nature of any of the discussions on public affairs. It was said that the king objected to several articles of the treaty, as being of a complexion too harsh to be executed; but that M. Grebayedoff at once declared that he could not be instrumental to any changes or modifications. The engagements, whether onerous or not, had undergone the fullest consideration, had been ratified by both parties, and had thus become irrevocable.

Quarrels between the townspeople and the envoy's servants, on two or three occasions, happened. A nobleman's camel-drivers were guilty of severely beating the envoy's favourite Russian servant and foster brother, Alexander. They escaped unpunished by immediately leaving the city. A cossack had his bottle of spirits broken in the bazar by some wild character, perhaps intentionally, because the demeanour of the envoy's people had highly displeased in some respects the citizens. The man who committed the offence was seized, and severely beaten publicly by the officers of the police.

Provisions of every description were each day delivered over by Meerza Abul Hussan Khan to the envoy's people. He had, however, on reaching the capital, diminished the quantity to nearly the half of that he received on the road.

On first arrival, the Armenian inhabitants of the city did not frequent the envoy's house; indeed, the ferashes, placed over the premises, prohibited their entrance; yet, by degrees, this injunction was evaded. Meerza Nerriman's acquaintances were permitted to visit him; to these succeeded Rustum's, until all who liked came. The Georgian merchants, dwelling in the caravansaræe, were frequently in attendance.

Dadash Beg had been sent from Tabreez to the seaport of Anzellee, to superintend the transport of the Emperor's presents to the Shah. These by right should have reached Tehran before the envoy. But by some accident they had suffered detention at Astrakan, or elsewhere; and I did learn that the vessel, in which they were embarked, had appeared at Lankeroun; but, from circumstances unknown to me, had landed the packages of presents at Sarree Poochtah. Though unavoidable, it was unfortunate that the arrival of the presents was thus retarded. They would have kept the Shah and his ministers in good-humour; at least, would have diverted their attention from various other trifling occurrences. To my countrymen nothing is so pleasing as a present, whatever may be its value. The article comes without any cost, and gratifies personal vanity; it soothes the soul; it has an indescribable effect over the whole frame.

M. Grebayedoff being extremely anxious to rejoin his family at Tabreez, it was arranged between him and the Shah's ministers, that he should quit the capital as early as possible, leaving his first assistant, M. Maltzoff, and Meerza Nerriman, the interpreter, to deliver the presents on their arrival from Resht.

I do not think that the envoy was provided even with any trifles to give away as occasion might require. It was mentioned that he presented to the Shah twenty-five of the new platina coins of Russia, fifteen to the Ummeen, ten to Meerza Mahomed Alli Khan, and five to Meerza Abul Hussan Khan.

Our residence at Tehran had now continued for twenty days. The extreme anxiety to please had evidently subsided to a point, that Meerza Nerriman observed to me, in allusion to the change of feeling, "It has become cold—we must depart, for it is time."

In one respect, certainly, the duties of the envoy were most perplexing. He had been accompanied from Tabreez by nine or ten Armenians, whose relations had been carried into captivity. These people continually pestered him by entreaties to rescue the captives. He could not leave his chamber for a moment, without being importuned by them on this subject. No sooner was one slave released, than she gave information respecting several others. The slaves were never given up, without kindling considerable angry feelings. Several had been recovered, both here, at Kuzween, and at Zunjaun.

The envoy did not much extend the range of his visits. A meeting between him and Meerza Abdul Wahab could not be arranged. The mother of Manoochehr Khan having been polite in sending sweetmeats and making enquiries, he called on her, but not on her son, the chief eunuch.

There was a certain Eusofe, native of Erivan, relation of the eunuch Meerza Yakooob, who frequented the house. He came out to meet us the first day, and was particularly intimate with Meerza Nerriman.

27th Rujjub. The period of M. Grebayedoff's departure from Tehran having been previously fixed, Zohraub Khan, the treasurer of the household, brought to the envoy's house the presents destined by the Shah for himself and suite.

Upon M. Grebayedoff was bestowed,

1 decoration, in diamonds, of the first class of the order of the Lion and Sun.

1 gold enamelled collar for the same.

- 1 Cashmir shawl-pelisse, embroidered.
- 2 handsome shawls.
- 1 fine string of pearls.
- 1 bag, containing 1000 Dutch ducats.
- 1 horse, with gold bridle, studded with precious stones, gold chain, and saddle, covered with thin plates of gold.

To the 1st Secretary, M. Maltzoff.

- 1 decoration, in diamonds, of the second class of the order of Lion and Sun.
- 2 shawls.

To the 2d Secretary.

- 1 decoration, in diamonds, of the second order.
- 2 shawls.

To the Georgian Prince.

- 1 decoration, in diamonds, of the second order.
- 2 shawls.

To Meerza Nerriman.

- 2 shawls.

To Dadash Beg.

- 1 decoration.
- 1 Cashmir shawl.

The officers of the cossacks received gold, the privates silver, medals.

There was much joy throughout the Mission, during the day of the distribution of these various and valuable tokens of his majesty's bounty and favour. One person of the suite appeared alone gloomy and discontented. This was Rustum, the converted Georgian, who had thrice changed his religion. He held himself equal to Dadash Beg. He had received neither decoration nor shawl. In my hearing, in a paroxysm of rage, he exclaimed, "Well, am I not fully as worthy of consideration as that blind blinking chaff, Dadash? It shall be seen what kind of stuff I am made of. I'll create such a scene of confusion, that its head shall reach to the clouds."

To Zohraub Beg, who brought the kalaat, the envoy gave 200 ducats.

Next day the audience of leave took place. The officers of the Mission wore their decorations. The interview passed off tolerably well; but the king repeated, in a more audible voice, the objectionable word murrakhus. This word was as offensive to the envoy, as the envoy's constant use of the chair, and degagé manner, whilst in the presence, were disliked by the Shah.

Happy were we at the idea of departure; all business had terminated. Every honour, every possible distinction, had been shewn towards the Emperor's representative; satisfaction was apparent in every countenance.

I myself was happy at the thought of getting away; for, on mixing with my countrymen, I could perceive that no favourable impression had been made on their minds.

I also concluded, from the following circumstance, that there existed a coldness of feeling between the court and the envoy. I wished to buy a horse for M. Maltzoff from an officer of the king's personal attendants. The subject had been before broached; and I took with me the price of the horse in money, and a gun in a present. On the plea, that the Shah might not altogether approve of the transaction, he declined the sale, with many polite apologies; kept the gun for a few days, to avoid incivility, and then sent it to me to be returned.

The preparations for our departure were made, the day fixed, and the baggage-cattle were hired. Meerza Nerriman shewed me a memorandum of the sum M. Grebayedoff had in view to distribute to the Mehmen- ders, the inferior attendants, and the guard. It amounted to seventeen hundred ducats.

With us all was gladness, all was sunshine. The envoy's countenance beamed with delight at the thought of rejoining his beloved and beautiful bride, the Georgian princess. She was frequently the theme of his conversation. Yet suddenly our atmosphere became darkened, even as that of the most dreary winter's night.

Late on the evening of the same day on which the kalaats (Shah's presents) were received, Meerza Yakob, the eunuch, with one servant, entered the house. He went to the apartments of Meerza Nerriman, who shortly afterwards reported to M. Grebayedoff, "That Meerza Yakob had thrown himself under the Russian protection, and was desirous to return to his native province, Erivan." M. Grebayedoff replied, "That he received no one coming like a thief in the dead of night; that he should for the present quit the premises, and, if he continued in the same mind, might return in the morning." Meerza consequently departed.

Early the next morning, Meerza Nerriman left the house, and returned with Meerza Yakooob, who was accompanied by one servant. Apartments were assigned to him in a court adjoining the one occupied by M. Grebayedoff.

This person, whose appearance amongst us proved so awfully sinister, was a native of Erivan, where his relations still resided. He was of low birth. His father, an Armenian, was gardener to Mahomed Khan, hereditary chief of Erivan province. He had been carried into slavery about the time Erivan was besieged by General Sisianoff, in the year 1226, (1808,) and had been brought up as an attendant on the seraglio of the famous Golden Ismael Khan. On this chieftain's disgrace, he became, after a lapse of some years, the property of the Shah. For a long period he had enjoyed his majesty's peculiar favour and confidence, as a domestic of the seraglio; and, at the moment of relinquishing the Shah's service, held the responsible appointment of treasurer, and superintendent of the jewellery of the harem.

We, who well knew the feelings of our countrymen towards this class of persons, and were convinced that his Majesty would, in point of honour, more willingly allow one of his wives to obtain forcibly from him a divorce, were fearfully alarmed at the consequences that inevitably must ensue from his (Meerza Yakooob's) reception by the envoy. We pondered intensely on the subject. We knew that, by the late treaty, the Russian minister had a right to afford his protection to persons desiring to return into the Russian territories; yet by no arguments could we reconcile ourselves to suppose, that the pride of the King of Kings, and the suspicion with which all those are regarded who are in attendance on the harem, would permit his majesty patiently to submit to a circumstance so completely at variance with his sentiments of propriety, and so liable to debase him in the eyes of his subjects. It would be to him humiliation of the deepest tinge; already, from the result of the last war, had the king sunk low in their estimation, he had lately delivered (it might be said, with his own hands) a vast portion of his hoarded wealth, and now he was called upon to resign his rights over a servant, whose duties in his household were of the most delicate nature; one who was most intimately acquainted with all his domestic concerns; one who could afford the minutest information regarding his treasures, and valuables of every description.

The Russian government could obtain no accession of power by the possession of the person of an unhappy mortal like Meerza Yakooob; we could therefore only imagine, that he was received by the minister to serve purposes detrimental to the welfare of Persia. And if sincerely anxious to befriend him, why was the Meerza not advised to remain in his situation, where he enjoyed affluence and high consideration? On thoughts became totally bewildered while dwelling on this subject.

When it became publicly known that Meerza Yakooob had sought refuge in the envoy's house, messages were delivered on the part of the ministers and Manoochehr Khan, the chief council, to expose the impropriety of affording him protection—and various arguments were used to effect the object in view.

Meerza Yakooob, however, continuing unmoved, either by the advice of M. Grebayedoff, or the assurances of forgiveness held out to him, was sent with the first secretary, M. Maltzoff, and the interpreter, Meerza Nerriman, to the house of Manoochehr Khan, for the purpose of declaring his intention of returning to his native country, Erivan. Nothing disagreeable happened during this interview; indeed, it was imagined that the persuasions of Manoochehr Khan had been efficacious. Meerza Yakooob, instead of returning to the envoy's, went to his own quarters; but in the evening again appeared, with several articles of furniture, keleaus, beddings, &c. &c. &c.

He perfectly established himself with the Mission. The storm appeared to thicken around, as Meerza Yakooob's house the next day was sealed by the king's orders; and it was officially notified to the envoy, that the refugee had unsettled accounts to the amount of 30 or 40,000 to-mans. In these moments of agitation I did not place on memory events exactly to the hour or day as they occurred. Rustum, late in the evening, made a fruitless endeavour to bring off the property remaining in Meerza Yakooob's house. He took with him some mules, and several domestics, and broke the seals off the doors. Already were some articles prepared for removal, when notice of the attempt being conveyed to those in charge, they interfered with threats and angry words, until Rustum, perceiving they would be followed by blows, retired without effecting his purpose.

It was on the 28th or 27th of Rujjub, that M. Grebayedoff assented to send Meerza Yakooob to Manoochehr Khan's, accompanied by my chief and Meerza Nerriman, where would be present Meerza Abul Hussan Khan, the minister for foreign affairs, and Zohroaub Khan, the treasurer, to sift the questions of the Meerza's accounts. Ere this measure was agreed to, M. Grebayedoff had shewed every disposition to meet the wishes of the ministers as far as was consistent with his duty. Apprehensions of punishment or of death could not be removed from Meerza Yakooob's mind, should he return to his duty; and he objected with equal pertinacity to the suggestions of M. Grebayedoff to proceed to Tabreez, to be placed in the service of Abbas Meerza.

My chief proceeded alone to Manoochehr Khan's; he found the party assembled. Meerza Yakooob was much irritated by the treatment he had received on passing through some passages leading to the rooms, where some menials of the harem had spit upon him, and reviled him in the grossest terms. The clothes of Meerza Nerriman had also been moistened.

On being accused of purloining money and jewels, Meerza Yakooob retorted in these words—"Have you neither faith nor religion, that you charge me with dishonesty?" Fuel was added to the fire. Language so unguardedly used was at once severely reprobated, and the Khan, perceiving that the difficulties would only be increased by further discussions between impassioned people, directed Ramazaun Beg, a ferash of the Shah, to take Meerza Yakooob home, and to be careful that he met no further molestation or insult. The Khan followed. M. Grebayedoff's indignation at the insults offered to the two Meerzas was extreme. "It is not on Meerza Yakooob they have spitten; they have, I consider, spit upon the Emperor in the first place, then spit upon me. Such conduct is past endurance!" The Khan endeavoured to assuage his just vexation, by saying that it was the act of low ignorant people, and might as readily be overlooked as the attack made by Meerza Yakooob on the religion of those with whom he was confronted—persons of no mean rank. M. Grebayedoff then, with evident displeasure, demanded of this unfortunate being—"Why he had the audacity to make any comments on religious belief, and why he had allowed the word 'religion' to pass from his mouth?" The Meerza repelled the charge, by saying he had thus given vent to his feelings—"But have you neither religion nor faith, that you thus wrongfully accuse me?"

After this scene, accommodation was hopeless by any friendly interference. About the 29th of Rujjub, M. Grebayedoff had a private audience with the Shah, but nothing satisfactory ensued from it. The claims against Meerza Yakooob, it was arranged, were to be decided at the tribunal of Meerza Musseeh, the chief priest of Tehran. To this many objections were offered by the Meerza, who with truth asserted, that according to the Mahomedan tenets, a person renouncing the faith (Islam) was entitled to no consideration, as he by that act committed a crime, of which death was the forfeit. Unfortunately Meerza Yakooob was permitted to talk in a manner most disrespectful both of the domestic life of the king, and of his numerous family, and to animadvert on the rectitude and sanctity of the priesthood. Whilst relating one day indelicate anecdotes respecting the inmates of the harem, I interrupted his discourse by remarking, that the favours he had received from the Shah for a length of time, should at least be repaid by silence on the circumstances he was thus wantonly divulging. The envoy acted imprudently in treating the Meerza with too much consideration. He sometimes dined at his table, was furnished with eatables from his kitchen, and would no longer partake of food from us, from the unconcealed apprehension of being poisoned.

It rather appeared that the king had relinquished the idea of recovering the deserters. M. Grebayedoff was informed that his majesty's assent to the continued residence of M. Maltzoff and Meerza Nerriman at the capital, after his departure, was withdrawn, as he felt apprehensive that some further unpleasant occurrences might happen from their inexperience in the conduct of affairs.

On the 1st of Shahban, Meerza Yakooob, attended by M. Maltzoff and Meerza Nerriman, went, according to appointment, to the house of Meerza Musseeh. They remained seated in an apartment for at least an hour, when they were informed that the chief priest was too unwell to listen to the cause. A concourse of people was assembled in the premises; and I heard that Meerza Musseeh avoided the interview, on the ground, that, unable to restrain his feelings, he might perhaps use the epithet of infidel (Kuffur) towards Meerza Yakooob, which authorized the populace to lapidate or treat him with violence. This visit, therefore, proved of no utility.

By information received from Meerza Yakooob, a strict enquiry after slaves was renewed; a deep anxiety was portrayed to obtain possession of a Christian captive called Taallan, whose personal attractions were highly spoken of. Mahtee Kouli Khan, the son of Hoosain Khan, late governor of Erivan, was incessantly urged to give up some female slaves, who it was known had been brought by him, or sent by his father, from Erivan. Two he had given to Alli Yar Khan, the late prime minister; and he now begged that Alli Yar Khan would permit M. Grebayedoff to ascertain if they were willing to return to their native country, and that thus he (Mahtee Kouli Khan) would be relieved from further importunities on the part of the Russian envoy. The late premier, desirous to shew that he still recollected the many acts of kindness he received from M. Grebayedoff during his confinement at Tabreez, readily assented to the proposal. Accordingly several of the Armenians who were in the suite of the envoy for the purpose of recovering their relatives, went with Rustum, and Aga Mahomet Alli, the Prince (Abbas Meerza's) deputy Ferash Bashee, to Alli Yar Khan's residence. A young woman, and a girl of thirteen or fourteen, were brought from the inner apartments; but they were neither recognised by the parties concerned, nor did they express a desire to leave their present protector.

Alli Yar Khan, to prevent the necessity of a second production of the females, had taken the precaution to have present during the interview some persons of respectability, to give evidence on the result of the investigation.

The deputy Ferash Bashee begged me, on the evening of the same day, to advise my chief to warn M. Grebayedoff against any proposals that Rustum might make respecting these women, as he had, without reserve, expressed his determination either to lose his life, or to effect the liberation of the youngest female. Early on the ensuing day, I know not if with M. Grebayedoff's knowledge, Rustum carried a request from the envoy to Alli Yar Khan that the captives might be sent to his house, in order that he might in person learn their inclinations. Without much hesitation, they were conducted to his residence under the protection of several servants, and a Mahomed Tahur Beg, to whom the youngest was under engagements of marriage. On reaching the premises, the entrance of other attendants was prohibited. The females, on being questioned by M. Grebayedoff, explicitly mentioned that they were not solicitous to leave Tehran; but in an evil moment he listened to the suggestion of Rustum to detain them for a day or two, when, relieved from awe and apprehension, the love of their primitive faith, and attachment to their native country, would predominate in their minds over every other consideration.

They were accordingly lodged under the care of Meerza Yakoob, in an apartment adjoining, over which were stationed two sentries of the Ferra-haun infantry, to prevent the intrusion of any one. The servants of Alli Yar Khan remonstrated vehemently against this breach of good faith, and, bewailing the misplaced confidence of their master, were obliged to return without their charge.

To M. Grebayedoff we felt a sincere attachment, that made us most uneasy on witnessing these violent proceedings. We were acquainted with the state of the public opinion towards him, and were conscious that, without fresh causes, excitement enough had been created to render his situation imminently dangerous. Our nation is wild, cruel, and thoughtless—to-morrow seldom comes under contemplation—like the flint, when struck, fire is instantaneously produced.

My chief no longer concealed his apprehensions, but earnestly entreated M. Grebayedoff to allow the women to return to Alli Yar Khan's house. He dwelt upon the expediency of doing so, until M. Grebayedoff, with warmth, told him that his interference was very disagreeable. The Khan, after this reproof, did not wait upon the envoy till two or three days, when he was sent for, and they were reconciled. Meerza Mahtee, the Shah's manuscript-writer, frequently visited the envoy on the part of Alli Yar Khan, to request that the women might be restored. Meerza Abul Hussan Khan, the minister of foreign affairs, with equal earnestness repeatedly endeavoured to effect some arrangement respecting Meerza Yakoob. The representations of one or the other were unheeded.

On the third day since their admittance into the house, the two women expressed a willingness to return to their country, which was Karakelleseah, a village on the frontier of the province of Erivan. It is impossible to assert that they were sincere in this declaration, for, by means of the Persian sentries placed over their apartment, they kept up a constant communication with the followers of Alli Yar Khan, who continually hovered about the house.

Mahomed Tahur Beg, the betrothed of the young girl, with another servant of respectability, used to frequent my room, until Meerza Yakoob informed me that their reception was contrary to the wishes of the envoy.

Our departure was positively fixed for the 7th or 8th of Shahban; and on mid-day of the 5th, by the directions of Rustum, the women were conducted to a bath, which, though distinct, formed a part of the premises. No step could have been more highly injudicious. The bath, or bathing, is one of the most important ceremonies before a Mahomedan marriage. The domestics of Alli Yar Khan endeavoured to carry off the women by force, on their return from the Hummam. If M. Grebayedoff was ignorant that the women had been taken to the bath, the scuffle that ensued on their quitting it apprized him of the circumstance. I learnt that he menaced and uttered vain reproaches against those of his retinue, whom he should have perceived were daily, even hourly, rendering his situation more perilous. Like wild-fire, reports were spread throughout the city unfavourable to the reputation of the envoy. The priesthood were at length appealed to; and Meerza Musseeh, on the same evening, held a meeting of the Moolahs at one of the principal mosques. They declared, that further forbearance was impossible; their religion had been reviled, their monarch insulted, their most sacred rights trampled upon, and unanimously it was decided, that a portion of the Moolahs should immediately wait on the Prince-governor Alli Shah, to inform him, that if the Russian envoy could not be induced to surrender Meerza Yakoob and the two females, they would be forcibly dragged from his house by the populace. His highness requested that all acts of violence might be postponed until he had held further communication with the envoy.

Apprized of what had passed in the mosques, I made my report to Meerza Nerriman in such terms as I conceived likely to impress him with the approaching danger. I was laughed at for my pains. "We," he said, "are camels of the Zomburuk" (a small piece of artillery) "corps, who are accustomed to the report of gunpowder."

Well do I recollect another conversation I held with this ill-fated person. Being a scribe by profession, he shewed me an official note he had, at the envoy's request, addressed to the ministers of the court. The subject was of little importance, but the word Shah, without any preceding titles, caught my eye. I observed, "that surely there would be no impropriety in writing 'His Majesty the Shah,' or 'The King of Kings,' or 'The Protector of the World,'—epithets used in mere courtesy, and assumed by the monarchs of Persia from days of antiquity. Other European nations, particularly the English, always mentioned the king's name with every proper respect. Why should not the agents of Russia be equally courteous?"

"Ah!" replied the Meerza, "you do not fully comprehend the business. Russia is in a situation to command, while England can only obtain her objects by courtship and obsequiousness."

In the course of the day, (Tuesday,) the 5th of Shahban, Meerza Abdul Wahaub expressed a wish to meet the envoy at the house of Mahomed Wullec Khan Afshar, by which arrangement all question of the first visit would be put aside. "He was deeply anxious," he said, "to prevent a rupture between two mighty powers, and the consequent loss of many valuable lives, on account of a miserable creature like Meerza Yakoob and two unfortunate women."

The events of this day, (Wednesday,) the 6th of Shahban, of most agonising fear and dire calamity, will never be effaced from my memory. They rushed on in such rapid succession, that it has required a lengthened composure to enable me to commit them to paper.

It must have been with the sunrise, that a servant of the Prince-governor Alli Shah, came to require the immediate presence of my chief and Meerza Nerriman, on business of the most vital importance. M. Grebayedoff was then enjoying his last earthly repose; and more than an hour and a half, or nearly two hours, elapsed ere Meerza Nerriman obtained the minister's instructions and permission to attend the summons. My chief having to arrange the meeting agreed to the previous evening between Meerza Abdul Wahaub and M. Grebayedoff, left the house very early, directing Meerza Nerriman to join him at the Prince's palace.

Scarcely had an hour of the day passed by, when I was informed of the assemblage of people at the principal mosque, where the priests had again held council. They ordered the closure of all shops in the bazar, and then enjoined their congregation to proceed to the Russian quarters, to demand the delivery of, or obtain by force, the persons of Meerza Yakoob and the two women.

Two Georgian merchants of respectability hastened from their caravansaræe, where they had been apprised of the commotion, to the envoy's house, to give intelligence of the premeditated attack; and Manoochehr Khan, in consequence of an order received the night before from the Shah, sent his nephew, Meerza Selliman Malleykafi, to describe, in the plainest terms, the troubled state of the public feeling, and to persuade M. Grebayedoff to withdraw his protection from those sheltered under his roof.

A crowd of four or five hundred persons, preceded by boys, and some worthless desperate men, who, with frantic gestures, brandished their clubs and naked swords in the air, had advanced from the mosque to the envoy's habitation. Meerza Selliman with difficulty made his way through them, and gave warning, too late, of the violent resolution that had been adopted. In attempting to quit the premises, to wait upon the Prince-governor, Meerza Nerriman was obliged to return in dismay to the envoy's apartments, where my attendance had been required, to arrange some business preparatory to our departure. Showers of stones now descended into the court; the voices of the mob were from time to time raised in a general shout. We listened in dread, uncertain of what violence would next occur.

The strangers were encircled by the web of fate. I could neither see them display the stern resolution to expire in desperate defence, nor sufficient presence of mind, by instan-taneous compliance with the known purpose of the mob, to avert the impending danger.

There were present in the room, besides M. Grebayedoff, M. Adelung the second secretary, the physician, the Georgian prince, cousin to Madam Grebayedoff. Meerza Nerriman, the two Georgian merchants, myself, Rustumi, Aga Mahomed Alli, Abbas Meerza's deputy Ferash Bashee, and many of the domestics, with the cossacks of the guard, were collected in the court and adjoining apartments.

The house of Mahomed Khan is of great extent, divided into several distinct courts, having on one side of each a range of apartments. The suite occupied by M. Grebayedoff consists of a large centre saloon, with open anterooms on either side of it, and beyond each, one smaller room. The roof and court of this range adjoined that assigned to Meerza Yakooob.

Every moment the uproar became more vehement; several guns were fired, and suddenly we were conscious of a rush of people into the adjoining court. I heard a voice exclaim, "Take Meerza Yakooob, and begone!" It was, I afterwards learnt, that of Hadjee Beg the Meerza, who endeavoured to appease the mob, by delivering up to them a victim. The unhappy creature clung to his garments for protection; he was dragged to slaughter, and fell under numerous wounds, cruelties, and indignities. Alli Yar Khan's servants were no less active in carrying off the two females.

During the calm which succeeded to these acts of violence, we were informed of Meerza Yakooob's fate, of the death of Dadash Beg, a cossack, and one or two servants; in defending themselves, two or three of the townspeople were killed. Their bodies were carried to an adjacent mosque, and served to exasperate the people to complete madness. It was at this moment that an immediate neighbour, named Alli Wurdee, a confectioner by trade, in the service of Manoochehr Khan, hastily entered the apartment to rescue from the fury of the populace the relative of his employer. Whilst time permitted, he besought Meerza Selliman to accompany him to his house by the way he would direct, and, with almost equal ardour, offered shelter and safety to the envoy. Neither would listen to his entreaties. Meerza Nerriman loudly exclaimed, that no one would venture to touch the person of the Emperor's representative. "The noise of your guns," he said, "does not startle us. Have we not heard them at Ganja, Abbasabad, and Erivan?" M. Grebayedoff declined the offer, either from reluctance to desert his comrades, or from ignorance of his danger; and the confectioner was allowed to depart, regretting, no doubt, the inutility of his endeavours to serve his benefactor.

The cossacks and domestics had now leisure to prepare their arms for defence, in case of a second attack.

In less than half an hour, our conjectures respecting the termination of the riot were falsified. We were assailed by increased numbers, and with great vigour. A larger portion of the people were provided with fire-arms, and were of a different class to the common shopkeepers and ragamuffins of the city. Men of the military tribes must have joined in the attack; yells loud and frenzied rent the air, and the showers of stones were so thick and incessant, that we were obliged to keep ourselves close within the right-side room of the court, which was M. Grebayedoff's sleeping apartment.

Vain attempts were made by M. Grebayedoff to address the populace. No mortal voice could have quelled a tumult so furious. The order then given to the cossacks to fire their pieces with powder, was alike unavailing. Death was at our portal; its victims herded together, helpless, panic-struck, and struggled to avoid their fate, like sheep beset by wolves, fierce and ravenous.

The cossacks treated the danger-like men determined if possible to defend their chief, and to sell their lives dearly. Some of the domestics shewed great presence of mind and courage, particularly a courier of the Mission, by name Hoachatoor. This brave lad, sword in hand, rushed on the assailants, and cut down two of their number; they gave way before him. By a staircase, he mounted and attempted to clear the walls; he was struck with stones,—twice he staggered, yet pushed on, till a stone, by hitting the blade of his weapon, broke it in two, and thus defenceless, he was cut to pieces.

For some time the success of the attack was doubtful. An effort was made to clear the court; but though the foremost retired, those on the tops of the walls continued to discharge their arms, and the window of the room was beaten in with stones and bricks.

During this state of the contest, hope still remained that the king would send some troops to our succour. The guard of Furahan infantry had dispersed on the first attack, without any strenuous exertion to save us. However, the roof of the house commenced to shake; it was speedily perforated, and, by the first shots from above, the envoy's foster-brother was mortally wounded. In distress of soul, he (M. Grebayedoff) exclaimed, "Look! look! they have killed Alexander!" Ere we moved into the large centre-room, two more of the party were lifeless; but it was so exposed from the one we had left, now in possession of the townspeople, and from the large size of its window, that to remain in it long was impossible. I would here, in shifting rooms, have mingled with the mob, as did the Prince Abbas Meerza's servant, Aga Mahomed Alli; but escape could not be accomplished.

I had still presence of mind to mark the horrors of our situation depicted on the countenances of many. In some, animation was almost suspended, others were frantic with despair, and few besides the cossacks persevered in desperate resistance. The envoy, with arms crossed, paced the floor, and at times he passed his hands in perturbation through his hair. His forehead was bloody, from a blow he had received on the right side of his head. In a tone of enquiry he accosted me; "They will kill us," he said, "Meerza,—they will kill us!" I could only reply in the affirmative. The last words I heard him utter were, "Futh Alli Shah! Futh Alli Shah! jensoudre, jensoudre!" or some such expression.

I witnessed with the deepest awe and admiration the death of the physician. From the commencement of the attack, he had been active in stimulating his companions to defend themselves to the last. His only weapon was a small European sabre. He must have judged there was no hope of preservation, for he made his way into the court, menacing those opposed to him, till he met a stout young man, who would not turn to fly; they exchanged at the same time blows with their swords. The Russian raised up his arm to shield his head, and his left hand dropped on the pavement. Not dismayed, he gained the apartment, tore a curtain off one of the doors, which he wrapped round his maimed limb, and, although we endeavoured to oppose his project, he jumped from the window, and fell, overpowered by numbers, having been previously struck to the ground by stones thrown from the tops of the walls.

Ere we relinquished the saloon for the farthest side-room, four or five of our number were shot. This was divided by a partition, behind which all who could sought shelter. Meerza Selliman and Meerza Nerriman did not gain this last retreat, but were cut down from behind on the portal.

From the window and doorway we were assailed; the cossacks had nearly all perished, and two of the most forward of the assailants attempted to make their way into the hinder part of the room. In their hands were swords or daggers; they were irresolute, and despairing of life. I rushed out, flourishing a large knife, and as they retired, I so closely followed them, that I threw myself amongst the foremost of the combatants, who thought me to be one of their number. It was in vain that I struggled to gain the court. I could not penetrate the crowd, and was pushed again into the room, to see the lifeless bodies of seventeen of my late companions. The envoy had been pierced through and through by a blow on the left breast from a knife; and an athletic phalwan, or public wrestler, named —, in the service of a citizen of Tehran, was shewn to me as the person who had inflicted it. At M. Grebayedoff's feet lay extended a cossack, in all probability the officer of the party. This devoted being had, throughout the fray, shielded with his own body that of M. Grebayedoff. He shrunk neither from stone nor sabre-cut, but all his movements were calculated to ward off danger from his chief.

Exhausted by extreme agitation, fear, and horror, stupified by severe contusions from stones in various parts of my body, I had to make a final exertion to prevent myself from falling inanimate on the floor.

The evil spirits of hell must this day have been let loose, to urge the Tehran people to commit atrocities which I fancied human nature would have shrunk from.

Not content with foul dastardly murder,—not appeased by dipping their hands in the blood of so many unprotected persons, these worse than demons commenced an indiscriminate plunder. The gory carcases were stripped to the skin; in a state of nudity they were cast from the room into the open air, under horrid grins, laughter, and derision; one a-top of the other they were piled, forming a pyramid of human flesh, cemented by the blood oozing from their wounds!

Almighty God! can these acts go unpunished? I never supposed that the human frame contained so much liquid. The blood had gushed in streams from the bodies, covered the floor deeply, then found its way in a torrent into the court.

It was after mid-day that I reached my own quarters. Our servants, by explaining that the apartments were occupied by Mahomedans only, prevented the populace from breaking into them. They served also for a place of refuge to M. Maltzoff, the first secretary. His own rooms were widely separated from M. Grebayedoff's, and when the house was forcibly entered, he was unable to join his companions.

Frequent enquiries had been made by the townspeople in search of concealed members of the Russian Mission. By dint of entreaties, and the distribution of a large sum of money, M. Maltzoff induced some of the Shah's ferashes, and a small party of the Purahan infantry that had retired into our quarters, to attend to his safety. When the commotion had somewhat subsided, we sent information to the Prince Alli Shah that M. Maltzoff was alive. A company of infantry was in consequence ordered up to the house, under the pretext of taking charge of it; and, late in the evening, M. Maltzoff was dressed in the uniform of a Persian soldier, and marched in their ranks to the palace. This disguise was thought necessary to preserve him from the still unappeased fury of the populace.

His situation had been most perilous, since every corner and nook of the house, even by the light of candles, had been searched, which could have served as a place of concealment to any individual of the Russian Mission.

The system of extermination was so closely adhered to, that the mob invaded the premises of the British palace; they murdered there seven or eight Russians, lodged in the stables, and carried off the whole of the horses belonging to the envoy.

On the commencement of the attack, vain attempts were made by the order of the Shah to quell the disturbance.

Meerza Mahomed Alli Khan, with a number of his personal attendants, had, about the time of the seizure of Meerza Yakooob, hastened to the scene of action. His efforts were, from necessity, confined to urgent precautions and entreaties to those who were deaf to reason. The Nessuckchee Bashee, and several other officers of the court, were in succession dispatched to appease the riot; and lastly, the Princes Alli Shah and Imaum Wurdie Meerza issued from the ark, supported by such followers as they could hastily assemble. The innumerable multitude of the assailants prevented their near approach to the house. Instead of being able to succour the Mission, the Princes became justly alarmed for their own safety. They were reviled, menaced, and pelted. "Go," they said, to Alli Shah, "pander your wives to the Russians! It is worthy your long beard, on which you sprinkle so much rose-water. Your brother Abbas Meerza has sold himself, body and soul, to the Emperor!—Begone, Govraum Saug, or we will make mincemeat of you!"

The Princes were obliged to retire before a concourse of citizens, who drove them to the ark, the gates of which were manned, and speedily closed, to prevent the forced entrance of their pursuers.

I learnt from my domestics, that the mangled corpse of Meerza Yakooob had been dragged through the city and flung into the ditch of the ark. A body, supposed to be that of M. Grebayedoff, underwent simiar treatment. To the legs, ropes were attached, and a mock procession was put in movement, which moved along the principal streets and bazars of the city. A frantic mob formed the retinue, and at intervals voices exclaimed—"Make way, oh citizens! for the Russian ambassador on his way to visit the Shah! Stand up, out of respect; salute him in the Feringhee style, by taking off your caps. He is thirsty for the love you bear his master the Imperatoor—spit freely in his face!"

The body was in this manner pulled along the ground, and at last exposed to the public gaze before the rappook (flag-staff), in the open space before the principal gateway of the citadel. After dusk, it was removed, by the Prince-governor's orders, to the house of Mahomed Khan.

The night passed by without any further acts of violence; and on the morning, Kerim Khan, the Ferash Bashee, came to superintend the removal of the bodies. It was ascertained, that of the Russian Mission forty-four individuals had been put to death.

Search was made for the remains of M. Grebayedoff. His body was found amongst the heap of slain, before the window of his own apartment. I recognised his altered features, and was fully satisfied that, after death, the corpse had been subjected to no indignities. Armenian priests performed the last offices. The body was deposited in the church; the remains of the other sufferers were interred in a large pit, without the walls of the city.

Of the Telran people, it is said about twenty-six or twenty-seven were killed and wounded. Certainly, if a well-regulated posture of defence had been assumed, and if the whole of the retinue of the Mission had been assembled, many more of the assailants would have perished; under such circumstances, it is even probable that the attack would have been repulsed.

But who can avoid the decrees of fate, or venture to scrutinize the will of Providence?

JOCKE TAITTIS EXPEDITIOUNE TILL HELLE.

COMPILIT BEE MAISTER HOUERGE.

JOCKE TAITTE hee satte on yonne hille syde,
And wow but his herte wals sore,
For hee hadde weiped so long and loudde,
That hee cold weipe no more.

The scaldyng teris his chekis did smerte,
Quhille bathe his eene ranne dric;
The sobbis were bobbyng at his herte,
And his mouthe was sore awrie.

He toke his bonnette off his heide
And threwe it on the greine,
And aye he clawit his burlye powe,
And gair ane raire betweine:

"Och, woe is me," sayit the grefous youth,
"That evir I once wals borne,
For I haif lost my owne true lofe,
And myne herte is left forlorne!"

"I lofit hir better nor my breidde,
Far better than myne lyffe;
I would haif given this bullet heide
To haif halde hir for myne wyffe!"

"Sho wals the sonne-blink on the brae,
Als sweite and als deire to mee;
Far sweiter nor the lychte of daye
To the weiry waikryffe ee.

" Sho wals the raynbow among the cluddis,
The lyllye among the dewe,
The bonnye moorehenne amang the menne,
Of all the burdis that flewe.

" Ane roz-budde grewe withynne her mouthe,
Which manne colde nevir espye
But the breize out of the vernalle southie
Wals sweite quhan sho wals nighe.

" Sho wals the roz among the flouris,
The cherrie amang the hawis,
The starre of lofe amang the starris,
The sea-mawe 'mang the crawis.

" It wals hir power, it wals hir parte,
The soulis of men to thralle,
But, och ! she halde ane wycked herte,
And that was worst of alle !

" Sho garrit me waire myne pennye fee,
And nevir thochte it synne,
On sylken cloke of cramasie
To rowe her beautye in.

" Sho garrit me selle myne collye true,
My last lamb on the le,
To dekke her all in the skarlette hue,
Aue comelie sight to see ;

" And nowe the ende of all myne geire,
It grefeth mee to telle ;
It hathe sente my bonnye lasse to the deille ;
I woulde rather haif gone myselle !"

With that Jocke Taitte hee heerit ane lauche,
Some quhair abone his heide,
And hee lokit eiste, and hee lokit weste,
For his herte wals fillit with dreide ;

Hee lokit ower his lefte sholdere
To se quhat hee colde se ;
There he behelde the muckil deille
Comyng stendyng ower the le !

He wore ane boustrous shepherdis plaidde,
That wauffit als hee were wudde ;
And the blue bonnette on his heide
Wals lyke ane thonder cludde.

His lockis were lyke the hedder cowe,
And swarthy wals his hue,—
It wals of that derke and feirsum tinte, Betwene the blacke and blue.

In sothe he wals ane goustye galste
Als anie eye colde se,
And jollye mischieffe on his face
Wals prentit stamphishlye.

The shepherde wals astoundit sore,
And he courit him downe for feare :
" O quha are you, ye boustrous kairle,
Or quhatte are you selking heire ?"

" I am Gil-Moullis, the shepherdis deille,
And ane heavye chairge haif I,
For they are the moste rampaungent raice
That braithes benethe the skie.

" They thynke of wemyng nychte and daye,
And nothyng els thaye mynde,
Quhille theyre verrye soullis doe falle ane preye
To the lofe of womankynde.

" I wille not clayme the comelye daime
Which you galf owre to mee ;
For ane lychte recklesse deidde of shalme,
Myne scho wille nevir bee.

" But your kynde offir in hir plaice,
I taik with herte and hande,
For wee lyke to se ane shepherdis faice
Better nor alle the lande.

" I half wemyng enewe, of rozie hue,
Alle rathe and rubycounde ;
I cannot stirre myne fote at home,
Theyre numberis so abounde.

" But ane shepherdie is theyre greate delychte,
Theyre is none they lyke soe weille,
For he touzillis them bothe daye and nychte,
And garris them lauch and squeille.

" And hee syngis them queire and funnie sangis,
Which maikie theyre hertis fulle gladdie,
And tellis them melting tailles of lofe,
Which almalst puttis them madde."

Then the shepherdie clawit his burlie hede,
And girnit and leuche amayne,
And he pullit the fogge up fro the hille,
For he coulede not refrayne.

Quod he, " You are ane funnye deille,
Be more couthate'er you maye ;
Faythe I wolde lyke to se the jaddis,
And heire what theye walde saye !"

" I trowit als moche," sayit the muckelle deille,
" That garrit me come with spelede ;
For it is ane halme will suite you weille,
In all youre tymis of neidde.

" It wals maide for you, and you for it,
And monie more besyde ;
There is nathyng happenis in nature brade,
That wysdome can deryde."

Hee rowit the shepherdie in his plaidde,
And hee toke him on his backe
Als I wolde do ane poore blynde whalpe,
The lytteltest of the packe.

And awaye and awaye went the muckle deille,
Stryding ower hille and daille ;
It wals soche ane awsum sychte to se,
That the shepherdis herte did falle.

The mountains were his stepping stouls,
While far ower firthe and floode,
His bonnette bobbit yont the skle,
Ane derke and trobilit clude.

He walked lyke colonne sterke and stoure
On toppis of mountainis greinne;
For aye he spangit frae hille to hille,
Though twentye mylis betwinne.

And the frychtenit morefoulis fledde amayne
All shymmering on the wynde;
And the ptarmigandis theye lefte the heichte,
And nevir lokit behynde.

And ower the mountayne and the mayne
He helde his mychtie waye,
Quhille they lefte the daylychte far behynde,
And enterit ane twilychte graye.

And the sonne went downe into the Eiste,
And the mone into the mayne;
And the lyttill byrning lampis of hevin,
Theye vainishit ane bee ane.

At length theye calme to the deillis halle yette,
And tirlyt at the pynne,
And ane jollye porter openit the dore,
And smudgit als theye came in.

"Maistere Gill-Moullis," then sayit Jocke Taitte,
"Is this youre lustie haimc?
I will thanke you then to talke mee backe,
To the plaice fro whence I caime.

"For heire I cannot se ane styme,
And darre not gang for feirre;
But I heire the yelpc of womannis tungis,
Which I lyke welle tille heirre."

"Och!" sayit the deille, "the lychte is goode
Quhan heire a quhille you dwelle;
It is rather sombere at the fyrste,
But sutis exceedyng welle.

"For it is the bagnio of helle,
Ane braif and gallante plaice,
The grandiste gaimc that evir wals fraimit
For synneris of human ralce.

"For wee haif kyngis, and dukis, and lordis,
That daylie come in pairis;
But the jollye shepherdis and the prestis
Are our best customeris.

"'Tis strainge wee haif no ladyis heire,
Scairce one our hallis withynne;
Thes are alle pryncsessis and quenis,
And lymmeris of vulgar kynne.

"But you shalle find them loffyng and kynde,
Rychte blythesum, franks, and fre,
And aye the longer you love them,
The madder in love you'll bee."

"Coulede I but se," the shepherde sayit,
 "To maikie myne choyce arycht,
 This is the very plaice for mee,
 In which I wolde delychte."

Then the deille he flung the shepherde downe
 Als hee were ane deidde sheippe,
 And hee lychtit on ane feddir bedde,
 Betweine two queanis asleippe.

But hee colde not se quhat theye were lyke,
 So up he sprang withe speidde;
 But he hearit them gigglyng, als he ranne
 In darknesse and in dreidde.

Hee spyit the Lord of — suppyng
 His kaille out throughe the reike,
 And the doughtye chieftaine of M——
 Wals playing at hydde-and-seike.

And he sawe the lordis and lemanis gaye
 Syttand bebbyng at the wyne,
 And aye theye dronke theyre merrye tostis
 With oggylle and with sygne.

And everilke draughte they swallowit downe
 More greidillye nor the fyrste;
 For aye the langer that theye dronke,
 The hotter grewe theyre thyrste.

Enjoymente there brought no alloie,
 Desyre stille waikyt anewe;
 The more that theye indulgit in synne,
 The madder on synne theye grewe.

For mony a yeirre and mony a daye
 Our shepherde did remayne;
 But nought of pleissure caime his waye
 But quhat grewe byttere payne.

For he wals fairlye stawit of lofe—
 Of routte and revelrye;
 Hee haitit the wemyng from his soull,
 Yet colde not let them bee.

And hee thocht upon his owne firste lofe
 With alle his earlye flaime,
 Who though she had fallen in ane snaire,
 Hir herte wals nevir to blaine.

And ofte he sayit unto himselle,
 Withe the teirre blynding his ee,
 "Och had I hir on the greine hille syde,
 And nevir ane eye to se!

" 'Tis sweitte to se the lasse we lyke
 Come lynking ower the le;
 'Tis sweitte to se the earlye budde
 First nodding fro the tre;

" 'Tis sweitte to se the mornying belme
 Kyssing the sylver dewe;
 But forgiveness is the sweeteste thyng
 That evir ane kynde herte knewe.

" Yes, I wolde kysse her blushyng chelke,
And grante forgiveness free;
For if I dinna forgive myne lofe,
Then quha can pardon mee ?

" But heirre may I in shaine and synne
For evir more remayne,
For I'll nēvir se the greine hille syde,
Nor my true lofe agayne !

" Bay-hay ! bay-hay !" quod the shepherde lad,
Als loude als he coulede raire;
And " Bouff !—houff !" quod his colley dogge,
For it wonderit quhat wals there.

The shepherde started to his feitte
In terroure and in teene;
For hee laye upon the greine hille syde,
Nor farder had evir beine.

He soughte his lofe that verye nychte,
And at his calle sho caime,
And hee toulde hir of his dreidful dreime
Of sorrow, synne, and shaine.

And hir wee errour with the lairde
Wals alle forgiven fre;
And I wals at theyre weddyng yestreinne,
And ane merrie nycht hald wee !

ALTRIVE LAKE, 18th August, 1830.

THE HOUR OF THOUGHT.

BY DELTA.

THE orb of day is sinking,
The star of eve is winking,
The silent dews
Their balm diffuse,
The summer flowers are drinking;
The valley shades grow drearer,
The atmosphere grows clearer,
Around all swim,
Perplex'd and dim,
Yet the distant hills seem nearer,—
O'er their tops the eye may mark
The very leaves, distinct and dark.

Now eastern skies are lightening,
Wood, mead, and mount are brightening,
Sunk in the blaze
The stellar rays,
The clouds of heaven are whitening;
Now the curfew-bell is ringing,
Now the birds forsake their singing,
The beetle fly
Hums dully by,
And the bat his flight is winging;
While the glowing, glorious moon,
Gives to night the smile of noon.

Oh! then in churchyards hoary,
 With many a mournful story,
 'Tis sweet to stray,
 Mid tombstones gray,
 And muse on earthly glory!
 Thoughts—deeds—and days departed,
 Up from the past are started,
 Time's noon and night,
 Its bloom and blight,
 Hopes crown'd with bliss, or thwarted;
 Halcyon peace or demon strife,
 Sweetening or disturbing life.

Then wake the dreams of childhood,
 Its turbulent or mild mood—
 The gather'd shells,
 The fox-glove bells,
 The bird-nest in the wild wood;
 The corn fields greenly springing;
 The twilight blackbird singing
 Sweetly, unseen,
 From chestnut green,
 Till all the air is ringing;
 Restless swallows twittering by,
 And the gorgeous sunset sky.

Then while the moon is glancing,
 Through murmuring foliage dancing,
 Wild fancy strays
 Amid the maze
 Of olden times entrancing;—
 She scans each strange tradition
 Of dim-eyed Superstition,—
 The monk in hood
 With book and rood,
 And Nun in cell'd contrition;
 Horsemen winding through the dale,
 Morious dark, and shining mail.

Ah! where are they that knew us,
 That then spake kindly to us?
 Why thus should they
 In evil day
 So frigidly eschew us?
 We call them—they appear not;
 They listen not, they hear not;
 Their course is run;
 Their day is done;
 They hope not, and they fear not:
 Past for them are heat and cold,
 Death hath penn'd them in his fold!

 Wild flowers and weeds are growing,
 By moon or sun
 Is nothing done
 To them a thought bestowing:
 In dark repose they wither,
 Like weeds blown hither—thither—
 Alone, alone,
 The Last Trump's tone
 Shall call them up together.
 Thou shalt hear it, Silence drear!
 Grave oblivious, thou shalt hear!

A DAY AT WINDERMERE.

OLD and gouty, we are confined to our chair; and occasionally, during an hour of rainless sunshine, are wheeled by female hands along the gravel-walks of our Policy, an unrepinning and philosophical valetudinarian. Even the crutch is laid up in ordinary, and is encircled with cobwebs. A monstrous spider has there set up his rest; and our still Study ever and anon hearkens to the shrill buzz of some poor fly expiring between those formidable forceps—just as so many human ephemerals have breathed their last beneath the bite of his indulgent master. 'Tis pleasant to look at Domitian—so we love to call him—sallying from the centre against a wearied wasp, lying, like a silkworm, circumvoluted in the inextricable toils, and then, seizing the sinner by the nape of the neck, like Christopher with a Cockney, to see the emperor haul him away into the charnel-house. But we have often less savage recreations:—such as watching our bee-hives when about to send forth colonies—feeding our pigeons, a purple people that dazzle the daylight—gathering roses as they choke our small chariot-wheels with their golden orbs—eating grapes out of vine-leaf-draperyed baskets beautifying beneath the gentle fingers of the Gentle into fairy network graceful as the gossamer—drinking elder-flower frontiniae from invisible glasses, so transparent in its yellowness seems the liquid radiance—at one moment eyeing a page of Paradise Lost, and at another of Paradise Regained, for what else is the face of her who often visiteth our Eden, and whose coming and whose going is ever like a heavenly dream! Then laying back our head upon the cushion of our triumphal car, and with half-shut eyes, subsiding slowly into haunted sleep or slumber, with our fine features up to heaven, a saint-like image, such as Raphael loved to paint, or Flaxman to embue with the soul of stillness in the life-lushed marble. Such, dearest reader, are some of our pastimes—and so do we contrive to close our ears to the sound of the scythe of Saturn, ceaselessly sweeping over the earth, and leaving, at every stride of the mower, a swathe more rueful than ever, after a night of shipwreck, did strew with ghastliness a lee sea-shore!

Thus do we make a virtue of necessity—and thus contentment wreathes with silk and velvet the prisoner's chains. Once were we—long, long ago—restless as a sunbeam on the restless wave—rapid as a river that seems enraged with the rocks, but all the while, you blockhead—(beg your pardon)—in love strong as a steed let loose from Arab's tent in the oasis to slake his thirst at the desert well—fierce in our harmless joy as a red-deer belling on the hills—tameless as the eagle sporting in the storm—gay as the “dolphin on a tropic sea”—“mad as young bulls”—and wild as a whole wilderness of adolescent lions. But now—alas! and alack-a-day! the sunbeam is but a patch of sober verdure—the river is changed into a canal—the “desert-born” is foundered—the red-deer is slow as an old ram—the eagle has forsook his cliff and his clouds, and hops among the gooseberry bushes—the dolphin has degenerated into a land-tortoise—without danger now might a very child take the bull by the horns—and though something of a lion still, our roar is, like that of the nightingale, “most musical most melancholy”—and, as we attempt to shake our mane, your grandmother—fair subscriber—cannot choose but weep!

It speaks folios in favour of our philanthropy, to know that, in our own imprisonment, we love to see all life free as air. Would that by a word of ours we could clothe all human shoulders with wings! Would that by a word of ours we could plume all human spirits with thoughts strong as the eagle's pinions, that they might winnow their way into the empyrean! Tories! Yes! we are Tories. Our faith is in the Divine right of kings,—but easy, my boys, easy—all free men are kings, and they hold their empire from heaven. That is our political—philosophical—moral—religious creed. In its spirit we have lived—and in its spirit we hope to die—not on the scaffold like Sidney—no—no—not by any manner of means like Sidney on the scaffold—but like ourselves on a hair-mattress above a feather-bed, our head decently sunk in three pillows and one bolster, and our frame stretched out unagitatedly beneath a white counterpane! But meanwhile—though almost as unlocomotive as the dead—in body—there is perpetual motion in our souls. Sleep is one thing, and stagnation is another—as is well known to all eyes that have ever seen, by moonlight and midnight, the face of Christopher North, or of Windermere.

Windermere! Why, at this blessed moment, we behold the beauty of all its intermingling isles! There they are—all gazing down on their own reflected loveliness in the magic mirror of the air-like water, just as many a holy time we have seen them all agaze, when, with suspended oar and suspended breath—no sound but a ripple on the Naiad's bow, and a beating at our own heart—motionless in our own motionless bark—we seemed to float midway down that beautiful abyss, between the heaven above and the heaven below, on some strange terrestrial scene composed of trees and the shadows of trees by the imagination made indistinguishable to the eye, and as delight deepened into dreams, all lost at last, clouds, groves, water, air, sky, in their various and profound confusion of supernatural peace! But a sea-born breeze is on Bowness Bay; all at once the lake is blue as the sky; and that evanescent world is felt to have been but a vision. Like swans that had been asleep in the airless sunshine, lo! where from every shady nook appear the white-sailed pinnares! For on merry Windermere—you must know—every breezy hour has its own Regatta!

But intending to be useful, we are becoming ornamental; of this article it must not be said, that therefore, let us be simple, but not silly, as plain as is possible without being prosy, as instructive as is consistent with being entertaining, a cheerful companion and a trusty guide.

We shall suppose that you have left Kendal, and are on your way to Bowness. Forget, as much as may be, all worldly cares and anxieties, and let your hearts be open and free to all genial impulses about to be breathed into them from the beautiful and sublime in nature. There is no need of that foolish state of feeling called enthusiasm. You have but to be happy; and by and by your happiness will grow into delight. The blue mountains already set your imaginations at work; among those clouds and mists, you fancy many a magnificent precipice—and in the valleys that sleep below, you image to yourselves the scenery of rivers and lakes. The landscape immediately around gradually grows more and more picturesque and romantic; and you feel that you are on the very borders of Fairy-Land. The first smile of Windermere salutes your impatient eyes, and sinks silently into your heart. You know not how beautiful it may be—nor yet in what the beauty consists; but your finest sensibilities to nature are touched—and a tinge of poetry, as from a rainbow, overspreads that cluster of islands that seems to woo you to their still retreats. And now with all its bays and promontories, lies in the morning light serene as a Sabbath, and cheerful as a Holiday; and you feel that there is loveliness on this earth more exquisite and perfect than ever visited your slumbers even in the glimpses of a dream. The first sight of such a scene will be unforgotten to your dying day—for such passive impressions are deeper than we can explain—our whole spiritual being is suddenly awakened to receive them—and associations, swift as light, are gathered into one Emotion of Beauty which shall be imperishable, and which, often as memory recalls that moment, grows into genius, and vents itself in appropriate expressions, each in itself a picture. Thus may one moment minister to years; and the life-wearied heart of old age, by one delightful remembrance, be restored to primal joy—the glory of the past brought beamingly upon the faded present—and the world that is obscurely passing away from our eyes, re-illuminated with the visions of its early morn. The shows of nature are indeed evanescent, but their spiritual influences are immortal; and from that grove now glowing in the sunlight, may your heart derive a delight that shall utterly perish but in the grave!

But now you are in the White Lion, and our advice to you—perhaps unnecessary—is immediately to order breakfast. There are many parlours—some with a charming prospect, and some without any prospect at all; but remember that there are other people in the world besides yourselves,—and therefore, into whatever parlour you may be shewn by a pretty maid, be contented, and lose no time in addressing yourselves to your repast. That over, be in no hurry to get on the Lake. Perhaps all the boats are engaged—and Billy Balmer is at the Waterhead. So stroll into the churchyard, and take a glance over the graves. Close to the oriel-window of the church is one tomb over which one might meditate half an autumnal day! Enter the church, and you will feel the beauty of these fine lines in the Excursion—

“ Not raised in nice proportions was the pile,
But large and massy; for duration built;
With pillars crowded, and the roof upheld
By naked rafters extricately cross'd,
Like leafless underboughs, mid some thick grove,
All wither'd by the depth of shade above!”

Go down to the low terrace-walk along the Bay. The Bay is in itself a Lake, at all times cheerful with its scattered fleet, at anchor or under weigh—its villas and cottages, each rejoicing in its garden or orchard—its meadows mellowing to the reedy margin of the pellucid water—its heath-covered boat-houses—its own portion of the Isle called Beautiful—and beyond that silvan haunt, the sweet Furness Fells, with gentle outline undulating in the sky, and among its spiral larches shewing, here and there, groves and copses of the old unviolated woods. Yes, Bowness-Bay is in itself a Lake; but how finely does it blend away, through its screens of oak and sycamore-trees, into a larger Lake—another, yet the same—on whose blue bosom you see bearing down to windward—for the morning breeze is born—many a tiny sail! It has the appearance of a race. Yes—it is a race; and the Liver-poolian, as of yore, is eating them all out of the wind, and without another tack will make her anchorage. But hark—Music! 'Tis the Bowness Band playing “See the conquering Hero comes!”—and our old friend has carried away the gold cup from all competitors.

Now turn your faces up the hill above the village school. That green mount is what is called a—Station. The villagers are admiring a grove of parasols, while you—the party—are admiring the village—with its irregular roofs—white, blue, grey, green, brown, and black walls—fruit-laden trees so yellow—its central church-tower—and environing groves variously burnished by autumn. Saw ye ever banks and braes and knolls so beautifully bedropt with human dwellings? There is no solitude about Windermere. Shame on human nature, were Paradise uninhabited! Here, in amicable neighbourhood, are halls and huts—here rises through groves the dome of the rich man's palace,—and there the low roof of the poor man's cottage beneath its one single sycamore! Here are hundreds of small properties hereditary in the same families for many hundred years—and never, never, O Westmoreland! may thy race of statesmen be extinct—nor the virtues that ennoble their humble households! See, suddenly brought forth by sunshine from among the old woods—and then sinking away into her usual unobtrusive serenity—the lake-loving Rayrig, almost level, so it seems, with the water, yet smiling over her own quiet bay from the grove-shelter of her pastoral mound! Within her walls may peace ever dwell with piety—and the light of science long blend with the lustre of the domestic hearth. Thence to Calgarth is all one forest—yet glade-broken, and enlivened by open uplands, so that the roamer, while he expects a night of umbrage, often finds himself in the open day, beneath the bright blue bow of heaven haply without a cloud. The eye travels delighted over the multitudinous tree-tops—often dense as one single tree—till it rests, in sublime satisfaction, on the far-off mountains, that lose not a woody character, till the tree-sprinkled pastures roughen into rocks—and rocks tower into precipices, where the falcons breed. But the lake will not suffer the eye long to wander among the distant glooms. She wins us wholly to herself—and restlessly and passionately for a while—but calmly and affectionately at last—the heart embraces all her beauty, and wishes that the vision might endure for ever, and that here our tent were pitched—to be struck no more during our earthly pilgrimage! Imagination lapses into a thousand moods. O for a fairy pinnace to glide and float for aye over those golden waves! A hermit-cell on sweet Lady-Holm! A silvan shieling on Loughrig side! A nest in that nameless dell, which sees but one small slip of heaven, and longs at night for the reascending visit of its few loving stars! A dwelling open to all the skyey influence on the mountain-brow, the darling of the rising or the setting sun, and often seen by eyes in the lower world glittering through the rainbow!

All this seems a very imperfect picture indeed, or panorama of Windermere, from the hill behind the schoolhouse in the village of Bowness. So, to put a stop to such nonsense, let us descend to the White Lion—and enquire about Billy Balmer. Billy has arrived from Waterhead—seems tolerably steady—Mr Ullock's boats may be trusted—so let us take a voyage of discovery on the Lake. Let those who have reason to think that they have been born to die a different death from drowning, hoist a sail. We to-day shall feather an oar. Billy takes the stroke—Mr William Garnet's at the helm—and "row, vassals, row! for the pride of the Lowlands," is the choral song that accompanies the Naiad out of the bay, and round the north end of the Isle called Beautiful, under the wave-darkening umbrage of that ancient oak. And now we are in the lovely straits between that Island and the mainland of Furness Fells. The village has disappeared, but not melted away; for, hark! the church-tower tolls ten, —and see the sun is high in heaven. High, but not hot—for the first September frosts chilled the rosy fingers of the morn as she bathed them in the dews, and the air is cool as a cucumber. Cool but bland—and as clear and transparent as a fine eye lighted up by a good conscience. There were breezes in Bowness Bay—but here there are none—or, if there be, they but whisper aloft in the tree-tops, and ruffle not the water, which is calm as Louisa's breast. The small isles here are but few in number—yet the best arithmetician of the party cannot count them—in confusion so rich and rare do they blend their shadows with those of the groves on the Isle called Beautiful, and on the Furness Fells! A tide imperceptible to the eye, drifts us on among and above those beautiful reflections—that downward world of hanging dreams! and ever and anon we beckon unto Billy gently to dip his oar, that we may see a world destroyed and recreated in one moment of time. Yes! Billy! thou art a poet—and canst work more wonders with thine oar than could he with his pen who painted "heavenly Una with her milk-white lamb," wandering by herself in Fairy-Land. How is it, pray, that our souls are satiated with such beauty as this? Is it because 'tis unsubstantial all—senseless, though fair—and in its evanescence unsuited to the sympathies that yearn for the permanencies of breathing life? Dreams are delightful only as delusions within the delusion of this our mortal waking existence—one touch of what we call reality dissolves them all—blissful though they may have been, we care not when the bubble bursts—nay, we are glad again to return to our own natural world, care-haunted, though, in its happiest moods, it be—glad as if we had escaped from glamoury—and, oh! beyond expression sweet it is once more to drink the light of living eyes—the music of living lips—after that preternatural hush that steepes the shadowy realms of the imagination, whether stretching along a sunset-heaven, or the mystical imagery of earth and sky floating in the lustre of lake or sea.

rowing is a thirsty exercise, let us land at the Ferry, and each man refresh himself with a horn of ale.

There is not a prettier place on all Windermere than the Ferry-House, or one better adapted for a honeymoon. You can hand your bride into a boat almost out of the parlour window, and be off among the islands in a moment, or into nook or bay where no prying eye, even through telescope, (a most unwarrantable instrument,) can overlook your happiness; or you can secrete yourselves, like buck and doe, among the lady-fern on Furness Fells, where not a sunbeam can intrude on your sacred privacy, and where you may melt down hours to moments in chaste connubial bliss, brightening futurity with plans of domestic enjoyment, like long lines of lustre streaming across the lake. But at present, let us visit the Fort-looking Building among the cliffs, called The Station, and see how Windermere looks as we front the east. Why, you would not know it to be the same lake. The Isle called Beautiful, which heretofore had scarcely seemed an isle, appearing to belong to one or other shore of the mainland, from this point of view is an isle indeed, loading the lake with a weight of beauty, and giving it an ineffable character of richness which nowhere else does it possess, while the other lesser isles, dropt "in nature's careless haste" between it and the Furness Fells, connect it still with those lovely shores from which it floats a short way apart, without being disunited—one spirit blending the whole together within the compass of a fledgling's flight. Beyond these

" Sister isles that smile
Together like a happy family
Of beauty and of love,"

the eye meets the Rayrig-woods, with but a gleam of water between, only visible in sunshine, and is gently conducted by them up the hills of Appletwhaite diversified with cultivated enclosures "all green as emerald," to their very summits, with all their pastoral and arable grounds besprinkled with stately single trees, copses, or groves. On the nearer side of these hills is seen, stretching far off to other lofty regions—Hill-bell and High-street conspicuous over the rest—the long vale of Troutbeck, with its picturesque cottages, in "numbers without number, numberless," and all its sable pines and sycamores—on the farther side, that most silvan of all silvan mountains, where lately the Heinans warbled her native wood-notes wild in her poetic bower, fitly called Dovenest, and beyond, Kirkstone Fells and Rydal Head, magnificent giants looking westward to the Langdale Pikes, (here unseen,)

" The last that parley with the setting sun."

Immediately in front, the hills are low and lovely, sloping with gentle undulations down to the lake, here grove-girdled along all its shores. The elm-grove that overshadows the Parsonage is especially conspicuous—stately and solemn in a green old age—and though now silent, in spring and early summer clamorous with rooks in love or alarm, an ancient family, and not to be expelled from their hereditary seats. Following the line of shore to the right, and turning your eyes unwillingly away from the bright and breezy Belfield, they fall on the elegant architecture of Storrs-hall, gleaming from a glade in the thick woods, and still looking southward, they see a serene series of the same forest scenery, along the heights of Gillhead and Gummer's-How, till Windermere is lost, apparently narrowed into a river, beyond Townhead and Fellfoot, where the prospect is closed by a beaoned eminence clothed with shadowy trees to the very base of the Tower. The points and promontories jutting into the lake from these and the opposite shores—which are of a humbler, though not tame character—are all placed most felicitously—and as the lights and shadows keep shifting on the water, assume endless varieties of relative position to the eye, so that often during one short hour, you might think you had been gazing on Windermere with a kaleidoscopic eye that had seemed to create the beauty which in good truth is floating there for ever on the bosom of nature.

That description, perhaps, is not so very much amiss; but should you think otherwise, be so good as give us a better—meanwhile let us descend from The Station—and its stained windows—stained into setting sunlight—frost and snow—the purpling autumn—and the first faint vernal green—and re-embark at the Ferry-House pier. Berkshire Island is fair—but we have always looked at it with an evil eye since unable to weather it in our old schooner, one day when the Victory, on the same tack, shot by it to windward like a salmon. But now we are half-way between Storr's Point and Rawlinson's Nab—so, my dear Garnet, down with the helm and let us put about (who is that catching crabs?) for a fine front view of the Grecian edifice. It does honour to the genius of Gandy—and say what people choose of a classic clime, the light of a Westmoreland sky falls beautifully on that marble-like stone, which, whether the heavens be in gloom or glory, “shines well where it stands,” and flings across the lake a majestic shadow. Methought there passed along the lawn the image of one now in his tomb! The memory of that bright day returns, when Windermere glittered with all her sails in honour of the great Northern Minstrel, and of him the Eloquent, whose lips are now mute in the dust. Methinks we see his smile benign—that we hear his voice silver-sweet!

as such thoughts came like shadows, like shadows let them depart—and spite of that which happeneth to all men—“this one day we give to merriment.” Pull, Billy, pull—or we will turn you round—and in that case there is no refreshment nearer than Newby-bridge. The Naiad feels the invigorated impulse—and her cut-water murmurs to the tune of six knots through the tiny cataract foaming round her bows. The woods are all running down the lake—and at that rate, by two post meridiem will be in the sea.

Commend us—on a Tour—to lunch and dinner in one. 'Tis a saving both of time and money—and of all the dinner-lunches that ever were set upon a sublunary table, the facile principes are the dinner-lunches you may devour in the White Lion, Bowness. Take a walk—and a seat on the green that overlooks the village, almost on a level with the lead-roof of the venerable church—while Hebe is laying the cloth for a repast fit for Jove, Juno, and the other heathen gods and goddesses—and if you must have politics—why, call for the Standard or Sun, (Heavens! there is that Whig already at the Times,) and devote a few hurried and hungry minutes to the new French Revolution. Why, the Green of all Greens—often traced by us of yore beneath the midnight moonlight—till a path was worn along the edge of the low wall, still called “North's Walk”—is absolutely converted into a reading-room, and our laking party into a political club. There is Louisa with the Leeds Intelligencer—and Matilda with the Morning Herald—and Harriet with that York paper worth them all put together—for it tells of Priam, and the Cardinal, and St Nicholas,—but, hark! a soft footstep! And then a soft voice—no dialect or accent pleasanter than the Westmoreland—whispers that the dinner-lunch is on the table—and no leading article like a cold round of beef—or a veal-pie! Let the Parisians settle their Constitution as they will—meanwhile let us strengthen ours—and after a single glass of Madeira—and a horn of home-brewed—let us off on foot—on horseback—in gig—car—and chariot—to Troutbeck.

It is about a couple of miles, we should think, from Bowness to Cook's House—along the turnpike road—half the distance lying embowered in the Rayrig woods—and half open to lake, cloud, and sky. It is pleasant to lose sight now and then of the lake along whose banks you are travelling, especially if during separation you become a Druid. The water woos you at your return with her bluest smile, and her whitest murmur. Some of the finest trees in all the Rayrig woods have had the good sense to grow by the roadside, where they can see all that is passing, and make their own observations on us deciduous plants. Few of them seem to be very old—much older than Christopher North—and, like him, they wear well, trunk sound to the core, arms with a long sweep, and head in fine proportions of cerebral development, fortified against all storms—perfect pictures of oaks in their prime. You may see one—without looking for it—near a farmhouse called Miller-ground—himself a grove. His trunk is clothed in a tunic of moss, which shews the ancient Silvan to great advantage—and it would be no easy matter to give him a fall. Should you wish to see Windermere in all her glory, you have but to enter a gate a few yards on this side of his shade, and ascend an eminence called by us Green-bank—but you had as well leave your red mantle in the carriage, for an enormous white, long-horned Lancashire bull has for some years established his head-quarters there, and you would not wish your wife to become a widow, with six fatherless children. But the royal road of poetry is often the most splendid—and by keeping the turnpike, you soon find yourself on a terrace to which there was nothing to compare in the hanging gardens of Babylon. There is the widest breadth of water—the richest foreground of wood—and the most magnificent back-ground of mountains—not only in Westmoreland, but—believe us—in all the world. That blue roof is Calgarth—and no traveller ever pauses on this brow without giving it a blessing—for the sake of the Illustrious Dead—for there long dwelt in the body Bishop Watson, the Defender of the Faith, and there within the shadow of his memory still dwell those dearest on earth to his beatified spirit. So pass along in high and solemn thought, till you lose sight of Calgarth in the lone-road that leads by St Catherine's, and then relapse into pleasant fancies and picturesque dreams. This is the best way by far of approaching Troutbeck. No ups and downs in this life were ever more enlivening—not even the ups and downs of a bird learning to fly. Sheep-fences, seven feet high, are admirable contrivances for shutting out scenery; and by shutting out much scenery, why, you confer an unappreciable value on the little that remains visible, and feel as if you could hug it to your heart. But sometimes one does feel tempted to shove down a few roods of intercepting stone-wall higher than the horse-hair on a cuirassier's casque—though sheep should eat the suckers and scions, protected as they there shoot, at the price of the concealment of the picturesque and the poetical from beauty-searching eyes. That is a long lane, it is said, which has never a turning; so, this must be a short one, which has a hundred. You have turned your back on Windermere—and our advice to you is, to keep your face to the mountains. Troutbeck is a jewel—a diamond of a stream—but Bobbin-mills have exhausted some of the most lustrous pools, changing them into shallows, where the minnows rove. Deep dells are his delight—and he loves the rugged scaurs that intrench his wooded banks—and the fantastic rocks that tower-like hang at intervals over his winding course, and seem sometimes to block it up—but the miner works his way out beneath galleries and arches in the living stone—sometimes silent—sometimes singing—and sometimes roaring like thunder—till subsiding into a placid spirit, ere he reaches the wooden-bridge in the bonny holms of Calgarth, he glides graceful as the swan that sometimes sees its image in his breast, and through alder and willow banks murmurs away his life in the Lake.

Yes—that is Troutbeck Chapel—one of the smallest—and to our eyes the very simplest—of all the chapels among the hills. Yet will it be remembered when more pretending edifices are forgotten—just like some mild, sensible, but perhaps somewhat too silent person, whose acquaintanceship—nay, friendship—we feel a wish to cultivate—we scarce know why—except that he is mild, sensible, and silent—whereas we would not be civil to the brusque, upsetting, and loquacious puppy at his elbow, whose information is as various as it is profound, were one word or look of courtesy to save him from the flames. For heaven's sake, Louisa, don't sketch Troutbeck Chapel! There is nothing but a square tower—a horizontal roof—and some perpendicular walls. The outlines of the mountains here have no specific character. That bridge is but a poor feature—and the stream here very commonplace. Put them not on paper. Yet alive—is not the secluded scene felt to be most beautiful? It has a soul. The pure spirit of the pastoral age is breathing here—in this utter noiselessness there is the oblivion of all turmoil—and as the bleating of flocks comes on the ear, along the fine air, from the green pastures of the Kentmere range of soft undulating hills, the stilled heart whispers to itself “this is peace!”

The worst of it is, that of all the people that on earth do dwell, your Troutbeck statesmen are the most litigious—and most quarrelsome about straws. Not a footpath in all the parish that has not cost a hundred pounds in lawsuits. The most insignificant stile is referred to a full bench of magistrates. That gate was carried to the Quarter Sessions. No branch of a tree can shoot six inches over a march-wall without being indicted for a trespass. And should a frost-loosened stone tumble from some skrees down upon a neighbour's field, he will be served with a notice to quit before next morning. Many of the small properties hereabouts have been mortgaged over head and ears to fee rascally attorneys. Yet the last hoop of apples will go to the land-sharks—and the statesman, driven at last from his paternal fields, will sue for something or another in forma pauperis, were it but the worthless wood and second-hand nails that may be destined for his coffin. This is a pretty picture of pastoral life—but we must take pastoral life as we find it. Nor have we any doubt that things were every whit as bad in the time of the Patriarchs—else, whence the satirical sneer, “sham Abraham?” Yonder is the Village straggling away up along the hillside, till the farthest house seems a rock fallen with trees from the mountain. The cottages stand for the most part in clusters of twos or threes—with here and there what in Scotland we should call a clachan—many a sma' toun within the ae lang toun—but where in all braid Scotland is a mile-long scattered congregation of rural dwellings, all dropt down where the Painter and the Poet would have wished to plant them, on knolls, and in dells, and on banks and braes, and below tree-crested rocks, and all bound together in picturesque confusion, by old groves of ash, oak, and sycamore, and by flower-gardens and fruit-orchards, rich as those of the Hesperides?

If you have no objections—our pretty dears—we shall return to Bowness by Lowood. Let us form a straggling line of march—so that we may one and all indulge in our own silent fancies—and let not a word be spoken—virgins—under the penalty of two kisses for one syllable—till we crown the height above Briary-Close. Why, there it is already—and we hear our musical friend's voice-accompanied guitar. From the front of his cottage, the head and shoulders of Windermere are seen in their most majestic shape—and from nowhere else is the long-withdrawing Langdale so magnificently closed by mountains. There at sunset hangs “Clondland, Gorgeous-land,” to gaze on which for an hour might almost make a Sewell Stokes a Poetaster. Who said that Windermere was too narrow? The same critic who thinks the full harvest moon too round—and despises the twinkling of the evening star. It is all the way down—from head to foot—from the Brathay to the Leven—of the proper breadth precisely—to a quarter of an inch. Were the reeds in Poolwyke Bay—on which the birds love to balance themselves—at low or high water, to be visibly longer or shorter than what they have always been in the habit of being on such occasions, since first we brushed them with an oar, when landing in our skiff from the Endeavour, the beauty of the whole of Windermere would be impaired—so exquisitely adapted is that pellucid gleam to the lips of its silvan shores! True, there are flaws in the diamond—but only when the squalls came—and as the blackness sweeps by, that diamond of the first water is again sky-bright and sky-blue, as an angel's eyes. Lowood Bay—we are now embarked in Mr Jackson's prettiest pinnacle—when the sun is westerling—which it now is—surpasses all other bays in freshwater Mediterraneans. Eye loves to see her pensive face reflected in that serenest mirror. To flatter such a divinity is impossible—but sure she never wears a smile so divine as when adjusting her dusky tresses in that truest of all glasses, set in the chastest of all rich frames. Pleased she retires—with a wavering motion—and casting “many a longing, lingering look behind”— fades indistinctly away among the Brathay woods; while Night, her elder sister, or rather her younger—we really know not which—takes her place at the darkening mirror, till it glitters with her crescent-moon-crown, wreathed perhaps with a white cloud, and just over the silver bow the lustre of one large yellow star.

As none of the party complain of hunger—let us crack among us a single bottle of our worthy host's choice old Madeira—and then haste in the barouche (ha! here it is) to Bowness. It is right now to laugh—and sing—and recite poetry—and talk all manner of nonsense. Didn't ye hear something crack? (Can it be a spring—or merely the axletree? Our clerical friend from Chester assures us 'twas but a string of his guitar—so no more shrieking—and after coffee we shall have

And then we two, my dear sir, must have a contest at chess—at which, if you beat us, we shall leave our bed at midnight, and murder you in your sleep. “But where,” murmurs Matilda, “are we going?” To Oresthead, love,—and Elleray—for you must see a sight these sweet eyes of thine never saw before—a scENER.

We have often wondered if there be in the world one woman indisputably and undeniably the most beautiful of all women—or if, indeed, our first Mother were “the loveliest of her daughters, Eve.” What human female beauty is all men feel—but few men know—and none can tell—farther than that it is perfect spiritual health, breathingly embodied in perfect corporeal flesh and blood, according to certain god-framed adaptations of form and hue, that, by a familiar, yet inscrutable mystery, to our senses and our souls express sanctity and purity of the immortal essence enshrined within, by aid of all associated perceptions and emotions that the heart and the imagination can agglomerate round them as instantly and as unhesitatingly as the faculties of thought and feeling can agglomerate round a lily or a rose, for example, the perceptions and emotions that make them—by divine right of inalienable beauty—the Royal Families of Flowers. This definition—or description rather—of human female beauty, may appear to some, as indeed it appears to us—something vague; but all profound truths—out of the exact sciences—are something vague; and it is manifestly the design of a benign and gracious Providence, that they should be so till the end of time—till mortality has put on immortality—and earth is heaven. Vagueness, therefore, is no fault in philosophy—any more than in the dawn of morning, or the gloaming of eve. Enough, if each clause of the sentence that seeks to elucidate a confessed mystery, has a meaning harmonious with all the meanings in all the other clauses—and that the effect of the whole taken together is musical—and a tune. Then it is Truth. For all Falsehood is dissonant—and verity is concert. It is our faith, that the souls of some women are angelic—or nearly so—by nature and the Christian religion—and that the faces and persons of some women are angelic—or nearly so—whose souls, nevertheless, are seen to be far otherwise—and, on that discovery, beauty fades or dies. But may not soul and body—spirit and matter—meet in perfect union—at birth; and grow together into a creature, though of spiritual mould, “beautiful exceedingly,” as Eve before the Fall? Such a creature—such creatures—may have been—but the question is—did you ever see one? We almost think that we have; but

“She is dedde,
Gone to her death-bedde
All under the willow-tree,” and it may be that her image in the moonlight of memory and imagination, may be more perfectly beautiful than she herself ever was, when

“Upprew that living flower beneath our eye.”

Yes—’tis thus that we form to ourselves—incommunicably within our souls—what we choose to call Ideal Beauty—that is, a life-in-death image or Eidolon of a Being whose voice was once heard, and whose footsteps once wandered among the flowers of this earth. But it is a mistake to believe that such beauty as this can visit the soul only after the original in which it once breathed is dead.

For as it can only be seen by profoundest passion—and the profoundest are the passions of Love, and Pity, and Grief—why may not each and all of these passions—when we consider the constitution of this world and this life—be awakened in their utmost height and depth by the sight of living beauty, as well as by the memory of the dead? To do so is surely within “the reachings of our souls,”—and if so, then may the virgin beauty of his daughter, praying with folded hands and heavenward face when leaning in health on her father’s knees, transcend even the ideal beauty which shall afterwards visit his slumbers nightly, long years after he has laid her head in the grave. If by ideal beauty, you mean a beauty beyond what ever breathed and moved, and had its being on earth—then we suspect that not even “that inner eye which is the bliss of solitude” ever beheld it; but if you merely mean by ideal beauty, that which is composed of ideas, and of the feelings attached by nature to ideas, then, begging your pardon, my good sir, all beauty whatever is ideal—and you had better begin to study metaphysics.

But what we were wishing to say is this—that whatever may be the truth with regard to human female beauty—Windermere, seen by sunset from the spot where we now stand, Elleray, is at this moment the most beautiful scene on this earth. The reasons why it must be so are multitudinous. Not only can the eye take in, but the imagination, in its awakened power, can master all the component elements of the spectacle—and while it adequately discerns and sufficiently feels the influence of each, is alive throughout all its essence to the divine agency of the whole. The charm lies in its entirety—its unity, which is so perfect—so seemeth it to our eyes—that ’tis in itself a complete world—of which not a line could be altered without disturbing the spirit of beauty that lies recumbent there, wherever the earth meets the sky. There is nothing here fragmentary; and had a poet been born, and bred here all his days, nor known aught of fair or grand beyond this liquid vale, yet had he sung truly and profoundly of the shows of nature. No rude and shapeless masses of mountains—such as too often in our own dear Scotland encumber the earth with dreary desolation—with gloom without grandeur—and magnitude without magnificence. But almost in orderly array, and irregular just up to the point of the picturesque, where poetry is not needed for the fancy’s pleasure, stand the Race of Giants—mist-veiled transparently—or crowned with clouds slowly settling of their own accord into all the forms that Beauty loves, when with her sister-spirit Peace she descends at eve from highest heaven to sleep among the shades of earth. Sweet would be the hush of lake, woods, and skies, were it not so solemn! The silence is that of a temple, and, as we face the west, irresistibly are we led to adore. The mighty sun occupies with his flaming retinue all the region. Mighty yet mild—for from his disk awhile insufferably bright, is effused now a gentle crimson light, that dyes all the west in one uniform glory, save where yet round the cloud-edges lingers the purple, the green, and the yellow lustre, unwilling to forsake the violet beds of the sky, changing, while we gaze, into heavenly roses; till that prevailing crimson colour at last gains entire possession of the heavens, and all the previous splendour gives way to one glory, whose paramount purity, lustrous as fire, is in its steadfast beauty sublime. And, lo! the lake has received that sunset into its bosom! It, too, softly burns with a crimson glow—and as sinks the sun below the mountains, Windermere, gorgeous in her array as the western sky, keeps fade-fading away as it fades, till at last all the ineffable splendour expires, and the spirit that has been lost to this world in the transcendent vision, or has been seeing all things appertaining to this world in visionary symbols, returns from that celestial sojourn, and knows that its lot is, henceforth as heretofore, to walk wearily, perhaps, and wobegone, over the no longer divine but disenchanted earth!

It is very kind in the moon and stars—just like them—to rise so soon after sunset. The heart sinks at the sight of the sky, when a characterless night succeeds such a blaze of light—like dull reality dashing the last vestiges of the brightest of dreams. When the moon is "hid in her vacant interlunar cave," and not a star can "burst its cerements," in the dim blank imagination droops her wings—our thoughts become of the earth earthly—and poetry seems a pastime fit but for fools and children. But how different our mood, when

"Glow the firmament with living sapphire!"

and Diana, who has ascended high in heaven, without our having ever once observed the divinity, bends her silver bow among the rejoicing stars, while the lake, like another sky, seems to contain its own luminaries, a different division of the constellated night! 'Tis merry Windermere no more! Yet we must not call her melancholy—though somewhat sad she seems, and pensive, as if the stillness of universal nature did touch her heart. How serene all the lights—how peaceful all the shadows! Steadfast alike—as if there they would brood for ever—yet transient as all loveliness—and at the mercy of every cloud! In some places, the lake has disappeared—in others the moonlight is almost like sunshine—only silver instead of gold! Here spots of quiet light—there lines of trembling lustre—and there a flood of radiance chequered by the images of trees! Lo! the Isle called Beautiful has now gathered upon its central grove all the radiance issuing from that celestial Urn! And almost in another moment it seems blended with the dim mass of mainland, and blackness enshrouds the woods. Still as seems the night to unobservant eyes, it is fluctuating in its expression as the face of a sleeper overspread with pleasant but disturbing dreams. Never for any two successive moments is the aspect of the night the same—each smile has its own meaning, its own character—and Light is felt to be like Music, to have a melody and a harmony of its own—so mysteriously allied are the powers and provinces of eye and ear, and by such a kindred and congenial agency do they administer to the workings of the spirit.

Well, that is very extraordinary—Rain—rain—rain! All the eyes of heaven were bright as bright might be—the sky was blue as violets—that braided whiteness, that here and there floated like a veil on the brow of night, was all that recalled the memory of clouds—and as for the moon, no faintest halo yellowed round her orb that seemed indeed "one perfect chrysolite;"—yet while all the winds seemed laid asleep till morn, and beauty to have chained all the elements into peace—overcast in a moment is the firmament—an evanishing has left it blank as mist—there is a fast, thick, pattering on the woods—yes—rain—rain—rain—and ere we reach Bowness, the party will be wet through to their skins. Nay—matters are getting still more serious—for there was lightning—lightning! Ten seconds! and hark, very respectable thunder! With all our wisdom, we have not been weather-wise—or we should have known—when we saw it—an electrical sunset. Only look now towards the West. There floats Noah's Ark—a magnificent spectacle—and now for the Flood. That far-off sullen sound is the sound of cataracts. And what may mean that sighing and moaning, and muttering up among the cliffs? See—see how the sheet lightning shews the long lake-shore all tumbling with foamy breakers. A strong wind is there—but here there is not a breath. But the woods across the lake are bowing their heads to the blast. Windermere is in a tumult—the storm comes flying on wings all abroad—and now we are in the very heart of the hurricane. See in Bowness is hurrying many a light—for the people fear we may be on the lake—and Billy, depend on't, is launching his life-boat to go to our assistance. Well, this is an adventure.—But soft—what ails our Argand Lamp! Our Study is in such darkness, that we cannot see our paper—and therefore in the midst of a thunder-storm we conclude our Article.

A NEW REIGN.

KINGS are mighty disagreeable people to write on, and we always wish to avoid them as much as possible. Our readers will testify, that it has been our practice to give this wish almost boundless indulgence. There are, however, moments when we are compelled, however great our reluctance may be, to disobey it, and this is one of them, from the following reasons:—

In the first place, a new reign is commencing: at such a time the compact is renewed between the sovereign and his subjects; and it is the solemn duty of the latter to tender to the new King, along with their allegiance, all the instruction which the history of his predecessors, and an examination of his own conduct, can supply. It is the time when they are called on to “fly from petty tyrants to the Throne,”—to look above the Cabinet and Legislature,—and, in once more surrendering themselves to its authority, to urge on the Crown itself the removal of sorrows, the redress of wrongs, the adoption of example, and the granting of stipulation, without sparing either dead or living Majesty. They are commanded to do this by what they owe to the new Monarch, as well as to themselves. He is inexperienced, and therefore needs information and advice;—he is anxious for popularity, and therefore willing to listen to them;—he is unpledged, and therefore free to choose his policy; and he is surrounded by flatterers and intriguers, and therefore in danger of falling into every error. It is the only moment of his reign, in which his people can reasonably hope to make an impression on him: when he is once fully committed in advisers and measures, they are excluded from all effectual access to his ear and heart.

In the second place, his Majesty ascends the Throne under circumstances in the highest degree peculiar. In general, a king, on his accession, finds his people either prosperous, or, at the worst, only enduring ordinary and transient suffering; a proper Ministry is in existence, or materials abound for forming one; parties base their contention on efforts to promote the public good, and the community can trust to them for remedy and benefit;—and public men are bound by the laws of honour, and are compelled to seek fame and profit in serving the interests of their country. But to the present King the case is reversed. He finds his people enduring such loss and misery as they never before knew in the history of his family, and which have assumed a permanent character. Relief, from the existing Ministry, cannot be expected, and the formation of another differing from it in other things than name and person is scarcely practicable; parties virtually compose a conspiracy against the administering of effective remedy, and public men make a sordid trade of principle, and regard the sacrifice of national interest as a matter of duty and wisdom. For the first time, the annals of England present the portentous fact of rulers, merely to produce some distant, speculative, undefined good, doing that which they know and confess will bring loss and wretchedness on hundreds of thousands and millions. It is to the King alone that his people must look for the removal of their distress, and the restoration of the sources of good government; they cannot, as heretofore, hope in Parliament and the Ministry.

In the third place, the most mischievous doctrines have been for some time fashionable, touching the powers and duties of the King. At one time we are called on to yield servile obedience to prerogative; we are commanded to laud and support the Ministry, merely because it is the King's; it is a crime to oppose “the King's government.” Here he is converted into a despot. Then faction has some measure to carry, to which he is hostile; therefore we are assured that he ought to be the tool of Ministers, and that they have a right to coerce him into such tool by every means in their power. Here he is virtually deposed. In truth, the real object in both cases is to make him a cipher touching the Ministers; the despotic power given him in the first, is only to enable him to make them despots over both him and the community. Farther, the responsibility of Ministers is spoken of as though it ought to shield him from all responsibility and all duty. He is placed, not only above the rules and regulations which govern society, but also above remark and animadversion in such exercise of his kingly trust as his advisers have not to account for. However gross and pernicious his private vices may be, it is called unconstitutional to notice them; no matter what evils his use of prerogative may produce, censure of it is denounced as little better than treason. Even where party and faction have no motive for spreading delusion, the King is looked on, during his life, as little better than a nominal public functionary. He is regarded as an ornament to the political edifice; a something requisite for giving it the proper finish, pomp, and magnificence, but useful chiefly in appearance—as a state officer, having small power, influence, and will, and existing principally to give the sanction of his name to the opinions and acts of others. The tendency of the whole is to deprive the King of the sceptre on all occasions when he ought to wield it—to incapacitate him for discharging the more grave of his duties—to throw him practically out of the Constitution—to tempt him to violate his obligations—and to extract from him, in his official character, the greatest measure of abuse and evil. History, indeed, avoids the error; in examining a reign, she calls the King himself to her tribunal, and treats Ministers and Parliaments as his agents and subordinates; without condescending to notice the responsibility of his servants, she makes him responsible for the losses, miseries, and disgraces inflicted on the empire. In this she righteously discharges her duty; but, alas! she only brings forward truth when it is too late, for every thing save despised example. A new King ascends the Throne, and so long as he can, and does, produce evil, his misconduct is charged on others; history only appears to make him accountable when the hour for reclaiming and reforming him has passed for ever.

In the fourth place, either his present Majesty must act in the manner prescribed by the Constitution—must exercise his functions with equal assiduity and firmness, or the most terrible calamities must soon fall on the British empire.

In the fifth place, some ground for hope is found in his Majesty's character and conduct. Almost a stranger to party and political life, it may be presumed that he is the more free from bonds and bias, and the more attached to his country. The sterling English sentiments which he has displayed on certain minor matters, afford reason for hoping, that on leading ones he may feel like a right-hearted Englishman. His anxiety to make himself popular, may justify the opinion that he wishes to deserve as well as to enjoy popularity—that he desires to be loved as a friend, as well as to be cheered as a spectacle—that he intends not only to conciliate his people, but to give them the utmost measure of prosperity and happiness.

The King's office transcends all others much more in greatness of power and importance of duty, than in dignity. No other part of the fabric of government is more essential and beneficial, or exercises such overpowering influence over the whole. We speak of it in its separate character, and to the extent in which it is not, and cannot be, under the guidance of Ministers. It depends on the King, whether Parliament and the Constitution shall have real being, and shall not operate as a public scourge; this is more especially the case in the present days of Parliamentary servility and profligacy. If he err, all is error and evil below him; if he neglect his duty and abuse his trust, other public functionaries do the same. A wise and virtuous Cabinet and Legislature, can only exist with a wise and virtuous King; both must be imbecile and corrupt, if he be so. Parliament cannot, or will not, exercise the power it is endowed with for directing and controlling him; but from him it takes its character in despite of duty.

The King is emphatically called the Father of his People, and the title is no empty one: he is clothed with the power, and bound by the obligations, of the Father. To style him merely the Chief Magistrate, is, not only to degrade him, but to exempt him from the discharge of many of the most weighty of his duties. His paternal care is to watch incessantly over the whole conduct and circumstances of his people; and it is not only to provide and enforce laws, but to display examples, bestow reward, dispense bounty,—in a word, to do every thing which can repress evil, and produce good. The head of the Church, he is bound to promote, by all the means in his power, religion and morals; the fountain of honours and dignities, he is bound to encourage and reward virtue and ability; the master of the Cabinet, he is bound to do his utmost towards assuaging sorrow, banishing want, employing industry, and increasing prosperity and happiness. His obligations to exercise the parent's active and affectionate discretion, comprehend the beggar as well as the peer—the hovel as well as the princely mansion.

These obligations are not the less sacred and imperative, because the King has to discharge them by means of others. He has to discharge them through his Ministers, that he may do it the more effectually, but not that he may be released from them.

Much is said of the responsibility of his advisers, but what is it in reality? The unofficial part of them cannot be reached, and as to the remainder, he alone can give it effect, save in such violent infractions of law, as no Minister would be guilty of. The King, in right of his office, selects the Ministry; in this he selects the principles and policy on which the empire is to be governed, and the men who are to give them operation. If his choice be the very worst, where is the remedy? It cannot be found in the punishment of advisers, or the responsibility of Ministers. Parliament has in effect a veto on his selection, but he has means for rendering it useless. If such creed and Ministers are forced on him as he is hostile to, he soon contrives to get rid of them, and to replace them with his own. The history of every reign abundantly proves, that his choice, however baleful it may be, must be acquiesced in. To what tribunal are his Ministers responsible? One, the decisions of which they influence and govern; and which, putting this out of sight judges them with any thing rather than impartiality and justice. If they be arraigned on sufficient charge and proof, they can commonly command a triumphant acquittal in Parliament. The King alone can terminate their evil doings, and dismiss them; without him, their responsibility is but a name.

Nothing, of course, could be more erroneous than the idea, that because his Ministers are responsible, he ought to be their passive confederate and instrument—that because they are to appear and act for him, he ought to give his sanction to every thing they may advise. The responsibility would be by this virtually destroyed. It is intended to restrict them to the giving of proper advice, but not to make them more than advisers; it interferes not with his duty of exercising his judgment and discretion on their advice, and instantly inspecting their conduct as a master. It is so far from divesting him of responsibility, that the Constitution empowers his people to address complaint and remonstrance to himself; and, if these fail, to withhold from him the means of carrying on the government.

Thus, although the King is associated and confounded with his Ministers, his character and duties differ essentially from theirs. The constitution makes them his servants, merely restricting him from causing them to do what they ought not; and with such restriction he is to act as their master. He is to judge their proceedings with jealous vigilance; in duty he is much more associated with Parliament, than with them; the head of the Executive, his functions are still essentially deliberative ones, to be exercised like those of Parliament, in sitting in judgment on the acts of the Executive.

To qualify the King for being the real Father of his People, these matters seem necessary. He ought most scrupulously to avoid being the member of any party or faction. Having to decide between parties, he must favour the right—he must prefer and support the best principles and men as the arbiter, but beyond this he must not go. If he sink into the partisan, he virtually deposes himself; he gives his sceptre to his party, and becomes its subject. The very best party, in respect of both creed and character, cannot rule the King without losing that which makes it meritorious and useful, and becoming highly mischievous. Acting from selfish interests and feelings, involved in strife,—blinded by enthusiasm and animosity, nothing but the King can place on it the proper restrictions.

This, of course, includes principles and measures, in regard to both of which it is of the very highest importance that the King should act as the impartial judge. The choice in these rests with him either for good or evil; it is only through his power over the Ministry, the just can be adopted, and the pernicious abandoned. If he commit himself as the partisan or parent, his people lose all security against destructive misgovernment.

The Ministry is necessarily comprehended, as consisting of the heads and essence of the favoured party. It cannot possess dominion over him without being led by the circumstances in which it is placed into almost every kind of misrule. It not only has a deep private interest in abusing its power, but it is impelled to do so unintentionally, or from good intentions. However ruinously its principles and measures may operate, it is sure to adhere to them with the utmost pertinacity, because their evil fruits cannot be so injurious to it as its abandonment of them would be: if it persevere, it can charge these fruits on other causes; but the abandonment would be a confession of error and incapacity destructive to it. In addition, the infirmity of human nature makes it blind and deaf to all proof that it is in the wrong. The history of late years affords deplorable testimony, that after public men pledge themselves to principles and measures, no evidence can make an impression on them, and they will persist in them even to the ruin of the empire. Parliament and public opinion can do nothing against the Ministry if it have the King as its instrument; he must take the lead in restraining it; and it is by him alone that good principles and measures can be substituted for bad ones.

To prevent his Ministers from obtaining undue influence over the King, it seems essential that they should not be numbered amidst his private friends; he should have no intercourse with them beyond what is required by official duty. If he become their friend, he sinks into their partisan and dupe; he decides between rival candidates for office and systems of policy on the reverse of the grounds which ought to govern his decision. A Minister can never, in the true sense of the word, be a friend to the King; he must use any friendship that may subsist between them as a source of profit to himself. Independently of the improper favour which Ministers must draw from the King's friendship, it must enable them to impose on him in the most pernicious manner touching public affairs.

All this is sanctioned by the Constitution, which assumes the King to be incapable of being a partisan; to be free from bonds and partialities, and to be always ready, when the public good may require it, to change his Ministers and their policy. It does not allow that he can pledge himself, or act from the influence of friendship.

It is utterly impossible for the King to discharge his momentous duties properly, or in any other than the most injurious manner, if he be not correctly informed in respect of the condition and feelings of his people, the character of his Ministers, and the fruits of the policy acted on by the latter. How can he gain the information? His private friends will conceal from him the truth; they will shape their words to suit his prejudices and their own interests; they will blind and deceive him. His Ministers will necessarily labour to keep him in ignorance and delusion; if they be even upright men, they will still plead their own cause to him, and therefore do their utmost to mislead him. If he look at the debates in Parliament, he will find one side stoutly denying what the other asserts in respect of fact; parties will be vehemently at issue touching the causes of admitted effects; and the Opposition will labour as strenuously to suppress, misrepresent, and delude on one side the question, as the Ministry will on the other. If he turn to the newspapers, they will act like Parliament; perhaps if Parliament be the same, they may be about all on one side denying the existence of distress, when it overwhelms the whole community, or ascribing it to erroneous causes, and fiercely warring against remedy.

How then can the King gain the necessary information? He ought to converse frequently and much with able, intelligent, impartial men, who can speak from their own knowledge. They will supply him with accurate facts, and communicate to him the feelings of society; they will make him acquainted with that legitimate public opinion which is not to be found in the press, and which he must know and follow, to do right. They will teach him to participate in the spirit and sentiments of his people, and to treat with due discrimination the assertions of party and faction.

Another essential is, the King ought to employ his influence to keep the great constitutional parties of the State in due opposition to each other. If they combine, Parliament and the press employ themselves in concealing facts, stifling discussion, suppressing public opinion, and inculcating error. Their contention draws forth much truth and argument, and enables the independent to speak with effect, although it is so prolific of falsehood and misrepresentation; and proper intelligence, on the part of the King, can separate the good from the evil. But their union ranges all the falsehood and misrepresentation on one side, makes them infinitely more unscrupulous, and puts down all opposition to them: it afflicts the country with moral lunacy, and not only deprives the King of the sources of knowledge, but combines every thing to misinform and delude him.

The proper division of the great constitutional parties is not more essential for enabling the King to judge righteously between men and principles, than it is for enabling him to give the needful effect to his judgment. It was a capital error in his late Majesty that he was always anxious to combine these parties; from the moment when he became the Regent, almost to the time of his death, he was continually labouring to accomplish it by means of a "broad-bottomed Ministry." Divide and rule—is as true touching the King and parties, as it is in any case whatever; he must divide parties, or be their impotent subject and slave; the tyranny of their union must be as grinding to him as to the community. The union can only be compassed by the destruction of principle amidst public men; both sides must sacrifice either creed or integrity; and thus they acquire despotic power over both King and people, and escape from moral restraint on the exercise of it, at the same moment.

Such union cannot, in the nature of things, have long existence. Those who enter into it are actuated by sordid selfishness, which it cannot gratify! They do not intend it to continue, but they resort to it as a more effectual means of subduing each other than open hostility; each party is from the first determined to separate as soon as it can extract the strength from, and expel the other. But in the short period of its existence, it is sure to involve the King, as well as the country, in appalling difficulties. Public affairs are managed by party fanaticism, in utter contempt of fact and evidence; and the community is soon plunged into misery; in this state of things the King has no resource, for the union has pledged all public men against change; if parties separate, the one which goes into opposition, protests against different measures, and merely inflames the passions of the ignorant, to make the evils produced by the distress, and the King's embarrassments, as great as possible.

It is of the very highest importance, that the King should always be able to change his Ministers, and their policy, when public need calls for it—that he should be able to exercise his prerogative effectually, as well as nominally, and to appoint a Ministry fully capable of managing public affairs on opposite principles. It is his solemn duty, when the community endures nothing but suffering under one system of policy, to call an opposite one into action. Without this, he is no King, according to the constitution, and he cannot discharge the obligations of one. To ensure it, parties ought to be divided, as we have said, and the division should be resolutely maintained by himself. Whenever his Ministers are unable to carry on the government on their own principles, and display a wish to adopt those of the Opposition, he ought at once to dismiss them, and put the Opposition into office. This is called for by many reasons, as well as the necessity for the division of parties.

It is a most pernicious thing for the Opposition to consist always of the same party, although it may be matter of necessity. It keeps the party from official experience and habits of business, and thereby makes it the most useless as an Opposition, and if it be called to power, the most incompetent as a Ministry. The party necessarily addresses itself to the lower orders; it inflames their passions, adopts their wishes, and constitutes itself their leaders; misrepresentation and arguing on the false and mischievous side, enter into its daily occupation. In consequence, the longer it is excluded from office, the more visionary and pernicious its creed becomes; the more influence it obtains over the body of the people, the more it separates this body from the King, the Aristocracy, and public institutions, and the more atrociously it tramples on truth and reason. The proof of this afforded by the history of the Whigs, is not more curious than melancholy. In the days of Fox and Burke, they were statesmen; they made abstract principle merely a thing of practical use, studied the practical portion of finance, trade, &c., and attended with due ability to every department of government. What are they now? They have declined into visionaries and fanatics. They can speak of nothing save abstract principle, which they strain to the wildest extreme of falsehood and absurdity: public affairs, in regard to detail, and effects to the community, are below their notice; they leave finance to such people as Hume and Maberly; trade they cannot look at; taxes they can only declaim against in the gross; and provided the Ministry adheres to certain general doctrines, it may do any thing it pleases through the whole range of domestic and foreign policy. Never did any other body of men exhibit such complete ignorance of real business—such incomprehensible lack of acquaintance with actual men and things. Mr Brougham,* at York, denounced war as “unchristian,” and professed to doubt whether the difference be-

* The magnificent declamation which Mr Brougham has put forth in Yorkshire, touching liberty, France, and himself, makes it our duty to remind the country, that, in the last session of Parliament, he was perfectly speechless on the “persecutions” of the Press, instituted by his worthy friend and brother-lawyer, Sir J. Scarlett. Other Whigs did their duty like honest men; but he did nothing. If we be told that his crown fee as a lawyer sealed his lips as a legislator, we will reply, What right, then, has such a man to enter Parliament? Let the country remember, too, what his conduct was in the contest between arbitrary Ministers and popular right and feeling, on the Catholic Question. What is his regular conduct in Parliament, in regard to such petitions as are not palatable to him? Through his whole life he has constantly either supported power, or been neutral, in its inroads on national freedom and privileges, unless the interests of his own faction have led him to do the contrary. Perhaps we ought to unadvert on the compound of bombast, egotism and fanaticism, untruth and insult, which he has inserted in the newspapers, as his address of thanks to the Yorkshire freeholders for electing him. Under the pretext of thanking them, he advertises himself and his nostrums, after the fashion of the regular advertising quacks. He is elected, forsooth! because all Yorkshire agrees with him in principle, and supports him!!! Passing by the despicable invention, touching agreement of principle at a preliminary Whig meeting, which took place to discuss the propriety of inviting him to become a candidate, his principal supporters were an editor of a provincial newspaper, and a retired country barrister; the Whig country gentlemen were opposed to him. At the York dinner, he could not refrain from insulting the freeholders; he told them they had done for him what he would not have done for a Yorkshireman in Westmoreland. At another election we trust Yorkshire will vindicate its dignity and character. If the Whigs, in their present hopeful prospects, do not wish Mr Brougham to ruin them as a party, they must either put on him the bridle of discretion, or get rid of him. Age, instead of sobering him, seems only to render him more intemperate and fanatical. Singular, indeed, must the times be, when Yorkshire, the first of counties, has sent this slave of a party to Parliament as a county member!

tween a low price of corn, and a higher one, went to the producer, although he was sure it was taken from the consumer; in plain English—for his doubt amounts to this—he thought it made no difference to the producers whether they sold their corn, or gave it away. How such a man, after uttering such wretched ravings, in contempt of all reason and fact, can hope to occupy a high place in the Cabinet, we cannot conjecture. Yet the Whigs abound in ability. Of Mr Brougham we need not speak. Earl Grey, in natural talent, has no superior in Parliament; if he had studied real life as much as party doctrines, and had laboured as zealously for public interests as for those of party, he would have had no superior in it in any respect. Sir J. Graham has powers equal to any thing: it is lamentable to see these fine powers humbling themselves to party errors, evidently against their conviction, cramped by party bonds into comparative imbecility, compelled by party folly to waste themselves on petty trifles, and warring against things English, at the nod of party despotism, in despite of their wishes and their sterling English nature. Why does not their owner, even if for no other object than to retrieve the fallen character and fortunes of his party, cast from him his chains, and appear before his country in the dignity of freedom! He only injures and disgraces his party by following it; to serve it, he must rise to the rank of leader.

It cannot be doubted that this has been produced in the Whigs principally by their constant exclusion from office; if they had, as a separate party, enjoyed their fair turn of it, they would have been, from experience, far better men of business—they would have been pledged to infinitely more rational, practical opinions—they would have been much more connected with the King, the Aristocracy, the Church, and the independent part of the community—and they would have had far less influence over the passions and prejudices of the multitude.

So long as the Opposition advocates principles which the King, the Cabinet, and the Legislature, decide ought not to be acted on, it ought to be excluded from power, no matter what may be the consequences; but here the ground for its exclusion ceases. The triumph of their principles forms the best of all reasons for giving them the Cabinet. If the Ministers be the best men, and their principles be the true ones, still, if they cannot maintain themselves in office without apostatising to their opponents, they ought to be dismissed. It is only in Opposition that the men and their principles can regain their supremacy.

Nothing can be more erroneous than the idea, that if the Ministry apostatize to the Opposition from necessity, this will weaken the latter, and render its creed innocuous; it must necessarily have a contrary effect. The Ministry, in going over, destroys its character, suppresses its principles, and forces its party into the ranks of the Opposition. If its new principles produce all manner of evil, the blame is cast, not on them, but on its own incapacity, and it is without resource; instead of being able to limit their application, it is compelled to give them a wider one than the Opposition itself would attempt if in power: the latter soon lowers its creed to find ground of difference, and it drags the Ministry after it. For a number of years the Tories have regularly lowered their creed to approximate it to that of the Whigs; and the effect has been, the Whigs have as regularly lowered theirs, to keep up the difference, until at length we see Whiggism sunk to the confines of Republicanism; compared with it, the faith of Mr Fox was high Toryism.

No matter how distasteful an Opposition may be to the King and the intelligent part of the community, still if it be too powerful for the Ministry, give it office, as the only effectual means of weakening it, and purifying its principles. It will be placed under the potent control of the King; a considerable part of its press will forsake it; the support of the multitude will change into neutrality, and then into hostility; it will be compelled to change its language, to place many of its doctrines on the shelf, and to promulgate different ones: it will, from necessity, falsify many of its professions by its acts; its creed will be properly judged of by its effects, and its members by their conduct. In addition, much of the strength it loses will be transferred to the dismissed Ministers. While nothing is better calculated to weaken an Opposition, and correct any exaggerated opinion of its character, than office; nothing is better calculated to strengthen a feeble Ministry, and cleanse its reputation from unjust reproach, than the sending it into Opposition. A party in office keeps losing, and in opposition keeps gaining, strength and character, in regard to popular feeling.

If the King suffer his Ministers to embrace the creed of the Opposition, from the hope that it will enable them to retain office, he will find himself grievously mistaken. By so doing, he not only ensures their expulsion, but makes their return to office almost impossible: he deprives them of all strength as a Ministry, and incapacitates them from acting as an Opposition; he makes them the instruments of the Opposition for gaining power, and afterwards retaining it. If he dismiss them with principles unchanged, they at once stand forth as the opponents of the new Ministry, and divide the country against it; they are almost immediately in a condition to re-enter the Cabinet, supported by popular feeling. But after the inevitable dismissal which their apostasy produces, they are pledged to support the Ministry in essentials, and they are deserted by the country. The latter can create no new party in their place; public men are all bound to the same policy, and in consequence, no matter who the electors may send to Parliament, the Members will be unanimous. Thus the King can neither take his favourite Ministers again into office, nor obtain others of their principles; he is bound to those who are forced on him.

We are guilty of no extravagance in assuming that a Ministry will apostatize to the Opposition, as a means of maintaining itself in power. In late years, different Ministers have made a regular system of doing it, and the system has been insisted on as alike wise and necessary. How often has it not been rung in our ears, that Ministers ought to make this or that surrender, merely to keep themselves in office! How often have we not been assured, that they ought to be supported in adopting the creed of the Opposition, in order to keep office from the latter! With regard to other countries as well as this, the doctrine is inculcated, that Ministers ought to disregard principle and conscience, and to follow the dictates of their opponents, for the purpose of retaining power. The real meaning of it is, that to prevent certain men and principles from holding office constitutionally, and under the action of proper restraints and balances; they ought, in effect, to hold it unconstitutionally, and with despotic power;—that, to prevent one party from doing injury, another party ought to do the same injury, and infinitely more. It is not more false, than it is injurious to every party interested.

What has it produced to the Tory Ministers? It has ruined them; the elections just ending have proved that, in respect of the community at large, it has stripped them of both character and party.

What has it produced to the Tory party? It has ruined it; this party is now lost amidst the Whigs.

What has it produced to the King? It has left him without choice in men and measures, and disabled him for discharging his duties.

And what has it produced to the country? A far wider application of Whig doctrines than could have taken place if the Whigs had been in office. In respect of general policy, it has virtually destroyed Parliament and the Press, and placed the country under a practical despotism; the country has been deprived by it of all means of judging correctly of the measures of government, and of appealing against them. Fortunate, indeed, would it have been for the community at large, if the Tories had been expelled from power, in favour of the Whigs, seven years ago, before their apostasy commenced!

Whatever party the King may be led by choice or necessity to place in office, he ought to make it a rule for his Ministers to be men of the best character, private as well as public. Public character is governed by private; whatever a man is as a private individual, that he will be as a Minister. The Minister who is godless, licentious, and unprincipled in private life, will dispose of Church patronage to the irreligious and rapacious; piety, virtue, and inability for becoming political instruments, will be with him disqualifications. He will dispose of civil patronage in the same manner; he will exclude men of honour and integrity, and fill subordinate offices with profligates. Such a Minister's personal connexions will be amidst the vicious; and his mode of conducting public affairs will render it necessary for his subordinates to be regardless of principle. In public, as in private life, virtue and its rules will be despised by him; in the management of the affairs of the country, as in that of his own, he will sacrifice to his interest all the obligations which bind the pure and honourable.

If the leading Ministers display a contempt for religion and morals, honour, public spirit, and virtue, their example must be about as prolific of evil as their deeds. Parliament will imitate them, for the sake of imitation, as well as to gain the bribes they will offer it. From such Ministers must flow a licentious and corrupt Legislature.

Ministers like these can never gain any important share of public esteem and confidence; that part of society which dispenses the latter is shocked and disgusted by their proceedings; it is always in dread of what they may do, and therefore it even tolerates them with reluctance. The fruits of their conduct, sooner or later, fill the land with vice, evils, and discontent. A virtuous Ministry is loved for its virtue; and by promoting general morals, raising the character of the clergy, purifying the general body of public functionaries, and exalting the standard of honour, principle, and public spirit in Parliament, it continually enlarges the sources from which alone governments can draw confidence and affection. The case is the reverse with a vicious one.

The character of the Ministry has a great effect on that of the Opposition. Virtue in a Ministry contributes half to the defeat of an Opposition which is vicious; and in the latter it ensures its triumph over a vicious Ministry. The virtuous Ministry, when it loses place, must make an Opposition of the same character.

It has been said, and we trust it is true in the rule, that virtue and talent are naturally allied. This, however, is evident to all, that the want of talent in a Ministry must compel it to be vicious; while the possession of it must tempt it to be the contrary. In addition, if a Ministry do not possess the requisite share of ability, it must govern to scourge, and it must soon fall. If, therefore, the King wish his Ministry to do its duty, confer on his people the blessings of good government, and endure, he must use his efforts to make it comprehend the greatest portion possible of talent. He must not be content with two or three gifted leaders, but his care must extend to the subordinates; there must be the rising as well as the mature tree—the future successor, as well as the present possessor.

Contempt of this has had a large share in ruining that party which enjoys his present Majesty's preference. It used its patronage to provide for imbecile connexions, or to buy worthless adherents; and it could spare none for ability; it was to flourish by the corrupt purchase of family influence or apostate opponents, and not by conferring honourable reward on rising talent. It thus repelled such talent into the ranks of its foes; and, when its leaders sunk into the grave, its strength was buried with them; it found itself opposed by nearly the whole talent and eloquence of the country. Imbecility then led it into profligacy, and profligacy into tyranny; and its ruin was completed. Even in its present state, it adheres to the same system; not a single young man has been brought forward in political life by the existing Ministry for the sake of his talents alone.

The King may learn from this that the matter must not be left to his Ministers; they are much more likely, from envy, jealousy, the impotency of supporters, and other causes, to exclude talent, than to secure its alliance. His interest in it is infinitely greater than theirs; they can only hope to hold office for a few years, and they have no inducement for providing proper successors. But he retains his office for life; and if his Ministers be incapable, or if, when he loses them, he cannot find others duly qualified, it involves him in grievous personal embarrassments. In what is of such vast moment to himself, as well as to the country, his vigilant care must extend to every department of office; he must provide future as well as present Ministers; he must be the Patron, and turn the stream of talent into his service, in utter disregard of fortune and connexions. In past history, most of the errors and misdeeds of governments, the troubles and sufferings of kings, may be ascribed to neglect in this; a Ministry cannot stand long in this country which does not possess commanding ability and eloquence; and it will, in the period of its existence, cover the King, itself, and its creed, with reproach and unpopularity.

It is the duty of the King to give his decided preference and support to right principles in all things. Fashion has about as much influence in principles as in dress; and, in regard to them, it is continually changing. The world casts off one creed because it is old, and despised by the fashionables, and adopts another because it is new, and in vogue, as it does its garments. At one time, it is the fashion to be religious, and at another, to be the contrary; now Toryism is all the rage, and then it is thrown aside in favour of Whiggism. The King must remember, that principles do not change, in their nature and effects, with variations of popular feeling respecting them; they are equally true or false, whether the nation be for or against them: no popular enthusiasm can prevent the adoption of those which are erroneous from bringing every ill on himself and his people.

In regard to such principles as have been demonstrated to be true, the King must adhere to them with unconquerable firmness. He must not follow, but endeavour to lead, fashion: if it set against him, he must labour to turn it by all the means in his power. He must call eloquence to his side, both in the Ministry and the Press; in his disposal of favours and rewards, he must be rigidly guided by principle. If he bend, court, and conciliate—if he shun and discountenance those who maintain the right, because they are unpopular, and bestow his favour and public honours, without reference to desert, on those who support the wrong, because they have fashion and the multitude with them—if he do this, he will soon find himself forsaken by the good and the wise, the slave of faction, and possessed of no other power than that of injuring himself and his people.

With regard to such principles as are matter of controversy, the King ought to oppose their adoption to the utmost; laws and institutions, property and bread, are not fit objects of experiment. If he have the adoption of them forced on him, he must use every means for causing the trial to be a fair one. Party and faction must be repressed—assertions must be disregarded—both sides must be heard with equal impartiality—and the decision must be according to the results. Every facility ought to be given to Parliamentary enquiry and discussion. The King ought to use every means for making the adoption matter of contention between the great parties of Parliament, in order that he may be able to forsake the principles, if they are proved to be pernicious. Great speculative changes of law and system ought never to be made with the sanction of both parties, because such sanction, however destructive they may prove, disables the country for opposing, and the King for abandoning them. If he cannot prevent them, he has the power, by changing his Ministers, to raise a strong opposition to them, and he ought to exercise it. He must have the fact ever before him, that however warmly he may favour a change, still, if it be an erroneous one, it will involve both his people and himself in troubles; and therefore he ought never to venture on one without first providing the means of retracing his steps if necessary.

We have spoken of some of the leading obligations of the King, which refer more particularly to the circumstances and opinions of the present time; our words, of course, relate to the King in the abstract. We will now say something touching his present Majesty.

He is invested with duties arduous in the extreme, and with responsibilities to God and his country which set calculation at defiance. That he feels this—that he is too much an Englishman to shelter himself under any constitutional or other fiction, is what we cannot doubt. Neither law, nor any thing besides, can to conscience divide the possession of power from responsibility for its exercise. He is surrounded by such difficulties, as scarcely any king before him had to grapple with, and the fearful burden is cast upon him, of not only selecting but creating the means of subduing them.

As the head of the Church, his Majesty will remark the lamentable decline of religious principle. Practical piety is not to be tolerated—the observance of the common decencies of religion is denounced under the nicknames of Evangelism and Puritanism—and the profanation of the Sabbath in all its forms is openly defended. He will see that the Church is rapidly sinking in possessions as well as power—that the clergy have, to a large extent, lost the confidence of the laity—and that the power of its enemies is increasing in all directions.

We feel assured that the King will not content himself with exhibiting, in the conduct of himself and his Court, that reverence for religion displayed by his father; but that, in addition, he will do his utmost to prevent improper appointments in the Church, promote piety and discharge of duty amidst the clergy, and extend the means of religious instruction amidst his people.

The King will perceive that, as a natural consequence, moral and honourable principle has declined with that of religion; and that from the whole has necessarily flowed a fearful decline of political principle. He will see that public men scoff at the sacred obligations of fidelity, consistency, and integrity—that the prejudice, “our country,” has nearly vanished—that legitimate public spirit has scarcely any existence—that parties not only disregard the public weal, but make the sacrifice of it meritorious—and that political creeds have been brought to bear with equal fierceness against all public and individual possessions. He will observe that old checks and balances are destroyed—that the beaten host has retired from the contest—that no voice can be heard in the realm save that of combined party and faction—and that all is portentous unanimity in favour of those principles which, under the name of improvement, have undermined every social institution, dissipated or diminished every fortune, and filled every cottage with want and misery.

We cannot doubt that his Majesty will resort to the proper remedies. He will banish from his court, not only the private, but the political, profligate; his displeasure will fall as heavily on the public man who tramples on the obligations of honour and integrity, as on the private one, who violates the laws of virtue. He will leave nothing undone to form his Ministry of men, whose private and public lives are equally spotless; and his care will extend to every class of public functionaries. By thus giving virtue and honour the ascendancy in the Court and Cabinet, he will give them it in the Legislature and the country at large; he will restore to the Crown, the Ministry, and Parliament, public confidence and affection.

His Majesty will exert himself to dissolve the unnatural combination of parties in Parliament. He will see that this combination deprives the independent and patriotic part of the Legislature of both voice and influence, and that it has the same effect on the community—that through it party and faction are rendered omnipotent, and Parliament is placed above the influence of the nation, and prohibited from attempting to remove evil and relieve suffering. To give success to his efforts, he will bind his Ministers to a distinct and tangible creed—make men responsible for principles—and confine the Cabinet to those whose doctrines are to be acted on. By this he will soon separate parties and creeds—bring them into constitutional and beneficial conflict—and give the triumph to the right.

In regard to policy, the King will not be led by the interested Minister, or the party fanatic. When they boast to him of their liberal principles and enlightened views, their ameliorations and improvements, this will be his reply:—“What have the things which you laud so extravagantly and indecorously produced? The solemn duties which rest on me compel me to call for proof as well as assertion. I am bound by my obligations to God and my people to look at fruits—to judge of truth and error by effects—to take my definitions of right and wrong from the result of experiment. I hold the sceptre, not to promote political fanaticism—to propagate party heresies—to conceal ministerial incapacity—to sanctify factious turpitude—or to sacrifice the empire to abstract opinions; but to give prosperity, virtue, and happiness to my people. Restricted thus as to what my policy is to produce, I am restricted to that only which will produce it. I have sworn as a king, and my oath shall be sacred; I am pledged as a man and an Englishman, and my pledge shall be redeemed.

"Has, then, the policy of which you boast removed loss and want? Has it employed the idle, fed the hungry, and clothed the naked? Has it increased religion and virtue, loyalty, content, and comfort? Has it enlarged the possessions of the rich, and the enjoyments of the poor? Has it added to the stability of public institutions, and to the power, cohesion, and security of the empire? Prove that it has done this, and it is mine;—you incapacitate me from embracing any other.

"Such proof you have not, and in the absence of it I am compelled to resort to the evidence of my senses. For five years your policy has been in comprehensive operation, and had it been founded on truth, its fruits would long since have made this matter of demonstration. I find, however, in these fruits only demonstration of error. Under this policy, loss, want, wretchedness, and barbarism, have increased in an unprecedented manner; the condition of all ranks and callings has suffered grievous injury; and the injury has extended to good feelings and national professions of every kind. At this moment I find the mass of my people struggling with insolvency and suffering, which, in degree and duration, have no parallel in modern history;—I find them enduring almost every thing which the worst policy and misrule could produce.

"Were I a member of party or faction, I might disregard this, or deny its existence, or ascribe it to any thing rather than the true causes. Were I a private individual, I might content myself with lamenting it; but I am neither. The bonds are upon me—which I cannot, and dare not, break—to observe it, trace it to its sources, and provide the remedies. It is my duty to protect property wherever it may be assailed—to banish hunger and nakedness wherever they may be found—to solace suffering wherever it may exist—and I have no alternative to obedience. I cannot regard your distinctions, and sacrifice one part of my people to another. The claims on me of the landowner, silk weaver, and husbandry labourer, are equal to those of the manufacturer, cotton weaver, and mechanic; and partiality would be guilt which I cannot commit. With severe impartiality, I must restore to the distressed interest and class, no matter what they may be, the means of prosperity—I must give to the starving workman, no matter what may be his calling, employment, and adequate wages. If, in doing this, I have to oppose your dogmas, reverse your policy, destroy your reputation, and cover myself with all kinds of contumely,—if I have to stand alone against the hostility of every party, I must still do it.

"From your party opinions and interests, your specious names and delusive theories, I separate myself—as the King, I can have no connexion with them—I appeal from you to my People."

Such, we confidently hope, will be the conduct of his Majesty. If he act differently, awful will be the history of the reign of William the Fourth.

FRENCH REVOLUTION.

REVOLUTION!—French Revolution!—Dread watchword of mystery and fear!—Augury of sorrow to come!—Record of an Iliad of woes!—Is it then indeed true that another French Revolution has dawned? That its laurels are already mingled with cypress? That its martyrs are already many? That its victims are again seeking their old asylum in England? And is it possible that, by this generation, with the sad recollections of the last forty years, any Revolution whatever—the purest, holiest, most righteous—can be welcomed with transports of sympathizing joy and unmitigated triumph?—Yes, we are told this Revolution was sown in peril and civil conflict: it is reaped in glory and peace. The dangers, it is said, are over and gone: the Revolution is at an end.—Let us enquire.

The comparison is put as between 1830 and 1792-3. Yet why? Speaking without partisanship, the just point of comparison is with 1789 and July 13, 1790. That revolution, even more than this, was won with moderation and civic hands. That also seemed freighted with golden hopes for France, and, through France, for universal Europe. All the earth made sign of gratulation; one voice of glad fraternal acclamation ascended from every land; and if some kings, among the more bigoted of their order, frowned, even from the first, upon the new-born aspirations of liberty, it is certain that they were not supported by the wisest or most timid of their subjects. Many hearts yet linger upon the shore, as it were, of those great remembrances, when men and women, of every climate, felt their common nature exalted; and for the first time in the records of this planet, a jubilee was celebrated, in which, either by hope or by immediate sympathy, the whole family of man, including the most outcast Pariah, seemed entitled to participate.

The spectacle of a mighty king descending halfway down the steps of a throne, consecrated by the superstition of a thousand years, to meet his people in a covenant of pure elementary justice, fascinated the gaze alike of the thoughtless and the thoughtful. Nor even in the second stage of this great change, when violence began to unfold itself, and the grand dithyrambic transports of the first enthusiasm had passed into a tragic strain, was the favour of good men entirely withdrawn. Allowances were made for the excesses of a zeal, noble in its origin, and as yet virtuously pointed. Hence, when ————— “the dread Bastille,

With all the chambers in its herrid towers,
Fell to the ground, by violence overthrown
Of indignation, and with shouts that drown'd
The crash it made in falling;”

the very mildest of Christian philosophers responded with unfaltering exultation. Violence, indeed, had triumphed, but over an enormous and hoary abuse. Public order had been wrecked; but in this instance,

————— “from the wreck
A golden palace rose, or seem'd to rise,
The appointed seat of equitable law,
And mild paternal sway.”

How those visions perished, in what manner that dawn of celestial promise was overcast, and deformed by storms such as never had descended upon civilized communities; and how, at last, the billowy agitations of popular frenzy were smitten by the petrific mace of military despotism, and republicanism swallowed up by a power growing out of itself,—all this is recorded in the blood and tears of every nation, and in the debts which cripple the leader of the Anti-Gallican crusade.

Neither let it be said, that the sad revulsions in this original revolution of France were slow of coming, or that they were provoked by foreign aggression. They who speak thus forget, or dissemble the truth. Already, on the 6th October, 1789, the Queen of France had been hunted in her palace, from chamber to chamber, by the bayonets of assassins; and though the agony of her long trial was not consummated until more than two years after, yet from that day it may be said that the throne was undermined. As to foreign aggression, that it did call forth the military strength of France, as a matter of fact cannot be denied. But it had no share in producing the civil disunions, or the bloody excesses which attended them: those were the growth of domestic factions, and were the true original provocations to the regal interference. Nor, supposing this to have been less prompt in coming forward, is there any room to think that a nation, suddenly made conscious of her own stupendous strength, and eager as France was (and is) for occasions of military display, would long have wanted pretexts for war upon the thrones of Europe. Who began, where both sides were eager to begin, is a question impertinent to the purpose. Suffice it, that a revolution of republican tendency from the beginning, though drest at first in smiles and festivals, speedily developed a form which, for five-and-twenty years, gave us cause to mourn

“ For wrong triumphant, battle of battle born,
And sorrow that to fruitless sorrow clung.”

Forty years are gone, and another revolution succeeds, somewhat less pacific in its outbreak, but otherwise of the same character, and tending by possibility to the same results. In that, perhaps, our experience is a snare to us: too certainly the faith of the enthusiasts, who now master the press, is a snare to them. But let us contemplate the case—calmly is hardly allowed to us with respect to events so mighty and so near—steadily, however, and in a spirit of truth.

In 1814, the Bourbons were recalled to France:—by what? Was it the voice of the country? Not exactly so, for the country was then too distracted to have any unity of feeling in what regarded that question. It burned with shame and wrath to see its soil, its very capital, and military eagles, at the mercy of foreigners. That consideration engrossed it; and it is probable, that had the Allied Sovereigns, instead of addressing their liberal overtures to the persons then uppermost in Paris, sent round a circular invitation through France, authorizing the votes of the people, no determinate answer would then have resulted. One craving was at their hearts, which, under the pressure of immediate circumstances, could not hope to be gratified. Some momentary exasperation there was, in parts of France a deep one, towards Napoleon, as the man whose intemperance had provoked a ruin from which his utmost energy was found unable to deliver them. Yet how transitory that feeling was, and how soon it recoiled into the master-yearning of the French mind, appears from the immediate organization of the Violet conspiracy. Hardly in history is there a more striking fact, nor in a purer cause one more noble, than the mysterious whisper, which, in the winter of 1814, went circling through France, of a restoration which was to blossom when the Violets returned. Then, and by the explosion of national enthusiasm which followed the return of Napoleon, whose very breath sufficed to dissipate the Bourbons, a truth was put on record, in respect to the French character, which fifteen years cannot have made obsolete; it is this—that, how much soever the French nation may value civil liberty, they value the national glory still more; that, consequently, a brilliant and fortunate leader will meet with unmeasured indulgence even in his utter abolition of all free institutions; and, on the other hand, that the most conciliatory and popular demeanour, and the most perilous concessions to the cause of civil liberty, will, at the utmost, obtain a toleration (and scarcely a toleration) for a king who is not distinguished by shining personal qualities.

But we are told that Frenchmen are altered, and are no longer the frivolous Frenchmen of Louis XIV. and XV. Heartily we grant it—heartyly we avow our conviction, and our thankfulness, that the noble qualities which belong to the French character have been unfolded and advantageously nursed by the great events of the last half century; and it will be seen, further on, that we are utterly at war with the great stream of German writers in their arrogant estimate of the French as a people essentially below themselves. On the contrary, we hold the Germans to be the meanest and most timid people in Europe; and the French we view as the only nation, which, in its civil relations, approaches the standard of British character. Still it is undeniable, that the military passion, the taste for showy and uncivic glory, is the perilous infirmity of the French mind. Human possessions are never held in absolute security; nor is it fit they should: a state militant, or something tending that way, is indispensable as a condition for ventilating our minds, irritating our exertions, and preserving us from torpor. Antagonist forces, therefore, there must be; but in France they are in morbid overbalance. Nor is it likely that any effectual remedy can be applied to the case, until a generation entirely new shall have possession of France, disciplined by an education more substantially patriotic, and looking back to the still agitating remembrances of Marengo, Austerlitz, or Eylau, as mere heraldic honours, not as personal concerns. As it was, in 1815 those remembrances extinguished all others; and, but for one obstacle, they would have re-seated Napoleon firmly on his throne. The explosion was premature; the Allies had not dissolved themselves; and, what was still less to have been anticipated, their unity of purpose was entire. Twelve months more, and Napoleon would have found Europe open to his intrigues; and in France, at all events, sooner or later, he would have met no organized resistance to his entire resumption of the old military domination.

Yet, at that very point of time, when, for any French opposition, Napoleon had actually triumphed, France knew, that in the opposite scale, and as the alternative for her choice, she had civil liberty and immunity from the conscription. But these blessings, because they were loaded with a Bourbon, and included a long resignation of warlike splendours and revenge, France enthusiastically renounced. This fact is one which cannot be gainsaid. Not only did France submit, without an effort for throwing off his yoke, to the iron sceptre of a military despot, who would brook no whisper of the popular will; but, when liberated from this scourge by enemies who dealt with her more beneficially than she with herself, him and his system, without condition of any kind, she re-adopts freely, cheerfully, triumphantly. Doubtless there is something in the way of palliation: the Bourbon, though nominally restored by the choice of France, was regarded as substantially the creature of foreign protection; and he was a continual record of an odious occupation of the land by Prussian and Austrian bayonets. There was even a generosity in sparing capitulations to an unfortunate leader, at the moment of his approaching struggle with enemies who held the language of extermination. So much is true, that compassion, and a sentiment of wounded national honour, did avail Napoleon to an extent inconceivable in other countries. His situation was held a privileged one; and his misfortunes commanded, for the most part, a forbearance which possibly was destined to cease in the event of his victorious return to Paris. But the capital rights of nations cannot safely be waived or transferred from seasons of critical advantage to such as are (in the strict sense of that word) precarious—that is, existing by treaty, on whatsoever motive of delicate reserve, generosity, or retaliation upon enemies.* And those who, for reasons so passionate or personal, betray a trust of this nature, must go through a discipline of trial and afflicting consequences visibly traced to their own enormous failure, before they can have a title to the confidence of a steadier nation.

Bonaparte was ruined, and the Bourbons were a second time restored. The charter, however, was not withdrawn. In all respects that boon had been ill advised. It gave too much and too little. Coming exclusively from the crown, it was contemplated by the king, and by every administration whom it was possible that the king would approve, as a capable and ready subject for revision, dispensation, and modifications in every degree. Absolute bounty, it was thought, might resume without wrong what had been received without gratitude, and was held with a general disposition to abuse it. In any case the royal munificence would remain good for so much as it should leave. Were but a trifle reserved of the original concessions, lucro ponatur, that was so much to be thankful for—so much more than justice exacted. On those principles arose the censorship. Yet, as, in its origin and tenure, the charter was too much of an act of grace, and not (as it should have been) a petition of right moving upwards from the people—on the other hand, in its substance, it was of a popular cast, beyond all necessity and prudence. There are countries with the very lowest capacities for liberty, to which the charter would have been a less perilous gift than it was to France, simply because it would have been disarmed by the existing institutions, by aristocratic usages, by a spirit of manners favourable to their assertion, by the absence of an overruling capital city, and, above all, by the arrangements of landed property. In France, had there been no other democratic tendency, that single part of the law which regulated the succession to estates would have given to the charter an operation of irresistible weight. Property continually subdivided, nowhere accumulated in abiding masses, made the existence of an aristocracy impossible. Add to this the turbulent—almost the incendiary press—the tone of sentiment prevailing through the chief seminaries of education, the impotence of the priesthood, the concentration in one vast metropolis, and the free communication of general disaffection to the government, combined with great intelligence and republican courage; add finally, the democratic composition of the representative body, and it will be seen that, amongst all the agencies available for a political influence, not one, except the distribution of the revenue, fell into the service of the crown. Titles of honour, and other distinctions of that quality, ceased to have their ancient force; without an organized aristocracy, that branch of the royal functions was defeated; the individual was won, but he brought over no body of dependents. Thus it happened, that of all the prejudices, customs, usages, institutions of the French nation, not one was found to hang a sufflamen or retarding action upon the natural operation of the charter, but united in giving to this democratic constitution an accelerated movement.

With these difficulties the various administrations of Louis XVIII. and Charles X. contended upon various lines of policy, with various ability; and, for the moment, with some variety of success; ultimately there was none, and could be none. All things were rapidly hastening to a crisis, at which the king's government could no longer be conducted by any ministry whom the king would have chosen. A representative government, too improvidently created by the charter, had thrown into the hands of the people a power, which, at length, was matured. They were determined to use it; and it was not within the possibilities that government should prevent them. Without the sanction of majorities in the Chamber of Deputies, public business could not move; and majorities, by any means at the disposal of government, were absolutely unattainable. In this wretched dilemma, and before attempting a coup-d'état, the French ministry turned their thoughts to a coup-de-théâtre. Military success was the one single bait which, in France, could be offered to the public mind. This propitiation was resolved on, and thence came the Algerine expedition. Memorable enough it is, that a measure which the wrongs and indignities of Christendom had invoked for centuries in vain, was at length adopted in good earnest as a ministerial intrigue. The expedition prospered; the resistance had been well calculated, the plans well laid; and it seemed that the ministers were better able to compute the terms of foreign than domestic warfare. As a military success, it could not have been more complete. But whether it were in part that the scale of the affair was too narrow—simply the abatement of a nuisance which it was a dishonour to have tolerated, rather than any glory to have destroyed,—or whether it were entirely and merely that the motive of the expedition became too palpably open to every eye, and, falling out at this particular season, betrayed too much of the ulterior policy upon which the cabinet reckoned,—certain it is that the effect on the public mind was inconsiderable and evanescent. Attempts were made to sustain the interest by exaggerated accounts of the Algerine treasures; and the several portions, as they arrived, were ostentatiously sounded on the public ear. But the days were gone by when such pantomimic artifices could bribe the French people. The great domestic measure, which the foreign one had been meant to mask, was in progress; and not one eye of any intelligence was drawn off from it for a moment. The refractory Chamber had been dissolved, the elections proceeded, the result was past all doubting, and the popular party—that is the nation—were unable to dissemble their triumph.

Now came the final crisis. Upon any possible issue of that crisis a revolution was at hand. It was inevitable. When the Chambers opened, the mere necessities of public business would have compelled the King to dismiss his ministers. But no change of the individuals would have brought any remedy to the evil. One set of men would have been put forward after another, all alike incapable of commanding the votes of the Deputies. Equally useless would it have been to dissolve the House: the same, or a worse, would continually have been returned. No dilemma ever was more perfect. Could the improvidence of the charter, which in sixteen years had brought about such a dead stop to the course of public affairs, be more strikingly illustrated? Without any change whatsoever, except one, viz. in that article of the Charter which determined the composition of the Electoral Colleges, the oppression which now weighed upon the French Cabinet might have been graded. Such change was very possible a few years earlier: now, when the whole nation had become aware in what particular article it was that the secret of their strength lay, when the jewel in the popular coronet was detected, and every eye directed upon it, the time for that attempt was past.

Let us not do injustice to any party. A revolution, we repeat, was inevitable. For what was the alternative which a month or two would have offered to the King's choice? Either to renounce the government of France, solemnly to withdraw himself from a collision with democratic forces, in which the King's conscience might make it impossible for him to participate—or to accept a ministry from the popular party much more republican than that of Dinnourier and his colleagues, which was forced upon Louis XVI.? The truth at length had become evident. The Charter was self-destructory. Pre-supposing a king as the giver, by his own gifts it confounded him. Recognising the monarchy as the centre of the French institutions, it tended, by the new rights which it conferred, to create a republic. It was a misgrowth of organs upon one body fitted to the necessities of another. Sixteen years' developement had brought to maturity these fatal errors in the Charter, and left no shadow of doubt that an explosion was now at hand; and the sole question which remained, was from which side the spark would fall.

A decided step was necessary, for no ministry could have advised the King to yield himself a passive tool to the convulsions which were at hand. As a King, capable of giving charters, he was now on the point of falling: the name of King he might retain, but not the character with which the constitution had clothed him. In what attitude should he meet his fate? Resisting, evading by retirement, or acquiescing? Fatal for himself, and for the credit of his good intentions with posterity, was the decision of his ministers. In an evil hour they resolved upon boldly facing the storm, and extinguishing, by unlawful means, the danger which menaced themselves in a form, alas! not contradictory to the constitution. Accordingly, on the 25th of July, they issued the fatal ordinances which “at one fell swoop” annihilated the liberty of the press, the existing House of Representatives, and the elective franchise of their constituents. Perhaps in calmer times, when history shall look back upon this appalling monument of human rashness, she will have reason to pronounce it the very boldest measure in politics which she has to shew upon her rolls. Upon what did the French Cabinet rely? Upon three props—the army, the fancied merits of their Algerine exploits, and the pauc superstitious which still haunted the dread name of the French Revolution. These were the guarantees which they offered to the King for the security of their acts. It is clear, from the time chosen, that they must have built in some degree upon the impression from the affair of Algiers, (it is even alluded to in the ministerial preface to the ordinances,) and were therefore unwilling that it should evaporate; else it would have been more prudent to allow the Chambers to meet, and to have availed themselves of some violence on their parts, such as would not have failed to offer, under shelter of which they might have here produced the ordinances with more indulgence from the feeling of Europe. They miscalculated in every thing: even the troops were unprepared, and in some instances wanted ammunition. As to the prestige of the word “revolution,” that is now for ever disarmed: and it is strange, at any rate, that they should not have considered how inevitably the young and the poor (the two classes which were chiefly concerned in the three days’ work) would disown that restraint. The levity and the unreflective policy of the French ministers are not the least wonderful features in this stupendous event.

But errors of policy are lost in the guilt of bad faith. At this point we would wish to speak frankly. Whatever were the difficulties of the King’s situation—whatever were the errors of the popular party and the Parisian press, we would be understood to sympathize heartily with the people in their sublime triumph over meditated fraud and perfidy. All is lost, if the rulers of kingdoms are to be tolerated in examples of the vilest treachery. There is an end of confidence amongst men—honour, promises, and religious sanctions become a jest and a mockery, if solemn oaths can be dispensed with for a pretext of expedience. Less than a moral purpose would not have justified the French King in entering upon any hazardous enterprise: and how could that be served by means so immoral as perjury? One sole resource remained to the unfortunate Prince, if he declined (perhaps it was his duty to decline) making himself a party to the revolutionary schemes which were on the point of shaking his throne, and, in the mildest event, of changing the relations in which he stood to his people. Seeing that a degradation was at hand, he might with dignity have anticipated his fate—descending voluntarily from the throne, and solemnly loading the French people with the reproach of ingratitude and blind animosity to the elder house of Bourbon, from which house they had received the very privileges which they now applied to its ruin,—Charles would have won the respectful sympathy of all moderate men through Europe. As it is, commiseration for fallen greatness, and awe-struck contemplation of the mighty ruins of time, are the prevailing sentiments of the thoughtful; but personal respect for the King has received a melancholy shock. The deceptions of his ministers may be answerable for his delusion as regards the policy of the orders in council; but no ministers could dupe his conscience on the obligation of his oaths. Hence we fear that his latter days will be doubly clouded. He would at any rate have been a monument of the wrath of Providence, which is now heavy upon his house, as heretofore upon the house of Stuart. But he might have been a victim altogether without blot or reproach: as it is, he will be admonished by the insults of the unfeeling, that he has co-operated to his own calamities, and has furnished that justification to his enemies, which perhaps they did not venture to hope for, and would have bought at any price.

The die was now cast: the recoil of democracy was like an effort of Titans, or of Earth in her heroic ages. In sixty hours the city of Paris had completed her work:

“All power was given her in the dreadful trance;
Those new-born laws she wither’d like a flame.”

In a week from the publication of the orders in council, the reigning house had abdicated. Doubtless, Charles X. was quickened by the remembrance of his unhappy brother Louis XVI. sinking from weakness to weakness, from concession to concession, until he had nothing more to concede but his own head, and the heads of his dearest friends. The old proverb, "Short is the interval between the prisons of princes and their graves," probably stimulated his determination. But we have no reason to think that he would have shrunk from the trial, had he not been satisfied that it was hopeless. That chapter in the story is therefore closed: Charles X. will perhaps soon hide his "discrowned head" and his afflictions in the sanctuary of the grave: his son is too deficient in personal merits to have any chance of profiting by future revolutions in France; and, if they were the only persons* concerned, we might join in the general cry of our English newspapers—"that the great drama is wound up."

The drama wound up! Is it then indeed so? Have the great Æolian caves been again opened to the levanters of revolution, and shall we—the men of 1830, who look back for

* We have continual reason to observe, that matters of familiar notoriety to people of education, who were contemporary with the events which gave an interest to the facts, are imperfectly known to vast numbers, otherwise well informed, who have come forward in life at a later period. On this account, we shall state the divisions of the House of Bourbon, with the certainty that we shall be giving seasonable information to many of our younger readers. Of the Bourbon House there are four families. I. The family of Charles X. Few people can be ignorant that his eldest son, the Duc d'Angoulême, married his cousin, the Princess Royal of France, only daughter of Louis XVI. and the beautiful Marie Antoinette. On the accession of Charles to the crown, his son and daughter-in-law became Dauphin and Dauphiness. They are childless. The Duc de Berri, younger son of Charles X., was assassinated before his father ascended the throne: he left two children, of whom the eldest is a boy, about ten years of age, said to be an interesting, graceful, and well-educated prince. To his single person, as respects the succession to the crown, the entire hopes of this elder family were at length reduced. Secondly comes the Orleans family. The present head of that family, now King of the French, was Duc de Chartres at the French Revolution of 1789. Naturally following the impulse of his father, who himself signed by the name of Egalité, he escaped the first dangers of the republican era, but was afterwards compelled to emigrate. He lived for a time with Madame Genlis, in Switzerland, (by whom his education had been conducted,) as a protector to her and his young sister, Mademoiselle d'Orleans; and most laudably rose at four o'clock on winter mornings, for the purpose of earning bread for himself and the two ladies, by teaching mathematics. In the Memoirs of Madame de Genlis will be found an interesting account of the early sufferings encountered, with so much fortitude and dignity, by the princely brother and sister. On the death of his father on the scaffold, in 1793, he became Duc d'Orleans. In 1809, he married the daughter of that King of Naples who has recently died. By this lady, an exemplary princess, whose character is entirely of a domestic cast, he has eight children—five sons, of whom the eldest is about twenty, and the youngest about six; and three daughters, of whom the eldest is eighteen—all well educated and promising young people. The whole family are agreeable in manners and personal appearance, some of them strikingly so. Thirdly comes the afflicted, and now expiring house of Condé. About twenty years ago, this family consisted of three generations,—the Prince de Condé, his son the Duc de Bourbon, and lastly the Duc d'Enghuën, son and grandson to the two former. The murder of d'Enghuën, one of the worst acts of Napoleon, left that family in hopeless prostration, the Duc de Bourbon being at that time nearly sixty years old. Some years after, the Prince de Condé died: but the childless Bourbon, from a noble sentiment of reverence for the consecrated title of Condé, refused to assume it. He still lives under his original title. Fourthly, and lastly, (putting out of the question those Bourbons who have long been seated upon thrones,) comes the family of Conti. This statement is familiar as the standing and claims of our own royal family, to those who take an habitual interest in politics: but we repeat, that it will be new to scores of thousands, whose attention to such matters has been first awakened by the late events. By the way, every body who can feel indulgently for amiable vanity and egotism, will regret that the garrulous old Comtesse de Genlis was not spared, as well as La Fayette; his exultation is purely in the triumph of principles, hers would have been personal. The old lady might have been depended upon for a round score of volumes upon the elevation of her pupil to a throne.

forty years—presume to measure their strength, or to calculate their course? Not so: experience is not thus unlearned. Signs and portents even already arise upon us, before the new kingdom is a fortnight old. Already the ancient mobs have begun to intimidate the course of debate; and La Fayette, that father of revolutions and patriarch of sedition, will not always be at hand, to stretch his Neptunian rod over the rising billows. Even La Fayette could not (supposing that he would) have intercepted the organization of a strong republican faction, had the election of a king been delayed for ten days more. For a moment the agitations of irresolute republicanism have been quelled and arrested, by the certainty, that a resolution once taken, under avowed countenance from the prevailing leaders of the state, will and must be maintained. At present, therefore, when an open avowal of republicanism is exposed to the penalties of treason, the ardent young patriots in that school champ their unexpected curb, with as much patience as belongs to their sect and nation. Perhaps also the personal respectability of the Orleans family, for talents, accomplishments, and civic qualities, especially since this family would probably by any party have been placed at the head of affairs under some title or other, may take off the edge of the discontents for a time. Had a republic been immediately established, and had La Fayette been complimented with the titular distinction of First President, he must speedily have resigned a station that would be no sinecure: and who stands forward at this moment prominently enough in public estimation to contest the pretensions of the Duke of Orleans? Even republicans, therefore, satisfied that, under another name, they must have accepted the Duke, will acquiesce for a season; whilst all parties, except those who are careless of consequences, will rejoice that, by such an arrangement, the best course was taken for conciliating foreign powers. The Duke of Orleans, besides all his other advantages, has this, that his position and previous relation to the crown, makes him a pledge of compromise with the extreme principles in both directions. To the foreign potentates, jealous on the article of legitimate succession, the Duke presents a qualified title in blood. On the other hand, to the purists in republicanism, that is not the title upon which he stands, but his popular election.

To meet an emergency, such expedients may answer. But it is the nature of equivocal and ambidexter expedients, that they apply both ways. At present, when all parties seek a pretext to avoid open ruptures, the wound is tented. But what will happen, when all parties are prepared, and eager for the assertion of consequences? The Orleans title will then be canvassed anew. Hypercritics on both sides will insist on flaws which at present they dissemble. For the college of princes, his title in blood may be found bad. For the democratic clubbists, his title by election may be good, but others may be better. What one election has established, a second may defeat. Indeed, the first election will be found self-defeated at any convenient season; for upon what right, precedent, or construction of jurists, did the Representative House undertake to bestow a king upon France? The House of Peers has since, it is true, communicated their approbation. But this act of countersigning was for the satisfaction of their own wounded pride, perhaps their security, rather than to meet any public acknowledged necessity: the instrument was perfect without their concurrence—the patent of creation had passed, and the king was proclaimed. Again, by what privilege, which their constituents could bestow, did that same House annul * the powers of nearly one hundred peers? The late king's authority had been vitiated by the overthrow of the charter: that occurred on, and not before, the 26th of July. All his acts were valid up to that day. The ninety-three disfranchised peers, though yielding partially (for some have protested) to the current of enthusiasm, grew upon as constitutional an origin as those who so lightly sported with their rights. It cannot fail to strike every body in France, that if these particular creations of Charles X. were invalid, all were so. This hint will be improved hereafter. Again, if those peers are found null, what becomes of the numerous legislative acts carried by their majorities? In this one passionate annulment many retrospective consequences are involved, which a Council of the Sections may afterwards more hardily follow out. Here we have again the old revolutionary taint, and the old inconsequence, denounced in 1790, by the greatest man of that age. "They have little regard," said Edmund Burke, speaking of those who proclaimed all thrones vacant which were not elective,—“they have little regard to the obvious consequences of their doctrine, though they may see that it bears positive authority in very few positive institutions of this country. When such an unwarrantable maxim is once established, no one act of the princes who preceded this era of fictitious elections can be valid. Do these theorists mean to invalidate, annul, or to call into question, together with the titles of the whole line of our kings, that great body of our statute law which passed under those whom they treat as usurpers?—to annul laws of inestimable value to our liberties—of as great value, at least, as any which have passed at or since the period of the revolution? If kings who did not owe their crowns to the choice of their people, had no title to make laws, what will become of the statute de tallagio non concedendo? of the petition of right? of the act of habeas corpus?”* These questions are as pertinent now as then. The same questions will be applied in France, as occasions ripen, in a far different spirit—not for the rescinding of the late acts, but for the fearful enlargement of their operation.

Other changes have been made with equal precipitation, but all tending to impress a republican character upon the constitution, upon the Legislative Body, and the functions of the people. The qualifications both of the electors and the candidates are altered: both the great councils of the nation, and the preliminary comitia of the hustings, (which, by the way, are now to be renewed every five years,) are to be thrown open to the violence of youth. Perhaps the new law, in respect to the deputies, might, for itself, have been a prudent one; but the violence of the change, (sinking from forty to thirty years,) the suddenness, and the season, all mark the force of the revolutionary feeling. A change still more extensive in the pecuniary qualification, which is only not carried at the same moment, in consequence of a struggle about the exact point of the depression, will, at the next election, probably multiply the electors in a fourfold proportion. This concurrent change will give effect to the other change in the age of the electors. For the existing qualification in property would not, in any undue extent, have been found in young men of twenty-five. Consequent upon these changes will be an extension of the Chamber itself. And thus a large infusion into the Legislative Body of needy and republican men will soon open such communication with the clubbists and lower democracy of France, as formerly in the States General paved the way to anarchy.

Without the House and within, the same signs are abroad. Banners are already displayed, and these not the transitory ensigns of popular triumph, but the official banners of the commune of Paris, bearing the old watchword—“Liberty and Equality!” The title of Excellency, as applied to the ministers of state, has been proscribed by a public order. Under an instinct of prudence, the new king set the example of abandoning the external honours of his station; and receives the applauses of his country for abjuring those safeguards of rank, which, merely upon a principle of good taste, if any thing so important could be placed on so inadequate a footing, assuredly upon every argument of good sense, ought to encompass those, under whatever name—of king, or consul, or president—who represent the majesty of the nation. It is natural that a roi citoyen should wear such a spirit of manners, which in him, perhaps, is not more a concession to the temper of modern France than to the plain and unpretending character* of his own mind. But these manners, as they argue and proclaim, will inevitably help forward, the tendencies of the times.

These tendencies run headlong into republicanism. For a time, the character of the king will fall in with that current. But a period will come, when he will and must oppose them. For if he is a plain man, he is also a sincere man, and of upright intentions. Had there been any real grievances under the two last Bourbons, (setting aside the censorship for the few last years, which, if we will deal honestly, was provoked by the intemperance and excesses of the press,) we might seek another origin for the disaffection of the nation. As it is, we know and lament that its true origin was the spirit of change and aspiring democracy in the middle and lower classes, a determination widely spread to obtain a stage for anti-social and disorganizing principles, either by war or by civil confusions, which will find an organ and an opening in the late revolution, but assuredly no final satisfaction. To this spirit, promoted by the infusion of young blood into the national deliberations, every thing will be thought (as it truly may be thought) to have been done upon too narrow a basis. Occasions will be sought or created for external quarrel; and the unquiet spirit of discontent with existing institutions will be called up in every land where civilization enough exists to allow a birth and an evolution to such sympathies. Let us not deceive ourselves; the French are, in many of the elements of that character, a noble people,—brave, martial, high-spirited, generous, and daily becoming more intelligent; but they are not eminently a wise people; and, in defiance of the obstinate insults heaped upon their own country by a particular set of journals among us, they are not a moral people, in a degree which will enable them to withstand the temptations likely to unfold themselves. Meantime it is notorious, that a class of English writers, the most unprincipled as individuals, some of them emphatically proscribed as “scamps” among respectable people, and judging, perhaps, by the character of their own associates, have for several years been attacking the British nation, with all the virulence and sarcasm in their power, on its pretensions to a higher tone of morality. Sheer spite and low-bred insolence are the moving forces in these attacks. On the other hand, sounder theorists, for instance the late Mr Chenevix, conducted the attack upon the French, perhaps, with too much asperity and keenness. For our own parts, we grant that the French are improving, and have made astonishing steps in advance since 1789. Growing more comprehensive and liberal in their literary sensibilities, they have grown more thoughtful; an age of great struggles and great events has had the same exalting tendency; and growing more thoughtful, with more extended sensibilities, it was a necessity that they should become more of a moral people. As proofs of the great enlargement in the French intellectual tastes, we need only refer to the striking revolution on the Parisian stage in all that relates to English acting and the English drama; the prevalence for some years back, and the general toleration, of foreign poetry appealing to the higher passions; the encouragement of English and German literature, and even of Grecian and German philosophy, in its most mystical parts. For illustration of all this, the reader may consult the French Globe, a journal conducted by the friends and pupils of Professor Cousin. Still, with all these evidences of increasing depth and reflectiveness of character, it will be long before a solid probity of national character, such as belongs to the English middle orders, a probity triumphant over the temptations of public glory, will be secured. And surely, of the writers we are now alluding to, who insist so much on li-

* Mr Brougham, at the late dinner in celebration of the Yorkshire election, speaking of the new king, declared that “a man more unlike a prince he had never met with.” This was meant as pure praise. But certainly, at the present era, with republicanism so powerfully setting in through every organ in France, a worse present might be conceived to the country than a sovereign whose bias lay in another direction.

Bavaria is the last country from which an original movement of insurrection is to be expected. The king, when prince royal, was popular in the highest degree ; and being a truly enlightened man, with intentions thoroughly patriotic, he has improved the condition of his people, and discerned the signs of the times, so far as was possible for an eye looking downwards from the elevation of a throne. A popular influence, however, more fully sustained by the reaction upon Bavaria of the tumults which can hardly fail to arise in neighbouring countries, will assuredly discover wants not visible to the most benignant king. Such reforms have, in that favoured land, a chance for being pacific.

In Saxony and Prussia it is that we may look for a fiery struggle. The government in both is stern and military ; the jealousy mutual between the court and the people ; and the diffusion of political knowledge prodigious, in spite of every discountenance from the public authorities, (from the Court of Dresden, in particular, a discountenance which is continually increasing in harshness.) The intelligent population of these lands, it must be remembered, are sustained by vindictive feelings, gloomily cherished for sixteen years, as well as by the animating hopes of freedom. They conceive that promises were made to them at the time of the great coalition in 1814, as bribes to their cordial co-operation in the service of those days. That was a service upon which kings and their people embarked with an equal interest ; and it is well known, that in the enquiry which afterwards settled the general claims, considerations were granted to each crown in the ratio of the efforts made. Upon this arrangement the sovereigns carried off the whole rewards, though some share was confessedly due to their subjects. That was to have been redeemed by the performance of their liberal engagements, which as yet have been blankly disowned, or disingenuously evaded. A day of vengeance has been long looked to ; secret societies, with the view of forwarding that event, under a disguise of misleading names, have been extensively formed ; many preparations have been made. We must not deceive ourselves ; the contagion of the scenes in Paris—the power of the example—the overwhelming success—the frenzy of the joy—the thundering applause reverberated from England, will overset all restraints of prudence ; and if the strongest military demonstrations, on the part of the Prussian government, do not overawe the movement, there will be an immediate explosion in that quarter of Europe. The newspapers have given us an article, under the date of Maestricht, which professes to be a cabinet order from Berlin, abjuring all interference with the affairs of France, and allowing a free course to the expression of public opinion along the line of the Prussian frontiers. This article, though generally accredited by the journals, foreign and domestic, wears some appearance of forgery. Supposing it to be authentic, what a concession to the spirit of the age, as contrasted with the policy pursued by Prussia forty years ago ! What a proclamation of her panic !

Still more perilously situated are the Netherlands. So many ties of neighbourhood, familiar use of the French language, and old political connexions, unite the Low Countries with France, that it will require something stronger than the Orange sceptre to repress the progress of the new opinions. Wherever the Rhine flows, we venture to predict, that within eighteen months this great river will water a country changed, or changing, in the spirit of its institutions. The cabinets of the continent are all in one and the same perplexing dilemma ; resisting the freest intercourse with France, and the most liberal expression of sympathy with France, they fall at once into an angry collision with the fermenting popular enthusiasm—a collision which is not unlikely to anticipate the very crisis they fear, in seeking to prevent it. On the other hand, to allow unlimited indulgence to every city that may choose to bandy compliments and congratulations with the commune of Paris, is really nothing else than laying the foundation stone of a revolution, under the tacit sanction of government. States like England, free for ages, are privileged exceptions: England, with the ease and carelessness which belong to robust health, can stand the shock of wild republican ebullitions at dinner parties, or other scenes of public display. But the raw and undisciplined kingdoms of the continent will make a fearful inauguration of their new-born hopes, if they are permitted to build upon a revolution which will teach them that the French charter of 1814 was not sufficient in its concessions for the demands of rational freedom.

Of Southern Europe we speak with more reserve. Those countries are under powerful political influences, but mixed and self-counteracting. Misrule assists the cause of revolution far and wide in Italy, and absolute disorganization in Spain and Portugal. On the other hand, Popish bigotry, to an extent unknown in Austria or Bavaria, throughout Spain, and very much in Portugal, throws its undivided force into the opposite scale. Personal questions, in some instances, interfere to disturb the calculation still further; and few prudent men would attempt to predict the course of events for six consecutive months. The Carlists in Spain, put down with so much difficulty two years ago, are again moving. The mercantile and liberal faction in Oporto, and elsewhere, are again putting out their feelers. Enissaries of revolt will be continually teasing the coasts of the whole Peninsula; and the grievous defect of personal respectability in the reigning sovereigns offers an encouragement to such attempts. In Northern Italy, perhaps the constitutional languor of the natives will yield at length to the double excitement from France and from Germany. But whatever may be the final tendency of the many schisms in both Peninsulas, one thing is perfectly certain—that a long series of new and fierce distractions will be the immediate portions of these harassed (and of the Western Peninsula we may say—exhausted) countries.

These prospects are important to us at any rate—they become a thousand times more important in their relation to our domestic evils. On these, and the menaces they present, we would say a few words. It is the hackneyed artifice of political writers, either out of party violence, as a trick of rhetoric, or by way of stimulating attention, to speak of the country as on the brink of ruin; as though a mighty empire could so easily receive an impulse of that magnitude from the errors of some one individual, or of a single transitory cabinet. Extravagancies of that kind are disdained by men of sense. And we have little need of hyperbole, where the grave realities before us are more than sufficiently alarming. The waters of the great abyss are again abroad: One deep is calling to another—trepidation and panic are spreading over the thrones of Europe: the friends of real liberty are perplexed, and uncertain of the course before them: no William Pitt is at hand to guide us; no “great leading angel” arises to dictate the destinies of Europe; nor could a second Pitt avail us in an age which would not brook the harsh temper of his imperial policy. We depend, therefore, upon the hope of moderation in the present French democracy, not upon any resources of our own, in the event of that hope failing. We rely, it seems, upon the mutable populace of Paris; and, if they should deceive us, we are without compass or anchor. Yet in this state of acknowledged uncertainty, we hear one uniform shout of exultation ascending from men of every party—Whigs, Tories, Bigots, Liberals, Radicals, and Subscribers to the Holy Alliance!

Fatal, if it should prove irretrievable, and most memorable in any case, is the dissolution of party connexions, and the obligations which grew upon them, within the three last years. No longer period than that has been found sufficient to unknit whatsoever it was the subtle policy of our ancestors, sagacious at least as politicians, to bind into fixed combinations. Mr Canning's apostasy, followed afterwards by many lesser apostasies, was the first great shattering blow to the separate cohesion of Whigs and Tories. What insulated fragments might remain of either party, still clinging to some unity of principle and action, received a second and final blow from the general apostasy of the late wicked House of Commons on the Catholic Question. In illustration of this, we copy a few lines from the letter of a friend, who had been absent for about two years from England :—

"Nothing," says he, "strikes me so much, during these five weeks that I have been in London, as the prodigious revolution in the tone of political leaders—those even that preserve their honesty. In the Standard, which seems to be about the ablest of the London papers, I see things daily that two years ago would have stamped any man a radical. Formerly, you and I, and all of our party, pursued a policy with regard to all the proposals of the radical party, such as the honest men in a king's ship pursue towards mutineers. They resist them : and even when the mutineers talk sense, they resist them, because else they would be strengthening the mutineers against the king's officers. At length, however, the ship has gone on shore ; the captain is killed, the officers are drowned, or missing, except a midshipman or two who bear no commission, and the mutineers are individually the most respectable of the survivors. In this situation we consult for the common safety ; and, of course, we listen to any man, mutineer or not, nay, to the ringleader of the mutineers, according as what he says is rational and hopeful. Such I imagine to be our position with respect to the defunct parties of Whig and Tory. And in that way only am I able to explain the continued radicalisms of our friends. They are set loose from all restraints of duty to their party, whom it is no longer possible to serve, because they have split into a thousand fractions, and recombined with all sorts of aliens, runaways, and vagabonds like themselves."

Thus far our friend, whose observation of the phenomena is true to the case which public life now exhibits, and his explanation natural.

Yet we hear continually some foolish voice raised in triumph on the extinction of Whigs and Tories. A single reflection upon the theory of our constitution will satisfy us that this triumph is founded in folly. Philosophically speaking, neither Whigs nor Tories, taken separately, express the truth of our constitution—but both in combination. They are the antagonist forces of the English constitution, as necessary to each other as the centrifugal and centripetal forces in another system, which by mutual hostility produce an equilibrium, and a uniform motion, that could not otherwise have resulted. When Mr Fox, therefore, took as the thesis for his projected History of our Revolution—the justification of the Whig party—meaning that they, and not the Tories, were right and consistent in that great effort of wisdom,—he totally misconceived the philosophy of the case ; since neither Whig principles nor Tory principles prevailed in that measure, as in opposition to each other ; but the two parties met in equilibrio ; and the Revolution belonged equally to both. To one party is confided the conservative charge of the popular powers—to the other of the powers of the crown. Either party, insulated, would represent an abortion ; both together, make up the total constitution. But it was wisely arranged in the practice of our forefathers, that, by consigning the two opposite functions of the constitution to two different organs—Whigs and Tories,—a life and a passionate justice should be secured to the support of each, which would droop and fall into languor or inequality, supposing that one and the same mind were charged with the defence of two opposite principles. One man, from complexional differences of mind, has a keener sensibility to the regal rights—another to the rights of the people. And upon these elementary distinctions which constituted the original meaning of Whig and Tory, grew, or sometimes accidentally supervened, other distinctions which stood in no necessary relation to the characteristic principles of either, but which (equally with such as did) promoted the public service. Thus, for example, the Tories opposed Napoleon ; the Whigs patronised him. The Tories, on the other hand, patronised the Spanish cause ; the Whigs opposed it. In neither case did the political feelings grow at all upon the stock of Whig or Tory principles—but upon the accidental position of the Whigs, as a party out of office, to the Tories as a party then in administration. In other instances, it often happened that the differences had more a reference to the original distinctions of the two parties. But, in any case, this division of parties cast the parts in the public drama, distributed the business, and organized the functions of public life. No other possible arrangement could so effectually provide for the hearty and vigorous administration of the national interests as this which is now so unwisely abandoned. And if it should be argued that the same substantial division of parties still prevails, though abandoning the names of Whig and Tory, this were to boast a mere verbal change, which would be childish indeed. But it is most evident to every observer that it is not so; since the vile apostasy of the late vile House of Commons, there was (as there must always be) a distinction of members as in and out of office; but there the distinction ceased. You could not even distinguish them as Ministerial and Anti-ministerial; for he who opposed Ministers to-day, perhaps gave them his vote to-morrow. Nay, as we now learn by the manifesto of the parties themselves, one weighty division of his late Majesty's Opposition, through the whole of last session, gave their support to the Minister, in the teeth of their own convictions, out of sheer pity for his imbecility, (perhaps, also, out of some lingering hopes for themselves.) In reality, party combinations, on any broad public principles, having been broken by public profligacy, are in a condition which scarcely allows of their restoration. Casual and momentary cohesions for private purposes, and on no one principle whatever,—resembling the shifting pillars of sand in the Great Desert, which mould and un mould themselves as restlessly as northern lights, unable to maintain their consistency for two successive minutes—such are the fractionary and crumbling elements from which the public service is to be furnished. And it may truly be said, that of the late House of Commons, the majority was united by no one principle of connexion, except the perfidious violation of the only great principle they had ever professed. Yes! too lamentably true it is, that the Catholic Question was carried, not by accession of strength to the Whigs, but by desertion of those who used to call themselves Tories. Hence the union of all parties in expressing their scorn of these men. Hence Mr Brougham has lately assured us, that they would just as readily have voted the other way, had the Minister directed them :

so much do those ever hate the traitors who prize the treason. Hence also the single effort of public sentiment through the late elections has been towards those unworthy traitors. For a reason which it would not be decorous to allude to more particularly, as also on account of the imbecility of the Ministry, it has been generally felt by the nation, that any new Parliament at this time might have several chances for proving a short one. For this reason, few persons would go any great lengths in expensive contests; and the elections generally were of the very tamest character. Yet, in a single set of cases, there has been an exception: wheresoever one of the traitors has appeared, he has been a marked man. Witness the seven members of the Peel family (five Peels, Derry Dawson, and the Dean of York) who have all been trampled under foot by public scorn, no family having ever sustained so much public humiliation at one time—"Into what depth thou seest, from what height fallen." From the same cause it has happened, that the few real Whigs and Tories faithful to their principles, have come, by comparison with so many traitors, to look upon each other with mutual esteem, and have even approximated to a Parliamentary union.

We have enlarged upon this question of constitutional parties, their justification, and their present condition, as topics of especial interest and application to the great subject before us. Hence, reverting to the difficulty we stated, we can understand why it is that all parties, and, amongst them, even Tories, in the present relaxation of their principles, have united to applaud the great Revolution of Paris, of which some features are so suspicious, and the consequences as yet so indeterminate and so illimitable. Hence we perceive why so much thoughtless indignation has been poured out upon a paper in the Quarterly Review, which discusses M. Cottu's project of a Dictatorship in France; a paper in which we, who profess ourselves champions of civil liberty as it exists in Great Britain, can perceive much seasonable wisdom, and nothing that is inconsistent with our constitution, provided the writer had more clearly explained himself upon on the possibility of reconciling his schemes with the king's oaths.

Hence also we explain some other phenomena, else unaccountable, in the public meetings of the day; in particular, the rashness with which men of judgment and cautious politics have prejudged the merits of a revolution so imperfectly unfolded. Three years ago they would have acted under a more vigilant sense of responsibility to known and authentic parties. At present, out of Parliament as within it, each man stands upon his separate and momentary views of political expediency, which are often as mutable as they are insulated and detached from all deliberate principles.

But anxiety for the future, at this tremendous epoch, swallows up all other considerations; and our thoughts continually revert to the miserable and fragmentary state of parties among us, more for what it bodes than what it explains; for the fearful dangers which it augurs, than for the mysteries which it interprets. Feelings of nothing less than awe subdue us, when we consider to what hands the Parliamentary management of this overwhelming interest will be confided, for perhaps the decisive period of its progress. Within the walls of Parliament there is even less cohesion, or discipline of mutual support and concert, than without. For if men outside the House have lost their old Parliamentary leaders, and their most authentic monitors on the constitutional boundaries of political distinctions, at least they have no such reasons, as many inside have created for themselves, to forget their principles. Ministers, who have hitherto existed by sufferance and the forbearance of their antagonists, and who, if they are to keep their places for another session, must now be as obsequious to the prevailing passions of the land, as they are despotic in their wishes; representatives of the nation, without union, plans, or leaders; trembling before their constituents, trembling before the journals of Europe, trembling before the organs of democracy and the tribunals of liberalism in London and Paris;—such are the men who will eventually be called upon to discuss and to protect the solemn interests that are staked upon this revolution. Much will depend upon the voice of the English Parliament, if it could be hoped that it would be firmly and powerfully expressed in behalf of moderate counsels and the rights of every party. But the timid politician is rarely just; and it can scarcely be expected that the same men, or nearly so, who lately betrayed the ancient guarantees of their own domestic constitution, will contend with fidelity and earnestness for the revolutionary guarantees which are now become necessary for Europe.

Meantime, whatever becomes of these great interests, to which we shall return at intervals during the awful times which are preparing for us all—as citizens of a magnanimous nation, we point the public indignation to the atrocious spirit in which two or three of the London journals have endeavoured to awaken a spirit of ruffian inhospitality and insult toward the aged Charles X., and the illustrious ladies, as innocent as they are unhappy, who bear him company in his exile. One journal has coolly proposed to deny “a shilling” to purchase bread for the family, or a retreat for their afflictions. Another has pushed its brutality farther, and has called upon the people of Paris to consign their venerable Prince to the “pillory” and the “scourge!” Even the toasts given at some of the public dinners, though less unfeeling, have been violent and sanguinary. We are certain that the generous in France, as well as in England, would wish to spare even the criminal ministers any heavier punishment than exile for life. As to the royal family, they are consecrated by misfortunes in the eyes of all men of feeling. In both the revolutions of France some of them were the earliest sacrifices. Would to God we could believe—they were destined to be the last!

THE MOORS.

ONCE we knew the Highlands absolutely too well—not a nook almost that was not as familiar to us as our brown study. We had not to complain of the lochs, glens, woods, and mountains alone, for having so fastened themselves upon us on a great scale, that we found it impossible to shake them off; but the hardship in our case was, that all the inferior and subordinate component parts of the scenery, many of them dull and dreary enough, and some of them insupportably stupid, had taken it upon themselves so to thrust their intimacy upon us, in all winds and weathers, that without giving them the cut direct, there was no way of escaping from the burden of their friendship. To courteous and humane Christians, such as we have always been, both by name and nature, as far back as we can recollect, it is painful to cut even an impudent stone, or an upsetting tree, that may cross our path uncalled for, or obtrude itself on our privacy, when we wish to be alone in our meditations. Yet, we confess, they used sometimes sorely to try our temper. It is all very well for you, our good sir, to say that such objects are inanimate. So much the worse. Were they animate, the chance is, though like yourself perhaps at times somewhat silly, that they might be reasoned with on the impropriety of interrupting the stream of any man's soliloquies. But being not merely inanimate but irrational, objects of that class know not to keep their own place, which indeed, it may be said in reply, is kept for them by nature. But that Mistress of the Ceremonies, though a personage enjoying a fine green old age, against whom we would not utter one single syllable of disparagement or reproach for ten thousand worlds, and though present at all times, it is true, and at all places, cannot be expected to be equally attentive to the proceedings of all the objects under her control. Accordingly, often when she is not looking, what more common than for a huge hulking fellow of a rock, with an absurd tuft of trees on his head, who has observed you lying half-asleep on the green sward, to hang eaves-dropping, as it were, over your most secret thoughts, which he whispers to the winds, and they to all the clouds!—or for some grotesque and fantastic ash, with a crooked back, and arms disproportionately long, like a giant in extreme old age dwindling into a dwarf, to jut out from the hole in the wall, and should your leaden eyes chance at the time to love the ground, to put his mossy fist right in your unsuspecting and philosophical countenance! In short, it is very possible to know a country so thoroughly well, outside and in, from mountain to molehill, that you get mutually so tired of one another's company, that you are ready to cut each other's throats, and in hatred and disgust, load yourselves with reciprocal imprecations.

So was it once with us and the Highlands. That "too much familiarity breeds contempt," is a wise apothegm we learned many a long year ago, when learning to write large text; and our whole life has been a running commentary upon the theme then set us by that incomparable calligraphist, Butterworth. All "the old familiar faces" occasionally come in for a portion of that feeling; and, on that account, we are glad that we never saw Charles Lamb's. So, some dozen years since, we gave up the Highlands, not wishing to quarrel with them or any country, and confined our tender assiduities to the Lowlands, while, like two great Flats as we were, we kept staring away at each other, with our lives on the same level. All the consequences that might naturally have been expected have ensued; and we are now as heartily sick of the Lowlands, and they, we suspect, of us, as any honest man and his wife in all his Majesty's dominions. What else can we do but revive the "veteris vestigia flammæ," and "totis viribus," make an attack and inroad upon our First Love?

Allow us to offer another view of the subject. There is not about all Old Age one blessing more deserving of its gratitude to heaven, than the gradual badimining of memory brought on by years. In youth, all things, internal and external, are unforgettable, and, by the perpetual presence of passion, oppress the soul. The eye of a woman haunts the victim on whom it may have given a glance, till he leaps, perhaps, out of a four-story window. A beautiful lake, or a sublime mountain, drives a young poet as mad as a March hare. He loses himself in an interminable forest louring all round the horizon of a garret six feet square. Memory and Imagination, in the poor fellow's case, are absolutely but one faculty, or two twisted together into a rope, with which he is ready to hang himself on the slightest or no occasion. It matters not to him whether his eyes be open or shut. He is at the mercy of all Life and all Nature, and not for one hour can he escape from their persecutions. His soul is the slave of the Seven Senses, and each is a tyrant, with instruments of torture, to whom and to which Phalaris, with his brazen bull, was a stale joke. But in old age

"the heart of a man is oppressed with care" no longer; the Seven Tyrants have lost their sceptres, and are dethroned; and the grey-headed gentleman feels that his soul has "set up its rest." His eyes are dazzled no more with insufferable light;—no more his ears tingle with music too exquisite to be borne;—his touch trembles not, as of yore,

And the scents of nature stealing from the balmy mouths of lilies and roses, are deadened in snuff. He is above and beyond the reach of all the long arms of many-handed misery, as he is out of the convulsive clutch of bliss. And is not this the state of best happiness for mortal man? Tranquility! The peaceful air that we breathe as we are westering towards the sunset-regions of our Being, and feel that we are about to drop down for ever out of sight, behind the Sacred Mountains!

All this may be very fine, but cannot be said to help us far on in the Introduction to our intended Article on the Moors. Let us try it again. Old men, we remarked, ought to be thankful to Heaven for their dim memories. Never do we feel that more profoundly than when dreaming about the Highlands. All is confusion. Nothing distinctly do we remember—not even the names of lochs and mountains. Where the devil is Ben Cruachan? At this blessed moment we see his cloud-capped head—but we have clean forgotten the silver sound of the name of the county he encumbers. Ross-shire? Nay, that won't do—he never was at Tain. We are assured by Dr Reid's, Dr Beattie's, and Dugald Stewart's great Instinctive First Principle Belief, that oftener than once, or ten times either, have we been in a day-long hollow among precipices dear to eagles, called Glen-Etive. But where begins or where ends that "severe sojourn," is now to us a mystery—though we hear the sound of the sea and the dashing of cataracts. Yet though all is thus dim in our memory, would you believe it, that nothing is utterly lost? No, not even the thoughts that soared—like eagles vanishing in the light—or that dived—like ravens into the gloom. They all re-appear—those from the Empyrean—these from Hades—reminding us of the good or the evil borne in other days, within the spiritual regions of our far-extended, nay, rather our boundless being! The world of eye and ear is not in reality narrowed because it glimmers; ever and anon, as years advance, a light, direct from heaven, dissipates the gloom, and bright and glorious, as of yore, the landscape laughs to the sea, the sea to heaven, and heaven back again to the gazing spirit that leaps forward to the hailing light with the same divine passion that gave wings to our youth!

All this may be still finer, yet cannot be said, any more than the preceding paragraph, much to help us on with the Introduction to our Article. To come, then, if possible, to the point at once—we are happy that our dim memory and our dim imagination restore and revive in our mind none but the characteristic features of the scenery of the Highlands, unmixed with baser matter, and all floating magnificently through a spiritual haze, so that the whole region is now more than ever idealized,—and in spite of all his present, past, and future prosiness—Christopher North—the moment he images Loch Etive or Loch Awe—is a poet—if ever there was one in this blessed and accursed world.

Why, we are now in Glen-Etive—and sitting at the mouth of our Tent. Our oft-repeated passionate prayer,

“O for a lodge in some vast wilderness!” has once more, after twenty years’ absence, in this magnificent haunt of our fanciful youth and imaginative manhood, been gloriously granted, and Christopher, he thinks, could again bound along these cloud-girdled cliffs like a deer. Nay, ’tis not twenty years since we pitched this self-same snow-white Tent amid the purple heather, by the Linn of Dee! But,

We take no heed of time but by its loss,” so winnowing on the air is even the weariest waving of his care-laden wings! A few yellow weather-stains are on the canvass—“but that not much;” the pole is yet sound—or call it rather mast—for we have hoisted our top-gallant, languidly lifts itself up, an inefficual streamer, in the fitful morning breezes! The dawn is softly—slowly—stealing upon day; for the up-risen sun, though here the edge of his disk as yet be invisible, is diffusing abroad the dewy joy of “the sweet hour of prime,” and all the beauteous eastern region is tinged with a crimson, faint and fine as that which sleeps within the wreaths of the sea-sounding shells. Hark! the eagle’s earliest cry, yet in his eyry! Another hour, and he and his giant mate will be seen spirally ascending the skies, in many a glorious gyration, tutoring their offspring to dally now with the sunshine, as, when their plumes are stronger, they will dally with the storm.

“And lo! the silver cross, to Scotland dear,”

Hundreds of red-deer are now lying half-asleep, half-awake, among thy fern and heather, with their antlers, could our eyes now behold them, motionless as the birch-tree branches with which they are blended in the desert. Or roused from their lair, at the signal-belling of their king, a hero unconquered in a hundred fights, the whole herd rises at once like a grove, and with their stately heads lifted aloft on the weather-gleam, snuff the sweet scent of the morning-air far and wide surcharged with the honey-dew yet unmelting on the heather, and eye with the looks of liberty the glad daylight that mantles the Black Mount with a many-coloured garment. Ha! the first plunge of the salmon in the pool! There again he shoots into the air, white as silver, and new run from the sea!—for Loch-Etive is one of the many million arms of ocean, and bright now are rolling in the billows of the far-heaving tide! Music meet for such a morn and such mountains! Straight stretches the glen for leagues, and then bending through the blue gloom, seems to wind away with one magnificent sweep into infinitude. The Great Glen of Scotland—Glen-More itself—is not more magnificent. But the great glen of Scotland is yet a living forest. Glen-Etive has no woods—and the want of them is sublime. For, centuries ago, pines and oaks, in the course of nature, all perished; and they exist now but in tradition, still wavering on the tongues of old bards, or deep down in the mosses shew their black trunks to the light, when the torrents join the river in spate, and the moor divulges its secrets as in an earthquake. Sweetly sung, thou small, brown, moorland bird, though thy song be but a twitter! And true to thy time—even to a balmy minute—art thou, with thy velvet tunic of black, striped with yellow, as thou windest thy small but not sullen horn—by us called in our pride HUMBLE BEK—but not, methinks, so very humble, while booming high in air in oft-repeated circles, wondering at our Tent, and at the flag that now unfolds its gaudy length like a burnished serpent, as if the smell of some far-off darling heather-bed had touched thy finest instinct—away fleest thou straight southward to that rich flower-store, unerringly as the carrier-pigeon wafting to distant lands some love-message on its wings. Yet humble after all thou art! for 'tis thy chief—thy sole pastime and making thy industry thy delight, to return at shut of day, cheerful even in thy weariness, to thy ground-cell, within the knoll, where, as Fancy dreams, the Fairies dwell—a Silent People in the Land of Peace.

Yestreen we had rather a hard bout of it in the Tent—the Glenlivet was pithy—and Tickler and the Shepherd sustained a total overthrow. They are snoring as if it still were midnight. And is it thus that we sportsmen spend our time on the Moors? Yet while "so many of our poorest subjects are asleep," let us repoint the nib of our pen, and in the eye of the sweet-breath'd morning—moralize.

Thirteen years are over and gone since by the Linn of Dee we pitched—on that famous excursion—THE TENT. Let us sketch the fate of empires—the state of the world at large—from the Battle of Waterloo to the New French Revolution. And let us begin with Maga.

"Like some tall Palm that noiseless fabric grew," may, not noiseless—for the deafest wight that ever strove to hear with his mouth wide open, would have safely sworn that he heard the sound of ten thousand hammers. Neither grew she like a Palm—but like a Banyan-tree. Ever as she threw forth branches from her great unexhausted stem, they were borne down by the weight of their own beauty to the soil—the deep, black rich soil in which she grew, originally sown there by a bird of Paradise, that dropt the seed from her beak as she sailed along in the sunshiny ether—and every limberest spray there again taking root, reascended a stately scion, and so on ceaselessly through all the hours, each in itself a spring-season, till the figurative words of Milton have been magnificently fulfilled:—

—"Her arms

Branching so broad and long, that in the ground

The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow

About the mother tree, a pillar'd shade
High overarch'd, and echoing walks between;

There oft the Ettrick Shepherd,*^h hunting bent,

Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds

At loop-holes cut through thickest shade."

But, alas! for the Odontist! He, the "Delicia generis Humani," is dead. The best of all the Bishops of Bristol is no more. Mansel had not a tithe of his wit—nor has Kaye a tithe of his wisdom. And can it be that we have not yet edited "His Remains!" "Alas! poor Yorick!" If Hamlet could smile even with the skull of the Jester in his hands, whom, when a princely boy, he had loved, hanging on his neck many a thousand times, why may not also we, in our mind's eye seeing that mirthful face "quite chap-fallen," and hearing as if dismally deadened by the dust, the voice that "so often set our table on a roar!" Dr Parr's wig, too, is all out of frizzle; a heavier shot has dishevelled its horse-hair, than ever was sent from the Shepherd's gun; no more shall it be mistaken for owl a-blink on the mid-day bough, or ptarmigan basking in the sun high up among the regions of the snow! It has vanished, with other lost things, to the Moon; and its image alone remains for the next edition of the celebrated treatise "De Rebus Deperditis," a suitable and a welcome frontispiece, transferred thither by the engraver's cunning from the first of those Eight Tomes that might make the Trone tremble, lately laid on the shoulders of Atlas who threatens to put down the Globe, by the least judicious and the most unmerciful of editors that ever imposed upon the light living the heavy dead—John Johnson late of Birmingham, Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the Royal College of Physicians, whose practice is duller than that of all Death's doctors, and his prescriptions in that preface unchristianly severe! ODoherty, likewise, has been gathered to his fathers! The Standard-bearer has lowered his colours before that foe who alone is invincible. The Ensign, let us not fear, has been advanced to a company without purchase; the Adjutant has died in the service, and his widow, the late Mrs Macwhirter of Philadelphia, has applied for a pension, which, if the present shabby set of apostates who misgovern this country have not the grace to grant it, will be given with an open hand by the Coalition ministry, with Grey and Richmond at their head; and for their right and left arms, Vivian and Sadler, the latter rejoicing in the benign laws of Providence, in spite of that Puppy in the Edinburgh Review. Tims was lately rumoured to be in a galloping consumption; but the very terms of the report, about one so sedentary, were sufficient to give it the lie. Though puny, he is far from being unwell; and still engaged in polishing tea-spoons and other plated articles, at a rate cheaper than travelling gipsies do horn. But let us complete our picture of the affairs of Europe at another sitting, and put an end in the Tent to that portentous snore.

* In most editions of Paradise Lost, we believe, it is "Indian herdsman."—C. N.

Tickler—Hogg!

"Arise, awake, or be for ever fallen!"

Ho—ho! gentlemen—so you have had the precaution to sleep in your clothes! The sun, like Maga, is mounting higher and higher in heaven; so let us, we beseech you, to breakfast, and then off to the Moors.

"Substantial breakfast!" by Dugalld Dhu, and by Donald Roy, and by Hamish—heaped up like icebergs round the pole. How nobly stands in the centre that ten-gallon Cask of Glenlivet! Proud is that Round to court his shade—that twenty-pound Salmon lies beneath it, even as yesterday he lay beneath the cliff—a column of light falls from him on that Grouse-Pie—is not that Ham beautiful in the calm consciousness of his protection—and that Tongue mutely eloquent in his praise? Tap him with your knuckles, James, tenderly as if you loved him—and that with all your heart and soul you do—and is not the response firm as from the trunk of the gnarled oak? He is yet "Virgin of Proserpina"—"by Jove" he is; no wanton lip has ever touched his mouth so chaste; so knock out the bung, and let us hear him gurgle. With diviner music does he fill the pitcher, and with a diviner liquidity of light, than ever Naiad, in the fount of Helicon or Castaly, poured into classic urn, gracefully uplifted by Grecian dame to her graceful head, and borne away, with a thanksgiving hymn, to her hut in the olive-grove.

All eggs are good eating; and a vulgar heresy it is—vile and vulgar as that of the Row, though not so impious—which holds that those laid by sea-fowl have a fishy taste. It is a lie. The egg of the Sea-mew is exceeding sweet; so is that of any Gull in the gullet. Pleasant is even the yolk of the Cormorant—in the north of England yeledped the Scarth; and in the Lowlands of Scotland the Black Byuter. Try a Black Byuter's egg, my dear James; for though not newly laid, it has since spring been preserved in butter, and is as fresh as a daisy after a shower. Do not be afraid of stumbling on a brace of embryo Black Byuters in the interior of the globe, for by its weight, that is a maiden egg. You may now smack your lips, Shepherd, loud as if you were smacking your palms, for that yellow morsel was unknown to Vitellius. Don't crush the shell, but throw it into the Etive, that the Fairies may find it at night, and go dancing in the fragile but buoyant canoe, in fits of small shrill laughter, along with the foam-bells over the ebb-tide Rapids above "Conual's raging ferry."

"Sic transit gloria mundi!" The salmon is in shivers, and the grouse-pic has vanished like a dream!

"So fades, so languishes, grows dim, and dies,

All that this world is proud of!"

Only a goose remains! and would that he too were gone to return no more; for he makes me an old man. No tradition survives in the glen of the era at which he flourished. He seems to have belonged to some tribe of the Anseres now extinct; and as for his own single individual self, our senses tell us, in a language not to be misinterpreted, that he must have first become defunct in the darkness of antiquity. But nothing can be too old for a devil—so at supper let us rectify him in Cayenne.

Oh! for David Wilkie, or William Simpson, (while we had sent Gibb to bring away yonder Shieling and its cliff,) to paint a picture—coloured, if possible, from the life—of the interior of our airy Pyramid—door open, and perpendicular canvass walls folded up—that settled, but cloudy sky above, with here its broad blue fields, and there its blue glimpsing glades—this greensward mound in the midst of a wilderness of rock-strewn heather—as much of that one mountain, and as many of these others, as it can be made to hold—that bright bend of the river, where the silver bow is bent—and that white-sanded and shelly and shingly shore at Loch-Etive Head, on which that troop of Tritons are "charging with all their chivalry," still driven back and still returning, to the sound of trumpets, of "flutes and soft recorders," from the sea. On the table, all strewn and scattered "in confusion worse confounded," round the Cask, which

— "dilated stands

Like Teneriffe or Atlas unremoved," what "buttery touches" might be given to the — "reliquias Danaum atque inimitis Achilli."

Then the camp-beds tidily covered and arranged along their own department of the circle—quaint dresses hanging from loops, all the various apprelling for hunter, shooter, fisher, and forester—rods, and baskets, and nets, occupying their picturesque division—fowling-pieces, double and single, rejoicing, through the oil-smooth browniness of their barrels, in the exquisite workmanship of a Mantou and a Lancaster—American rifles, with their stocks more richly silver-chased than you could have thought within reach of the arts in that young and prosperous land—duck-guns, whose formidable and fatal length had, in Lincolnshire, often swept the fens—and on each side of the gate, a brass carronade, on idle hours to awaken the echoes—sitting erect on their hurdies, deer-hound, greyhound, lurcher, pointer, setter, spaniel, varmint, and though last, not least, O'Bronte watching Christopher with his steadfast eyes, slightly raised his large hanging triangular ears, his Thessalian-bull dew-laps betokening keen anxiety to be off and away to the mountain, and with a full view of the white star on his coal-black breast,—

"Plaided and plumed in their tartan array,"

our three chosen Highlanders, chosen for their strength and their fleetness from among the prime children of the mist,—and to say nothing of the Shepherd in his full suit of Galashiels plaiding, sewed so as best to shew his shape, with more than his usual felicity, by the far-famed flying Tailor of Ettrick,—or of Ticker the Tall, who keeps growing after three-score and ten like a stripling, and leaves his mark within a few inches of the top of the pole, arrayed in tights of Kendal green, bright from the skylight of the inimitable Valance, or the matchless Chambers—green too his vest, and green also his tunic—while a green feather in a green bonnet dances in its airy splendour, and gold button-holes give at once lustre and relief to the glowing verdure, (such was Little John, when arrayed in all his glory, to walk behind Robin Hood and Maid Marian, as they glided from tree to tree, in wait for the fallow-deer in merry Sherwood,)—or of North in his Quaker garb—Quaker-like all but in cuffs and flaps, which, when he goes to the Forest, are not—North, with a figure combining in itself all the strength of a William Penn, without any of its corpulency, with all the agility of a Jem Belcher with far more than a Jem Belcher's bottom—with a face exhibiting in rarest union all the philosophy of a Bacon, the benevolence of a Howard, the wisdom of a Wordsworth, the genius of a Byron, the gnosticity of a John Bee, and the up-to-trappishness, combined not only with perfect honesty, but with honour bright of the Sporting Editor of Bell's Life in London,—and then, why if Wilkie or Simpson fail in making a GEM of all that, they are not the men of genius we took them for, that is all, and the art must be at a low ebb indeed in these kingdoms.

Well, Tickler and the Shepherd are gone—with Dugald Dhu, and Donald Roy, and all their auxiliaries—and we and Hamish, Ponto, Piro, Basta, and O'Bronte, are left by ourselves in the Tent. Before we proceed farther, it may not be much amiss, Hamish, to turn up our little fingers—yestreen we were all a leetle obstropelous—and spermaceti is not a more “sovereign remedy for an inward bruise,” than is a hair from the dog's tail that bit you an antidote to any pus that produces rabies in the shape of hydrophobia. Fill up the quech, Hamish! a caulker of Milbank can harm no man at any hour of the day—at least in the Highlands. Sma' Stell, Hamish—assuredly Sma' Stell!

Ere we start, Hamish, play us a Gathering—and then a Pibroch. “The Campbells are coming” is like a storm from the mountain, sweeping Glen-More that roars beneath the hastening hurricane with all its woods. No earthquake like that which accompanies the trampling of ten thousand men. So, round that shoulder, Hamish—and away for a mile up the Glen—then, turning on your heel, blow till proud might be the mother that bore you; and, while we hear “The Campbells are coming,” from the Tent-mouth Christopher will keep up a smart fire from his Pattereroes, answered by all the echoes. Hamish—indeed

On swifter foot was never tied—” for even now as that cloud—rather thunderous in his aspect—settles himself over the Tent—ere five minutes have elapsed—a mile off is the sullen sound of the bagpipe!—music which, if it rouse you not when heard among the mountains, may you henceforth confine yourself—O thou Cockney of all Cockneys—to the Jew's harp. Aye, here's a claymore—let us fling away the scabbard—and in upon the front rank of the bayoneted muskets, till the Saxon array reels, or falls, just where it has been standing, like a swathe of grass. So swept of old the Highlanders—shepherds and herdsmen—down the wooded cliffs of the Pass of Killiekrankie, and while

Mackay's red-coats lay redder in blood among the heather, or passed away like the lurid fragments of a cloud. “The Campbells are coming”—and we will charge with the heroes in the van. The whole clan is maddening along the Moor—and Maccallum More himself is at their head. But we beseech you, O'Bronte! not to look so like a lion—and to hush in your throat and breast that leonine growl—for after all, 'tis but a bagpipe with ribands and all our martial enthusiasm has evaporated in—wind.

But let us inspect Brown Bess. Till sixty, we used a single barrel. At seventy, we took to a double;—but dang detonators—we stick to the flint. “Flint,” says Colonel Hawker, “shoots strongest into the bird.” A percussion-gun is quicker, but flint is fast enough; and it does, indeed, argue rather a confusion than a rapidity of ideas, to find fault with lightning for being too slow. With respect to the flash in the pan, it is but a fair warning to ducks, for example, to dive if they can, and get out of the way of mischief. It is giving birds a chance for their lives, and is it not ungenerous to grudge it? When our gun goes to our shoulder, that chance is but small; for with double-barrel Brown Bess, it is but a word and a blow,—the blow first, and, long before you could say Jack Robinson, the gorcock plays thud on the heather. But we beg leave to set the question at rest for ever by one single clench. We have killed fifty birds—grouse—at fifty successive shots—one bird only to the shot. And mind, not mere pouts, —cheepers—for we are no chicken-butchers—but all thumpers—cocks and hens as big as their parents, and the parents themselves likewise; not one of which fell out of bounds, (to borrow a phrase from the somewhat silly though skilful pastime of pigeon-shooting,) except one that suddenly soared half way up to the moon, and then and tumbled down stone-dead into a loch. Now, what more could have done a detonator in the hands of the devil himself? Satan might have shot as well, perhaps, as Christopher North; and we cannot doubt that his detonator,—given to him in a present, we believe, by Mr D. Ess,—no by Joe Manton—must be, like this, a prime article—one of the best ever manufactured on the percussion system. But what more could he have done? When we had killed our fiftieth bird in style, we put it to the Christian reader, would not the odds have been 6 to 4 on the flint? And would not Satan, at the close of the match ten birds behind, perhaps, and with a bag shamefully rich in poor pouts that would have fallen to the ground had he but thrown salt on their tails, have looked excessively sheepish? True, that in rain or snow the percussion-lock will act, from its detonating power, more correctly than the common flint lock, which, begging its pardon, will then often not act at all; but that is its only advantage, and we confess a great one, especially in Scotland, where it is a libel on the country to say that it always rains, for it almost as often snows. However, spite of wind and weather, we are faithful to flint; nor shall any newfangled invention, howsoever ingenious, wean us from our First Love.

It is melancholy to think, and difficult to account for it, how unfortunate in their respective professions, are, generally, men of genius. Here is Colonel Hawker's sixth edition of his admirable Instructions to Young Sportsmen—(we thank the Colonel for his presentation copy, and beg to assure the public, that the work has received many cunning emendations and additions)—and in the very first page, we see there has been the devil to play and to pay among the gun-makers. About three years and a half, says the Colonel, have elapsed since my last edition was in the press—and in this little time, what a complete revolution has taken place in the shooting world!—or, at all events, among the gun-makers! Joe Manton, the life and soul of the trade, obliged to dispose of all his valuable machinery, and sell off every thing in Hanover Square—then rallied at Marylebone, Park-House, where all was again wreck and confusion, and the best workmen in the world left wandering about like a disbanded army! Poor old Asell, the father of the working-trade, died in Marylebone Hospital! His son darted off as a regimental armourer,—John Hussey, the flash-borer of the age, obliged to fly, with his lath, from the Philistines, and get a crust for his family where he could,—the prince of lock-finishers, Penn, driven to do bye-jobs for his temporary subsistence, and others condescending to go and work for masters who know not half so much as themselves! So much for the establishment of the only man whom any first-rate judge of work could consider as qualified for a leader, or king among the gun-makers.

This is a melancholy picture. But all is not lost. Mr Manton and Son, (is this last Joe Redivivus?) in partnership with Mr Hudson, carry on the old-established House in No. 6, Dover Street, in the best possible manner; while Mr Purdy has, at this moment, perhaps the first business in London, and no man deserves it better. Colonel Hawker once asked Joe Manton whom he considered as the best maker in town, (of course excepting himself,) and his answer was, “Purdy gets up the best work, next to mine.” This was when Purdy occupied a small shop in Prince's Street. Then, Lancaster, who has raised many gun-makers to the head of the trade, by allowing them to put their names to what was his work in all the essential parts of the barrel, has some time since started for himself, as the Colonel had often advised him to do, if ever Joe retired, and the Colonel anticipates that he will, sooner or later, be entitled to the name of leader, vice Joseph Manton.

The Colonel recommended to him, for an assistant, Mr Long, who was formerly a master at Andover, and who has a head little inferior to that of Joseph himself. Mr Wilkinson, junior, an artist of great mechanical talent, has bid adieu to the smoke of the city, and started with his father, in great force, at the West-End, where he appears to have every thing in the first style. Mr Nock, Mr Charles Moore, and Mr Smith, are now quite au fait in the detonating system. Also Mr William Moore, who was an old hand at Joe's, and knew to a hair how to fit a man's shoulder with a gun. Often has the Colonel stood over him, when a journeyman; and no man better pleased him with a job. Depend on it—continues the Colonel—he will do well, and get to the top of the tree; though, like a wise fellow, he starts carefully at first, by feeling his way at a small place, instead of jumping into a “swell” residence, and from that into a gaol, as many people, both in and out of trade, are now-a-days so frequently doing. “Billy Moore” is a right-hand man with the “Knobs,” or crack pigeon-shooters, and their patronage is a host in itself towards a good lift in business. But though Colonel Hawker has pronounced this warm paenegyric on Moore—he never has dealt with him—because, like ourselves, he prefers Lancaster's guns to any others in town.

As for your provincials, Westley Richards is quite the star of Birmingham, with more business than ever; and his Bond-Street agent, Uncle Bishop, is now perhaps the first man in London to serve any gentleman who wants a gun at a few hours' notice. Parsons of Salisbury stands as high as ever in the west of England.

But here is a piece of information at page 6th that does our eyes good. “Since writing thus far,” says the Colonel, “who should I meet but Joe Manton? and what should he announce to me, but that he had set up again—at Burwood Place, in the Edgeware Road—and was coming out with a new patent, ‘that would take the shine out of every thing hitherto invented, and shew what fools all gun-makers have been!’”

Let not youthful, or middle-aged sportsmen—in whose veins the blood yet gallops, canters, or trots—despise us, Monsieur Vieillard, in whose veins the blood creeps like a wearied pedestrian at twilight, hardly able to hobble into the way-side inn—for thus so long preferring the steel-pen to the steel barrel, (the style of both is equally polished)—our Bramah to our Manton. Those two wild young fellows, Tickler and the Shepherd, whose united ages scarcely amount to a century and a quarter, are already slaughtering their way along the mountain side, the one on Bauchaille Etive, and the other on the Black Mount. But we love not to commit murder before meridian—“gentle lover of Nature” as we are—so, in spite of the scorn of the more passionate sportsman, we shall continue for an hour or two longer at this our Leading Article for October, and ever and anon lifting our eyes from whitey-brown paper to whitey-blue sky, from memorandum-book to mountain, and from ink-bottle to loch, we shall delight ourselves, and perchance a few thousand others, by a waking-dream description of Glen-Etive.

'Tis a vast Glen. Not one single human dwelling anywhere speck-like on the river-winding plain,—or nest-like among the brushwood knolls,—or rock-like among the fractured cliffs far up on the mountain region do our eyes behold, eager as they are to discover some symptom of life. Two houses we know to be in the solitude—aye, two—one of them near the head of the Loch, and the other near the head of the Glen—but both far distant from this our Tent, which is pitched between, in the very heart of the desert. We were mistaken in saying that Darness is invisible—for yonder it looms in a sullen light, and before we have finished the sentence, may have again sunk into the moor. Aye, it is gone—for lights and shadows coming and going, we know not whence or whither, here travel all day long—the sole tenants—very ghostlike—and seemingly in their shiftings embued with a sort of dim uncertain life. How far off from our Tent may be the Loch? Some miles—and silently as snow are seen to break the waves along the shore, while beyond them hangs in an aerial haze, high up on the horizon, the gleam of the great blue water. How far off from our Tent may be the mountains at the head of the Glen? Some miles also—for though that speck in the sky into which they upheave their mighty altitudes, be doubtless an eagle, we cannot hear his cry. What giants are these right opposite our Pyramid? Glenco—grim chieftain—and his Tail. What an assemblage of thunder-riven cliffs! This is what may be well called—Nature on a grand scale. And then, how simple! We begin to feel ourselves—in spite of all we can do to support our dignity by our pride—a mightysmall and insignificant personage. We are about six feet high—and every body around us about four thousand. Yes, that is the Four Thousand Feet Club! We had no idea that in any situation we could be such dwindled dwarfs, and such perfect pigmies. Our Tent is about as big as a fircone—and Christopher North an insect! But he can fly as well as creep—and swift

we are settled, in the spirit, a silent thought, on the battlements of this cloud-castle on the summit of Cruachan. What a prospect! Our cloud-castle rests upon a foundation of granite precipices; and down along their thousand chasms, from which the eye recoils, we look on Loch-Etive,

and bearing on its bosom, stationary—so it seems in the sunshine—one snow-white sail! What brings the creature there—and on what errand may she be voyaging up the uninhabited sea-arm that stretches away into the uninhabited mountains? Some poet, perhaps, steers her—sitting at the helm in a dream, and allowing her to dance her own way, at her own will, up and down the green glens and hills of the foam-crested waves—a swell rolling in the beauty of light and music for ever attendant on her, as the sea-mew—for so we choose to name her—pursues her voyage—now on water, and now, as the breezes drop, in the air—elements at times undistinguishable, as the shadows of the clouds and of the mountains mingle their imagery in the sea. Oh! that our head, like that of a spider, were all studded with eyes—that our imagination, sitting in the “palace of the soul,” (a noble expression, borrowed or stolen by Byron from Waller,) might see all at once all the sights from centre to circumference, as if all rallying around her for her own delight, and oppressing her with the poetry of nature—a lyrical, an elegiac, an epic, and a tragic strain! Now the bright blue water-gleams enchain her vision, and are felt to constitute the vital, the essential spirit of the whole—Loch Awe land-serpent, large as serpent of the sea, lying asleep in the sun, with his burnished skin all bedropt with scales of silver and of gold—the lands of Lorn, mottled and speckled with innumerable lakelets, where fancy sees millions of water-lilies riding at anchor in bays where the breezes have all fallen asleep—Oban, splendid among the splendours of that now almost motionless Mediterranean, the mountain-loving Linnhe Loch—Jura, Isla, and nameless other islands, floating far and wide away on—on to Coll and Tiree, beneath the faint horizon drowned in the sea! But now all the eyes in our spider-head are lost in one blaze of undistinguishable glory—for the whole Highlands of Scotland are up in their power against us—rivers, lochs, seas, islands, cliffs, clouds, and mountains—the pen drops from our hand, and here we are—not on the battlements of the air-palace on the summit of Cruachan—but sitting on a tripod or three-legged stool at the mouth of our Tent, with our Article before us, and at our right hand a quech of Glenlivet, fresh drawn from yonder tenguillon cask—and here’s to the health of “Honest men and bonny lasses” all over the globe!

So much for description—an art in which the Public (God bless her, where is she now—and shall we ever see her more?) has been often pleased to say that we excel. But let us off to the Moor. Piro! Ponto! Basta! to your paws! and O’Bronte, unfurl your tail to heaven. Pointers! ye are a noble trio! White, O Ponto! art thou as the foam of the sea! Piro! thou tan of all tans! red art thou as the dun-deer’s hide, and fleet as he, while thou rangest the mountain brow, now hid in heather, and now re-appearing over the rocks! Waur hawk, Basta!—for finest-scented though be thy scarlet nostrils, that one had trick alone hast thou, and whenever that grey wing glances from some pillar-stone in the wilderness, headlong goest thou, O lawless negro! But behave thyself to-day, Basta! and let the kestrel unheeded sail or sun herself on the cliff. As for thee, O Bronte! the sable dog with the star-bright breast, keep thou like a serf at our heels, and when our course lies over the fens and marshes, thou mayst sweep like a hairy hurricane among the flappers, and haply to-day, as yesterday, grip the old drake himself in thy mouth, and, with thy fan-like tail proudly spread in the wind, deposit at thy master's feet, with a smile, the monstrous mallard.

But in what direction shall we go, Hamish; towards what air shall we turn our faces? Over yonder cliffs shall we ascend, and descend into Glen-Creran, where the stony regions that the ptarmigan love melt away into miles of the grouseey heather, while it, as we near the salmon-haunted loch so beautiful, loses itself in woods that mellow all the heights of Glen-Ure and Fasnacloigh with silvan shades, wherein the cushat coos, and the roe glides through the secret covert? Or shall we away up by Kinloch-Etive, and Melnattoran, and Mealgayre, into the Solitude of Streams, that, from all their lofty sources down to the far-distant loch, have never yet brooked, nor will they ever brook, the bondage of bridges, save of some huge stone flung across some chasm above "the raging hell of waters," or trunk of a tree—none but trunks of trees there, and all dead for centuries—that had sunk down where it grew, and spanned the flood that eddies round it with a louder music? Wild region! yet not barren; for there are cattle on a thousand hills, that, wild as the very red-deer, toss their heads as they snuff the feet of rarest stranger, and form round him in a half-alarmed and half-threatening crescent. There flocks of goats—outliers from Dalness—may be seen as if following one another on the very air, along the lichen-stained cliffs that frown down unfathomed abysses—and there, Hamish, is frequent heard the whirring of the gor-cock's wing, and his gobble gathering together his brood scattered by the lightning that in its season—this glorious season, Hamish—volleys through the silence, else far deeper than that of death;—

for the silence of death—that is, of a churchyard filled with tombs—is nothing to the austerity of the noiselessness that prevails over life under the shadow of Unimore and Attchorachan, with their cliffs on which the storms have engraven strange hieroglyphical inscriptions, which, could we but read them wisely, would record the successive ages of the Earth, from the hour when fire or flood first moulded the mountains, down to the very moment, Hamish, that we are speaking, and with small steel-hammer roughening the edges of our flint, that they may fail not to murder. Or shall we away down by Armaddy, where the Fox-Hunter dwells—and through the woods of Inverkinglass and Acharn, "double, double, toil and trouble" overcome the bases of Benanea and Mealcopucaich, and drop down, like two unwearied eagles, into Glen-Scrac, with a peep in the distance of the young tower of Dalmally, and the old turrets of Kilchurn? Rich and rare is the shooting-ground, Hamish, which by that route lies between this our Tent and the many tarns that freshen the wildernesses of Lochananerioch. Say the word—tip the wink—tongue on your cheek—up with your forefinger—and we shall go—for hark, Hamish, our chronometer chimes nine—a long day is yet before us—and what if we be benighted? Think of the silver moon of September, and her train of stars.

All these are splendid schemes—but what say you, Hamish, to one less ambitious, and better adapted to Old Kit. Let us beat all the best bits down by Armaddy—the Forge—Gleno, and Inveraw. We may do that well in some six or seven hours—and then let us try that famous salmon-cast a little way above that last-named mansion—(you have the rod?)—and if time permit, an hour's trolling in Loch Awe below the Pass of the Brander, for one of those gigantic trouts that have immortalized the name of a Maule and a Goldie.—Mercy on us, Shelly, what a beard! You cannot have been shaved since Whitsunday—and never saw we such lengthy love-locks as those dangling at your heels. But let us mount, old Surefoot—mushish in nought but your inveterate aversion to all stumbling—And now for the heather!

Comma—semicolon—colon—full-point! All three scent-struck into attitude steady as stones! That is beautiful. Ponto straight as a rod—Piro in a slight curve—and Basta a perfect semicircle. O'Bronte, down on your marrowbones! But there is no need, Hamish, either for hurry or haste. On such ground, and on such a day, the birds will lie as if they were asleep. Hamish, the flask!—not the powder-flask, you dotterel—but the Glenlivet. 'Tis thus we always love to steady our hand for the first shot. It gives a fine feeling to the forefinger.

Ha! the heads of the old cock and hen, like snakes, above the heather—motionless, but with glaucing eyes—and preparing for the spring. Whirr—whirr—whirr—bang—bang—tapsilleery—tapsalteery—thud—thud—thud! Old cock and old hen both down, Hamish! No mean omen, no awkward augury, of the day's sport. Now for the orphan family—marked ye them round

“Faith and she's the teevil's nainsel—that is she—at the slutin—for may I tine ma mull, and never prie sneeshiu mair, if she hae na richt and left murdered fowre o' the creturs!” —“Four!—why we only covered the old people—but if younkers will cross, 'tis their own fault that they bite the heather.” —“They'rea' fowre spewin', sir, except aye—and her's head's aff—and she's jumpin' about waur nor ony o' them, wi' her bluidy neck. I wuss she mayna tak to her wings again, and owre the knowe. But ca' in that great toozy ootlandish dowie, for he's devourin' them—see hoo he's flingin' them, first aye and then anither, outowre his shoother, and keppin' them afore they touch the grun in his smooth, like a moumtabank wi' a shoor o' oranges!” —“Hamish, are they bagged?” —“Ou aye.” —“Then away to windward, yesonsof bitches—Heavenshow they do their work!”

Up to the time of our grand climacteric, we loved a wide range—and thought nothing of describing and discussing a circle of ten miles diameter in a day, up to our hips in heather. But for these dozen or twenty years by-past, we have preferred a narrow beat, snugly seated on a Sheltie, and pad the hoof on the hill no more. Yonder is the kind of ground we now love—for why should an old man make a toil of a pleasure? 'Tis one of the many small coves belonging to Glen-Etive, and looks down from no very great elevation upon the Loch. Its bottom, and sides nearly half way up, are green pastures, sheep-nibbled as smooth as a lawn—and a rill, dropping in diamonds from the cliffs at its high end, betrays itself, where the water is invisible, by a line of still livelier verdure. An old dilapidated sheep-fold is the only building, and seems to make the scene still more solitary. Above the green pastures are the richest beds and bosoms of heather ever bees murmured on—and above them nothing but bare cliffs. A stiff breeze is now blowing into this cove from the sea-loch; and we shall slaughter the orphan family at our leisure. 'Tis probable they have dropped—single bird after single bird—or in twos and threes—all along the first line of heather that met their flight—and if so, we shall pop them like partridges in turnips. Three points in the game! Each dog, it is manifest, stands to a different lot of feathers; and we shall slaughter them, without dismounting, seriatim. No, Hamish, our crutch. Whirr! Bang! Bag number one, Hamish. Aye, that is right, Ponto—back Basta. Ditto, ditto. Now Ponto and Basta both back Piro—right and left this time—and not one of the brood will be left to cheep of Christopher. Be ready—attend us with the other double-barrel. Whirr! Bang—bang—bang—bang! What think you of that, you son of the mist? There is a shower of feathers! They are all at sixes and sevens upon the greensward at the edge of the heather. Seven birds at four shots! The whole family is now disposed of—father, mother, and eleven children. If such fire still be in the old wood, what must it have been in the green? Let us lie down in the sheltered shade of the mossy walls of the sheep-fold—take a drop of Glenlivet—and philosophize.

Sir James Mackintosh has the credit in the Whig world, and not altogether undeservedly, perhaps, as philosophers go, of being one of the greatest philosophers of the age. He manifestly thinks so himself, though a good-natured, and not exactly an arrogant, man; and does not doubt, that, in his Continuation of Dugald Stewart's Sketch of the History of Moral Science, in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica, (an excellent work,) he has set many long-debated questions for ever at rest. We doubt that—or rather we do not doubt it at all. These questions—one and all of them—Sir James has left just where he found them; and so will every man who shall in future touch them, without having the gift of original genius. We could not but be often struck, as we this morning perused away at Sir James's Treatise in the Tent, by the staleness of the style in which he handles so many interesting subjects. One seldom feels that he is altogether in the wrong; and never that he is altogether in the right. He soon gets to the end of his tether; and is then drawn back with a jerk as soon as he attempts to take a step across the bounds of the old pastures. He is a thinking—a thoughtful man; and comprehends clearly much of what other men wiser than himself have said—but not all. There is often a spirit in their words which escapes him wholly; and an imperfect knowledge of the truth is, in philosophy as in religion, often the very worst ignorance. Yet so well satisfied with himself is the worthy knight, and so convinced is he that his range of reading among the works of the dead, and of his acquaintanceship with the unwritten, or at least unpublished, wisdom of the living, is all-comprehensive, that he scruples not to say, that, in England, there are now but a few glimmerings of moral philosophy; and if we rightly understand his verbose phraseology, in benighted Scotland no glimmer at all, but that a Cimmerian darkness there hangs over the whole science of mind. And the man who thus takes it upon himself to denounce as dunces all the metaphysical students in Great Britain—according to him, indeed, all are but few—but how he knows that he has not deigned to tell us—is, forsooth, a Philosopher!

Now, we are no philosopher at all, although we are about to philosophize; but we should never take up a pen, or a gun, or a jug again, did we not humbly, but firmly, believe that Christopher North—and many thousand other people flourishing in shade or sunshine—knows ten, twenty, fifty times as much and more of the human mind, and all its inward concerns, than Sir James Mackintosh. The general haziness and wateriness of all his disquisitions shew that he is—if not absolutely shallow—far, far indeed from being profound; but that he cannot be himself, in any sense however limited, a great writer, let one sentence prove—one sentence of portentous folly. "The admirable writer whose language has occasioned this illustration, who at an early age HAS MASTERED EVERY SPECIES OF COMPOSITION, will doubtless hold fast to simplicity, which survives all the fashions of deviation from it, and which a man of a genius so fertile has few temptations to forsake." Of whom does Sir James here speak? Credite, posteri, THOMAS BABINGTON M'ALEY! Here is a man who has taken upon himself the task, which the entire tone of his treatise informs us that, in his own opinion, he has successfully performed, of appreciating justly and finely the powers and productions of all moral philosophers in all ages; and who has either the stupidity to think, or the effrontery to say it without thinking it, unblushing and brazen both, that a clever lad or boy, who but a year or two ago began to shave his chin, and who has not even attempted any kind of composition at all, but a prize poem, neither better nor worse than prize poems generally are—that is groaningly stupid—and a few flashy and frothy, but neither uneloquent nor uningenious articles in the Edinburgh Review—such as his critiques on Milton, Dante, and Machiavelli—HAS MASTERED EVERY SPECIES OF COMPOSITION! Well might such a judge of "every species of composition," disparage and undervalue the metaphysical genius and achievements of Dr Thomas Brown! One such insane sentence vitiates all his judgment on all matters either of philosophy or of common sense; and proves him either to be utterly destitute of all true discernment, or capable of sacrificing his regard to truth, and decency, and reputation, to the whim and caprice of a childish friendship. Does it not?

Sir James, somewhere or other, touches on the connexion between Genius and Virtue—and as we have often required of ourselves a comparison between these divinities, we glowered on his page with all our faculties of soul and sense, but could see nothing. Sir James had to draw upon his own stores for any thing he might say on that subject, for none of the wise-men or wisacres who are among the number of his familiars, have, we believe, more than touched it—but the meanness and misery of his lean lucubrations, betray the scantiness and bareness of the pastures on which they have been fed. It is always so with Sir James. He has built some large haystacks, and filled some large barns with wheat-sheaves, but all the provender and victual has been bought or borrowed; and on walking through his farm, we are pained to see the state both of meadow and arable—the one brown in spite of much irrigation, and the other in vain all lying in summer-fallow; nor can we hope, that in any future autumn it will ever produce a crop.

Now let us do for Sir James what Sir James would not, because he could not, do for us, and other Scotch ignoramuses, who know nothing of the human mind. Let us at least give him a few hints; nor let him refuse to hear them, though, unlike that fortunate youth, Mr Thomas Babington M'Auley, so far from having—even in our old age—"mastered every species of composition," we have not the skill even of a journeyman in any, and but in one the power of an apprentice.

Now, without attempting in this sheepfold to define either Genius or Virtue, allow us here to just jot down a few memoranda. Genius and Virtue are felt—by us at least at this moment—to be founded in the capacity, experience, and desire of Happiness.

Genius is of as many kinds as the human intellectual powers have modes of exertion and application—differing either by the internal and metaphysical constitution of its action, or by its matter external to the spirit. Let us then compare Genius, for a few moments, in respect, first, of its universal, and, secondly, of its particular conditions, with Virtue. If we utter nonsense, there is no harm done, for we are bothering nobody in the sheepfold—and should Gurney extend these our shorthand notes, and Ebony, in our absence, admit this part of our article into Maga, let all readers skip the pages if they please till we get into Gleno.

First, then, Virtue produces pleasure. Now, we consider happiness as a sum of durable pleasures. Pleasures are the items and moments of happiness to the individual mind, by which it is exerted, consonant with, and causing, the pleasure of other minds. In like manner does not Genius produce pleasure to the individual mind in which it acts, consonant with and causing the pleasure of other minds? It does. So far the comparison holds good.

How far do they resemble each other in their origin? Virtue is born of pleasure and pain. For it arises, according to our sacred belief, first out of consciousnesses of certain capacities of pleasures—perhaps rather out of consciousnesses of all the capacities of pleasure which were awakened by, or consisted in, so many experiences of pleasure. Soon there ensues a comparison of one kind of pleasure with another, out of which grows preference of the more durable. Also there ensues, perhaps not wholly upon this comparison, but in some mysterious way we know not, a preferring surrender of sensibility and desire to certain modes of pleasure, which appear, in the result, to have been those most agreeing with the happiness of others; e. g. to the pleasure of loving others. Now—know all men—or no men—that to us here, sitting in this sheepfold, in a cove belonging to Glen-Etive, and commanding more than a glimpse of the Loch, a league-long gleam, this preferring of the preferable pleasures seems to be—VIRTUE. So much for its connexion with pleasure. Pain, again, enters into Virtue very variously. There are pains which it is virtuous to avoid; e. g. the pain of self-reproach. There is pain out of which it is virtuous, by enduring it, to draw pleasure; e. g. it is virtuous to derive pleasure from the patient endurance of bodily pain—be it the tic douloureux—cancer—stone—or gout.

It will, we think, be found that the direct and proper effect of pain, acting in either way upon Virtue, that is, shunned by it, or taken in and made part of it, especially in the latter way, is to invigorate Virtue. Pleasure produces—Pain confirms and strengthens.

Now turn to Genius. It too, we say, is born of pleasure and pain—of pleasures let into the mind in ways innumerable and unspeakable. Are they all intellectual? It shall hardly be said so; but still pleasures which Intellect seizes, acknowledges, and appropriates. Some pleasures there are, originally intellectual. Thus the pleasure of the synthesis and analysis of numbers is such; sometimes so early evinced, as to point to an original constitutional determination, and resulting in genius, which, facile and narrow as its materials, elementarily received, appear, yet in powerful minds, is acknowledged as of a high order. The elementary pleasures, again, of colour and sound, appear to us rather to be bodily than intellectual; though it is striking and puzzling that the pleasure of harmony in sound, is the pleasure of a relation of agreement,—who will tell how felt or discerned? You see then, gentle reader, that the boundaries between the properly intellectual and properly sensible elements employed by genius, are hard to draw. The question at present with us—here in this sheepfold—is, how do these pleasures act in evolving genius? What are they to it?

Now it is easily credible, as a general position, that pleasure may serve to excite the intellectual faculties into activity—but we want something more definite. Let us say, then, that when pleasure has been felt from a particular exertion of the purely intellectual faculties, as from the composition and resolution of numbers, the experience of that pleasure becomes a sufficient motive to the mind to re-acquire it, by repeating the action. But further, let us say that the repetition of the action, for the sake of the pleasure, may be either reflective and designed, and distinctly voluntary; or it may be in so small a degree reflective and designed, as scarcely to seem voluntary. The last is—and if ever it could be wholly involuntary, that most of all would be—in our belief—the repetition proper to genius. The mind is attracted—beguiled—won—falls into the action involuntarily and in pure delight.

But farther—whence is this pure delight? Seems it should be, either adventitious or essential. Thus, the pleasure of praise, of self-esteem, and soon, obtained by an intellectual exertion, is adventitious, and belongs particularly, as an incentive, to that intellectual activity and force, which is not genius. But the direct, instantaneous, and unreflective pleasure, which springs in the sudden intuition of a relation,—for instance, according to the different strength of the mind, of parallel lines being prolonged for ever without approaching or diverging,—of the containing by a definition, of the subject of a definition,—of the congruity of a metaphor with the thought to be signified,—is essential. Pleasure of pride may be an adjunct to the pleasure of the intuition, but is not essential. Now the essential pleasure, we hold, pertains to genius—and is of its essence. Whence, then, does it come?

Why have some minds one essential intellectual pleasure, and some another? This distinction of pleasures must be connected with another distinction—viz. of aptitude (see Phrenology) in one mind to discern one class of relations,—in another, another. But does the aptitude induce the pleasure, or the pleasure the aptitude? Doubtless, each induces each in some measure; but sitting here in this sheepfold, we feel assured that there must be a native aptitude to begin with. Let us say, then, that any discernment of relation is a natural source of pleasure, provided it be a quick, active, facile, clear, sure discernment. Then, according to some determination in the intellectual powers given, one mind has this pleasure of discernment as to one class of relations, and another, as to another. And this, we cannot hesitate to say, is the first constituent of difference of genius from genius,—this difference, as it would appear, in the simply intellectual power, and in its very essence. A second, it would appear, is this. The mind is complex. It has a thousand sources of pleasure—all native. So that two minds, having all the thousand sources, the three hundred sources which are much the strongest in one, shall be quite another three hundred from the three hundred which are much the strongest in the other. Take, then, a mind with its characteristic strongest sources. It also has certain distinct intellectual endowments, or discernings of its own. These endowments are among those strongest sources: but are a few of them. Now, see how some of the other sources of pleasure shall work into the action of those intellectual powers, and how this also shall be—Genius! For example, you have the gift of tune, and your flow of feeling is melancholy. If that be not your case—it is ours. Your genius of music—ours at least—shall therefore be tender. Thus have we obtained something of a constitution of genius. Doubt there can be none that education helps to make genius, just as it has a power of destroying it.

Now, having got thus far, let us not speak of that characteristic of the action of genius, its tendency to conform its materials to its own thought and will—but let us say a few words of the happiness of genius. As it arises out of, so it produces, pleasure—the same pleasure “doubled and redoubled.” It is an endless multiplication, by self-evolution, of pleasure. Compare this, with the Moral Will—and then we come to know something of the comparison of Virtue and Genius—the subject which we have all along been philosophizing upon here in the sheepfold. Are not both powers of happiness drawn from the sensibility to pleasure, to pain—in other words, from the capacity of happiness excited and exerted? We have neglected to speak of the influence of pain on genius, but it speaks for itself. It deepens, sharpens, strengthens, lightens through genius, and instructs it in existence. Alas! it cannot be said that there is not will in genius. It is most wilful—though, had we time—which we have not—for we must in a few minutes be up and away—we think we could shew that there is always a personal respect of some sort in that will which is moral or immoral, opposed to an impersonality of genius. But here is a more distinct difference, which may be shewn in two sentences. Moral states of Will are states tending, upon the whole of the mind, to produce happiness. The states of Genius are states tending, upon a part of the mind, to produce it. Moral states do not, by the constitution of the world, necessarily produce happiness—that is, as the world goes—having been constituted capable of disorder, and being disordered. But Moral states, by the constitution of the mind only, if there were no external counteraction, do necessarily produce happiness. On the contrary, Genius, by the constitution of the mind only, does not necessarily produce happiness; but within the mind may be opposed to happiness, may be opposed to morality, may be opposed to the health of the faculties, and therefore, in effect, opposed to itself. There is then in Genius that for which we love it—there is a claim in it on our love, similar to the claim of morality; and we can perceive that our feelings towards them are analogous.

But there is in Genius cause also, why, comparing it with, we should place it under, Morality, as something less divine. What, then, is that disposition which we sometimes find, and to which many yield, to hold equal Genius with Morality? Whenever this is done by a clearly and profoundly understanding mind, it is when we see Morality—not coming from its source in the sacred mountains—not from love, its sole divine source—but from some lower spring. Thus we can conceive fear in certain obvious, and in some deeper measures, as a moral principle of conduct, and yet merely fear of human, either civil or simply social, law, or of eternal consequences. This is policy, and not, in the highest sense, Morality. It is conduct deliberately fitted to second ends to be avoided or attained. Yet as conduct, by its face to the world, it is morality. There must be an analogous imperfect morality of mind, as well as of conduct—an integrity of desire, of will, almost of affection, which nevertheless dissatisfies our judgment and feeling; for the causes are not those which we prefer, but some distinct calculating fears, and these alone. Thus the appetites are laid under the laws of natural and religious sanction. They injure health—they incur far-future torments, penal fire. If, on these grounds, indulging or denying them, so far my conduct is moral, of the kind aforesaid. But with the drawing back in conduct, is there not engendered a shrinking in the moral mind, an abhorrence? For the very appetite itself, the will, the thought, is feared, as inducing that abhorrence. There is restraint inward, of the mind itself, engendered of fear, without which the state of the will is not regarded by us with love. Now, does not all this prove, and also shew, how there may arise a Moral Will less agreeable to us—and justly so, when feeling finely and thinking profoundly—than Genius, in its better and higher workings, in which love, though it were but a love of suns and woods, and stars and waters, predominates? Observe, too, that in the love of Nature—bear witness, O ye mountains, and thou, O Loch-Etive, as now beheld by us from this wild and lone sheepfold! there always breathes some inspiration of other mightier love towards the Being who created the beauty or the magnificence on which we gaze, and gave us souls to see and to enjoy it. Finally, it will, we think, always be found that that Moral Will which we regard with less satisfaction, relates to definite objects, as to theft or murder, or such or such a vice. But the Moral Will which we unreservedly approve, relates to nothing definite; it is an undefined power, universally applicable, applying itself instantaneously and intuitively to the object presented, and acknowledging or rejecting it by its discernings and intimations of the very moment.

We feel, that, were we to say a tithe of what we have got to say on this subject, we should sit here in this sheepfold all day, and lose one of the best days for sport on the moors that ever blew from the skies. Therefore, a very few sentences more.

Observe, that various states of the soul are in themselves so excellent—and so ready for the reception of Virtue—such, for example, as self-command, patience, and steadfastness of purpose—that to the Imagination, which conceives not merely what is, but what is possible to be, which can hardly represent to itself the soul so full of powers, without supposition, at the same time, of their noble application, these very powers themselves receive a part of that esteem which is due to them only when they are applied in the service of Virtue. Now, may we not, without violence, extend the spirit of this remark to those intellectual powers and dispositions which we are always accustomed to contemplate with a feeling resembling that of moral approbation? They belong to the highest state of the soul; to the exaltation of that spirit, of which the highest exaltation is Virtue. How much of that nature, which is indeed moral, must be unfolded in him, in whom either the creative or meditative powers of the mind have attained to great perfection! They are not, strictly speaking, moral indeed; for they may exist apart from all morality. But they have prepared so many faculties of the whole being to be in harmony with Virtue, that we can scarcely regard them without something of the reverence which is justifiable only towards Virtue itself.

In respect, then, to these and other similar qualities, there is always one feeling prevalent in the mind. We regard the soul in the excellence of all its highest powers, as that object to which our moral reverence and love are due. But none of its nobler powers can appear to us in great strength, without giving intimation to our thoughts of something beyond what appears to us. That ennobled state of one power appears connected with the ennobled state of the whole being to which it belongs; and our forward admiration awakes to excellence which is dimly apprehended, but not manifested to our eyes.

Is it not in this way, we ask you, that we look upon the highest genius, imaginative or meditative, as kindred to the highest virtue? When we think of Newton in the silence of midnight reading the radiant records of creative wisdom in the sky, and with something of a seraph's soul, enjoying a delight known but to intellect alone, we cannot but transfer the admiring thoughts with which we have regarded the contemplative philosopher, to what we feel to be the virtue and piety of the man. It is the will of God for which he is searching among the stars of heaven. In the laws which guide those orbs along in their silent beauty, he feels still the presence of the one Great Spirit; so that with the name of Newton are not only associated ideas of vastness and sublimity in our imagination, but thoughts of divine love and mercy in our hearts. Thus every thing low and earthly is discovered from that majestic name. It rises before us pure and beautiful as a planet; and we may be almost said to feel our own immortality in the magnificent power bestowed by the Deity upon a child of dust.

So, too, when we think on the highest triumphs of imaginative Genius, and see it soaring on its unwearied wings through the stainless ether. The innocence of a yet unfallen spirit, and the bliss of its yet unfaded bowers, as breathed upon us in the song of Milton, seems to consecrate to us that great Poet's heart; and we feel the kindred nature of the intellectual and moral spirit of Genius and Virtue, when shewn by his sacred power the image of a sinless world, or, mixed with human, celestial shapes,

"Crowning the glorious hosts of Paradise."

Well, there is indeed an exquisite bit of Still Life! Had we been haranguing viva voce, instead of currente calamo, we should have attributed to our oral eloquence that trauce of profound repose. Often has it been our lot, by our conversational powers, to set the table on a snore! The more stirring the theme, the more soporific the sound of our silver voice. Why, the very day after the Great Public Meeting of the citizens of Edinburgh—called by our most gracious Lord Provost, at the requisition of a hundred men, as he wittily said, of all parties—that is to say, ninety-seven Whigs, two Tories tottering on the threshold of Liberalism, and one nondescript, who, by the coarse insults he brutally heaped on "that grey discrowned head," proved that he was of the class of the king-killers—the very night, we say, after that spirit-stirring, soul-rousing, man-enobling assemblage of all most patriotic in the land we live in, did we, in our own house, descant with such overwhelming eloquence on the New French Revolution, as to set the whole audience, men, women, and children, asleep over their tumblers—all except one of the aforesaid Whigs, and one of the aforesaid tottering Tories; and they had the very narrowest escape we ever witnessed, from what might have been a most melancholy accident. For, at the close of a most complicated paragraph about Prince Polignac, the one fell backwards, chair and all, with a tremendous crash on the floor, and the other fell away forwards, chair and all, on the table, to the destruction of much crystal, and the imminent danger of the great Jug. Never was there such a revolution!—But look there! In a small spot of stationary sunshine—while we have been scribbling in the shade of the sheepfold—lie Hamish, and Surefoot the shelly, O'Bronte, and Ponto, and Piro, and Basta, all sound asleep! Such has been the power of the breath even of our written metaphysics! If ever they be printed, we pity the poor Public. Ourselves even are beginning to be comatose. Dogs are troubled dreamers—but these four are like the dreamless dead. Horses, too, seem often to be witch-ridden in their sleep. But at this moment Surefoot is stretched more like a stone than a shelly in the land of Nod. As for Hamish, were he to lie so braxy-like by himself on the hill, he would be awakened by the bill of the raven digging into his sockets. We are Morpheus and Orpheus in one incarnation—the very Pink of Poppy—the true Spirit of Opium, and of Laudanum the concentrated Essence.

Indeed, gentlemen, you have reason to be ashamed of yourselves—but let us scale those barriers—and away over the table-land between that summit and the head of Gleno. No sooner said than done—and here we are on the level—such a level as the ship finds on the main sea, when in the storm-lull she rides up and down the green swell, before the trade-winds that cool the tropics. The surface of this main land-sea is black in the gloom, and green in the glimmer, and purple in the light, and crimson in the sunshine. O, never looks Nature so magnificent

"As in this varying and uncertain weather,
When gloom and glory force themselves together,
When calm seems stormy, and tempestuous light
At day's meridian lowers like noon of night!"

Dogs! Down—down—down—be stonelike O Shelly—and Hamish sink thou into the heather like a lizard—for if these old dim eyes of ours may be in aught believed, yonder by the edge of the birches stands a Red-Deer snuffing the east wind! Hush! hush! hush! He suspects an enemy in that air—but death comes upon him with stealthy foot, from the west—and if Apollo and Diana—the divinities we so long have worshipped—be now propitious—his antlers shall be entangled in the heather, and his hoofs beat the air in the last agonies. Hamish, the rifle! A tinkle as of iron, and a hiss accompanying the explosion—and the King of the Wilderness, bounding up into the air with all his antlers higher than ever waved chieftain's plume, falls down stone-dead where he stood, for the blue-pill has gone through his vitals, and lightning itself could hardly have withered him into more instantaneous cessation of all life!

He is an enormous animal. What antlers! Roll him over, Hamish, on his side! See, up to our breast, nearly, reaches the topmost branch. He is, what the hunter of old called a "Stag of Ten." His eye has lost the flash of freedom—the tongue, that broused the brushwood, is bitten through by the clenched teeth—the fleetness of his feet has felt that fatal frost—the wild heart is hushed, Hamish—tame, tame, tame; and there the Monarch of the Mountains—the King of the Cliffs—the Grand Lama of the Glens—the Sultan of the Solitudes—the Dey of the Deserts—the Royal Ranger of the Woods and Forests—yea, the very Prince of the Air and Thane of Thunder—"shorn of all his beams," lies motionless as a dead Jackass by the wayside, whose hide was not thought worth the trouble of flaying by his owners the gipsies! "To this complexion has he come at last"—he who at dawn had borrowed the wings of the wind to carry him across the cataracts!

A sudden pang shoots across our heart. What right had we to commit this murder? How, henceforth, shall we dare to hold up our head among the lovers of liberty, after having thus stolen basely from behind on him, the boldest, brightest, and most beautiful of all her sons! We, who for so many years have been just able to hobble, and no more, by aid of the crutch—and who feared to let the heather-bent touch our toe, so sensitive in its gout—We, the old and impotent, all last winter bedridden, and even now seated like a lameter on a shelly, strapped by a patent buckle to a saddle provided with a pummel behind as well as before—such an unwieldy and weary wretch as We—"fat, and scant of breath"—and with our hand almost perpetually pressed against our left side, when a coughing-fit of asthma brings back the stitch seldom an absentee—to assassinate THAT RED-DEER, whose flight on earth could accompany the eagle's in heaven; and not only to assassinate him, but, in a moral vein, to liken his carcass to that of a Jackass! It will not bear farther reflection; so, Hamish, out with your whinger, and carve him a dish fit for the gods—and in a style worthy of Sir Tristrem, Gil Morice, Robin Hood, or Lord Ronald. No; let him lie till nightfall, when we shall be returning from Luvewraw, with strength sufficient to bear him, in quarters, to the Tent. But hark, Hamish, to that sullen croak from the cliff! The old raven of the cove already scents death—

"Sagacious of his quarry from afar!"

But where art thou, Hamish? Aye, yonder is he, wriggling on his very belly, like an adder, through the heather to windward of the croaker, whose nostrils, and eyes, and bill, are now all hungrily fascinated, and as it were already fastened into the very bowels of the beast. His days are numbered. That sly serpent, by circuitous windings insinuating his limber length through among all obstructions, has ascended unseen the drooping shoulder of the cliff, and now cautiously erects his crest within a hundred yards or more of the unsuspecting savage, still uttering at intervals his sullen croak, croak, croak! Something crumbles, and old Sooty, unfolding his huge wings, lifts himself up like Satan, about to sail away for a while into another glen—but the rifle rings among the rocks—the lead has broken his spine—and look! how the demon, head over heels, goes tumbling down, down, down, many hundred fathoms, dashed to pieces and impaled on the sharp-pointed granite! Ere nightfall the bloody fragments will be devoured by his mate. Nothing now will disturb the carcass of the deer. No corbies dare enter the cove where the raven reigned; the hawk prefers grouse to venison, and so does the eagle, who, however, like a good Catholic as he is—this is Friday—has gone out to sea for a fish dinner, which he devours to the music of the waves on some isle-rock. Therefore lie there, dethroned king! till thou art decapitated; and ere the moon wanes, that haunch will tower gloriously on our Tent-table at the Feast of Shells.

What is your private opinion, O'Bronte, of the taste of Red-deer blood? Has it not a wild twang on the tongue and palate, far preferable to sheep's-head? You are absolutely undergoing transfiguration into a deer-hound! With your fore-paws on the flank, your tail brandished like a standard, and your crimson flews (thank you, Shepherd, for that word) licked by a long lambent tongue as crimson, while your eyes express a fierce delight never felt before, and a stifled growl disturbs the star on your breast—just as you stand now, O'Bronte, might Edwin Landseer rejoice to paint thy picture, for which—inmortal image of the wilderness—the Duke of Bedford would not scruple to give a draft on his banker for one thousand pounds!

Shooting grouse after red-deer is, for a while at first, felt to be like writing an anagram in a lady's album, after having given the finishing touch to a tragedy or an epic poem—or, to illustrate the contrast by a still more striking simile, like inditing some stanzas for one of the Annuals, after having given birth to a portentous Leading Article for the October number of Maga. 'Tis like taking to catching shrimps in the sand with one's toes, on one's return from Davis's Straits in a whaler that arrived at Peterhead with sixteen fish, each calculated at ten tun of oil. Yet, 'tis strange how the human soul can descend, pleasantly at every note, from the top to the bottom of the gamut of passion and imagination. We should have no objection, now that the storm has subsided within us, even to shoot a snipe, a tom-tit, and, finally, a kiddy-wren. Nay at no time, even during the height of the fever of noblest sport, should we hesitate to riddle a rat—that is, to peel an apostate.

Let us take a cast, then, over this wide moor. Ha! ha! a hare!—Bang! How like you that, madam white-hips? Not a shred have we left of her horn-like ears; and the slut has drawn herself up, with all her limbs close to her perforated body, in the palsy of sudden death. Hamish, we shall give you a song. Join in the chorus.

THE POWCHER'S SONG.

A Tarn—a Tarn! with but a small circle of unbroken water in the centre, and all the rest of its shallowness bristling, in every bay, with reeds and rushes, and surrounded, all round the mossy flat, with marshes and quagmires! What a breeding-place—a “procreant cradle” for wild fowl! Now comes thy turn, O’-Bronte—for famous is thy name, almost as thy sire’s, among the flappers. Crawl down to leeward, Hamish, that you may pepper them—should they take to flight overhead to the loch. Surefoot, taste that greensward, and you will find it sweet and succulent. Dogs, heel—heel!—and now let us steal, on our crutch, behind that knoll, and open a sudden fire on the swimmers, who seem to think themselves out of shot at the edge of that line of water-lilies, but some of them will soon find themselves mistaken, whirling round on their backs, and vainly endeavouring to dive after their friends that disappear beneath the agitated surface shot-swept into spray. Long Gun! who oft to the forefinger of Colonel Hawker hast swept the night-harbour of Poole all alive with wigeons, be true to the trust now reposed in thee by Kit North, and though these be neither geese, nor swans, nor hoopers, yet send thy leaden shower of shot among them feeding in their play, till all the air is afloat with specks, as if at the shaking of a feather-bed that had burst the ticking, and the tarn covered with sprawling mawsies and mallards, in death-throes among the ducklings! There it lies on its rest—like a telescope. No eye has discovered the invention—keen as those wild eyes are of the plowterers on the shallows. Lightning and thunder! to which all the echoes roar. But we meanwhile are on our back—for of all the recoils that ever shattered a shoulder, that one was the severest—but ’twill probably cure our rheumatism and—Well done—nobly, gloriously done—O’Bronte! Heaven and earth, how otter-like he swims! Ha, Hamish! you have cut off the retreat of that airy voyager—you have given it him in his stern, Hamish—and are reloading for the flappers. One at a time in your mouth, O’Bronte! Put about with that tail for a rudder—and make for the shore. What a stately creature! as he comes issuing from the shallows, and, bearing the old mallard breast high, walks all dripping along the greensward, and then shakes from his curled ebony the flashing spray-mist! He gives us one look as we crown the knoll, and then in again with a spang and a plunge far into the tarn, caring no more for the living reeds than for so many dead, and fast as a sea-serpent, is among the heart of the killed and wounded! In unerring instinct he always seizes the dead—and now a devil's dozen lie along the shore. Come hither, O'Bronte, and caress thy old master. Aye—that shewed a fine feeling—did that long shake that bedrizzled the sunshine. Put thy paws over our shoulders, and round our neck, true son of thy sire—oh! that we were but alive, to see and share thy achievements—but indeed, two such dogs, living together in their prime at one era, would have been too great glory for this sublimary canine world! Therefore Sirius looked on thy sire with an evil eye, and in jealousy,— growled upon some sinner to poison the Dog of all Dogs, who leapt up almost to the ceiling of the room where he slept—our own bedroom—under the agony of that accursed arsenic, gave one horrid howl, and expired. Methinks we know his murderer—his eye falls when it meets ours on the street of Princes—and let him scowl there but seldom—for though 'tis but suspicion, this fist, O'Bronte, doubles at the sight of the miscreant—and some day, impelled by wrath and disgust, it will smash his nose flat with the other features, till his face is one mass of blood. Yea! as sure as Themis holds her balance in the skies, shall the poisoner be punished out of all recognition by his parents, and be disowned by the Cockney father that begot him, and the Cockney mother that bore him, as he carries home a countenance, half tripe and half pancake, enough to make his paramour, the scullion, miscarry, as she opens the door to him, on the fifth flat of a common stair. But we are getting personal, O'Bronte, a vice which is abhorrent from the nature of Maga, and of him whose highest happiness it is to lie in her gracious arms.

There goes our crutch, Hamish, whirling aloft in the sky a rainbow flight, even like the ten-pound hammer from the fling of George Scougal, at the St Ronan's games. We shall never use it more, James, but to crack the skull of a Cockney. Our gout is gone—so is our asthma—eke our rheumatism—and, like an eagle, we have renewed our youth. There is hop, step, and jump, for you, Hamish—we should not fear, young and agile as you are, buck, to give you a yard. But now for the flappers. Pointers all, stir your stumps and into the water. This is rich. Why, the reeds are as full of flappers as of frogs. If they can fly, the fools don't know it. Why, there is a whole musquitto-fleet of yellow boys, not a week old. What a prolific old lady must she have been, to have kept on breeding till September. There she sits, cowering, just on the edge of the reeds, uncertain whether to dive or fly. By the creak and cry of the cradle of thy first-born, Hamish, spare the plumage on her yearning and quaking breast! The little yellow images have all melted away, and are now, in holy cunning of instinct, deep down beneath the waters, shifting for themselves among the very mud at the bottom of the reeds. By and bye, they will be floating with but the points of their bills above the surface, invisible among the air-bells. The parent duck has also disappeared; the drake you disposed of, Hamish, as the coward was lifting up his lumbering body, with fat doup and long neck in the air, to seek safer skies. We male creatures—drakes, ganders, and men alike—what are we, when affection pleads, in comparison with fearless females! In our passions we are brave, but these satiated, we turn upon our heel and disappear from danger, like dastards. But doves, and ducks, and women, are fearless in affection, to the very death. For that have we all our days, sleeping or waking, loved the sex, virgin and matron, nor would we hurt a hair of their heads, grey or golden, for all else that shines beneath the sun.

Not the best practice this in the world, certainly, for pointers—and it may teach them bad habits on the hill; but, in some situations, all dogs and men are alike, and cross them as you will, not a breed but shews a taint of original sin, when under a temptation sufficiently strong to bring it out. Ponto, Piro, and Basta, are now, according to their abilities, all as bad as O'Bronte—and never, to be sure, was there such a worrying in this wicked world.—But now we shall cease our fire, and leave the few flappers that are left alive to their own meditations. Our conduct, for the last hour, must have seemed to them no less unaccountable than alarming; and something to quack over during the rest of the season. Well, we do not remember ever to have seen a prettier pile of ducks and ducklings. Hamish, take census. What do you say—two score? That beats cock-fighting. Here's a bank of twine, Hamish, tie them all together by the legs, and hang them, in two divisions of equal weights, over the hurdles of Surefoot. And now, we must be jogging.

“ But what are these,
So wither'd and so wild in their attire;
That look not like th' inhabitants o' the earth,
And yet are on't? Live you? or are you aught
That man may question? You seem to understand me,
By each at once her choppy finger laying Upon her skinny lips—you should be women,
And yet your beards forbid me to interpret
That you are so!”

Shakspeare is not familiar, we find, among the natives of Loch-Etive side—else these figures would reply, “ All hail, Macbeth! hail to thee, Thane of Glamis!”

But not satisfied with laying their choppy fingers on their skinny lips, they now put them to their plooky noses, having first each dipped fore and thumb in his mull, and gibber Gaelic, to us unintelligible as the quacking of ducks, when a Christian auditor has been prevented from catching its meaning by the gobbling of turkeys. But Hamish tips us the wink—and charms our auricles by the two magic words of pure Sassennach, “ Sma' stell!”

A green knoll among the heath and birch-covered cliffs at “ open sesame” unfolds its low door of living turf, and we enter in—dogs and all—the reek-dim domicile, where the indigenous genii are brewing the Spirit of Life. Genuine peat-reek, indeed, as you may tell—without tasting it—by the very steam. The worm that never dies is at work—yet no evil conscience is here—for who but some knave or fool belonging to a Temperance Society—some humbug or some hypocrite—but feels a heartfelt satisfaction—a deep and divine calm—at the secret spectacle of the violation of the excise laws, by which man iniquitously strives against malt, and vainly hopes by the mortal matter of stupid enactments, passed in noisy cities, to put down the immortal spirit working in the still, and on the sly, among the solitudes of nature!

People are proud of talking of solitude. It redounds, they opine, to the honour of their great-mindedness, to be thought capable of living, for an hour or two, by themselves, at a considerable distance from knots or skeins of their fellow-creatures. Byron, again, thought he shewed his superiority, by swearing as solemnly as a man can do in the Spenserian stanza, that fell,”

has nothing whatever to do with solitude—and that if you wish to know and feel what solitude really is, you must go to Almack's.

“ This—this is solitude—this is to be alone!”

His Lordship's opinions were often peculiar—but the passage has been much admired, therefore we are willing to believe, that what is called the Great Desert—not Sewell's Desert—for that is called the Small Desert, alias Dirty Dartmoor—is, in point of loneliness, unable to stand a philosophical, much less a poetical comparison, with a well-frequented Fancy-ball. But we shrewdly suspect that the statements neither of BYRON nor STOKES are borne out by facts. Zoology is against them—more especially those two of its most interesting branches, Entomology and Ornithology, while they are equally at variance with the natural history of their own respective species, man and monkey.

Go to a desert and clap your back against a cliff. Do you think yourself alone? What a ninny! Your great clumsy splay feet are bruising to death a batch of beetles. See that spider whom you have widowed, running up and down your elegant leg, in distraction and despair, bewailing the loss of a husband, who, however savage to the ephemerals, had always smiled sweetly upon her! Meanwhile, your shoulders have crushed a colony of small red ants settled in a moss city beautifully roofed with lichens—and that accounts for the sharp tickling behind your ear, which you keep scratching, no Solomon, in shameful ignorance of the cause of that effect. Should you sit down—we must beg to draw a veil over your hurdies, which at the moment extinguish a fearful amount of animal life—creation may be said to groan under them; and insect as you are yourself, you are defrauding millions of insects of their little day. All the while you are supposing yourself alone! Now, are you not, as we hinted, a prodigious ninny? But you are a still bigger blockhead. For the whole wilderness—as you choose to call it—is crawling with various life. London, with its million and a half of inhabitants—including of course the suburbs—is, compared with it, an empty joke. Die—and you will soon be picked to the bones. The air swarms with sharpers—and an insurrection of radicals will attack your corpse from the worm-holes of the earth. Corbies, ravens, hawks, eagles, all the feathered furies of beak and bill, will come flying ere sunset to anticipate the maggots, and carry your remains—if you will allow us to call them so—over the whole of Argyleshire in many living sepulchres. We confess ourselves unable to see the solitude of this—and begin to agree with Byron, that a man is less crowded at a masquerade.

But the same subject may be illustrated less tragically, and even with some slight comic effect. A man among mountains is often surrounded on all sides with mice and moles. What cozy nests do the former construct at the roots of heather, among tufts of grass in the rashes, and the moss on the green-sward! As for the latter, though you think you know a mountain from a molehill, you are much mistaken; for what is a mountain, in many cases, but a collection of molehills—and of fairy knolls? which again introduce a new element into the composition, and shew, in still more glaring colours, your absurdity in supposing yourself to be in solitude. The “Silent People” are around you at every step. You may not see them—for they are dressed in invisible green; but they see you, and that unaccountable whispering and buzzing sound one often hears in what we call the wilderness, what is it, or what can it be, but the fairies making merry at your expense, pointing out to each other the extreme silliness of your meditative countenance, and laughing like to split at your fond conceit of being alone among a multitude of creatures far wiser than yourself?

But should all this fail to convince you, that you are never less alone than when you think yourself alone, and that a man never knows what it is to be in the very heart of life, till he leaves London, and takes a walk in Glen-Etive—suppose yourself to have been leaning with your back against that knoll, dreaming of the far-off race of men, when all at once the support gives way inwards, and you tumble head over heels in among a snug coterie of kilted Celts, in the very act of creating Glenlivet, in a great warlock’s cauldron, seething to the top with the Spirit of Life!

Such fancies as these, among many others, were with us in the Still. But a glimmering and a humming and a dizzy bewilderment hangs over that time and place, finally dying away in sickness into total oblivion. Here are we sitting in a glade of a birch-wood in what must be Gleno—some miles from the Still. Hamish asleep, as usual, whenever he lies down, and all the dogs yowffing in dreams, and Surefoot standing with his long beard above ours almost the same in longitude. We have been more, we suspect, than half-dead over, and are now lying on the shore of sobriety, almost a wreck. The truth is, that the new spirit is even more dangerous than the new light. Both at first dazzle, then obfuscate, and lastly darken the soul and its seven senses into temporary death. There is, we fear, but one word of one syllable in the English language that could fully express our late condition. Let our subscribers solve the enigma. Oh! those quechs! By “What drugs, what spells,

What conjurations, and what mighty magic,”

was Christopher overthrown! A strange confusion of sexes, as of men in petticoats and women in breeches—gowns transmogrified into jackets—caps into bonnets—and thick naked hairy legs into slim ankles decent in hose—all whirling and dancing somewhere by dim and obscure, to the sound of something groaning and yelling, sometimes inarticulately, as if it came from something instrumental, and then mixed up with a wild gibberish, as if shrieking, somehow or other, from living lips, human and brute—for a dream of yowling dogs is over all—utterly confounds us as we strive to muster in recollection the few last hours that have passed tumultuously through our brain—and then a wide black moor, sometimes covered with day, sometimes with night, stretches around us, hemmed in on all sides by the tops of mountains, seeming to reel in the sky. Frequent flashes of fire, and a whirring as of the wings of birds—but sound and sight alike uncertain—break again upon our dream. Let us not mince the matter—we can afford the confession—we have been overtaken by liquor—sadly intoxicated—out with it at once—drunk! Frown not, fairest of all sweet subscribers—for we lay our calamity, not to the charge of the Glenlivet circling in countless quechs, but at the door of that inveterate enemy to sobriety—the Fresh Air.

But now we are as sober as a judge. Pity our misfortune—rather than forgive our sin. We entered that Still in a State of innocence before the Fall. Where we fell, we know not—often, perhaps—in divers ways and sundry places—between the magic cell on the breast of Benachochie, and this glade in Gleno. But,

fall among heather.”

Surefoot, we suppose, kept himself tolerably sober—and O’Bronte, at each successive cloit, must have assisted us to remount—for Hamish, from his style of sleeping, must have been as bad as his master—and after all, it is wonderful to think how we got here—over hags, and mosses, and marshes, and quagmires, like those in which

But the truth is, that, never in the whole course of our lives—and that course has been a strange one—did we once lose our way. Set us down blindfolded on Zahara, and we will beat the caravan to Timbuctoo. Something or other mysteriously indicative of the right direction touches the soles of our feet in the shape of the ground they tread; and even when our souls have gone soaring far away, or have sunk within us, still have our feet pursued the shortest and the safest path that leads to the bourne of our pilgrimage. Is not that strange? But not stranger surely than the flight of the bee, on his first voyage over the caves of the wilderness to the far-off heather-bells—or of the dove that is sent by some Jew stock-jobber, to communicate to Dutchmen the rise or fall of the funds, from London to Hamburg, from the clear shores of silver Thames to the muddy shallows of the Zuyder-Zee.

Let us inspect the state of Brown Bess. Right barrel empty—left barrel—what is the meaning of this?—crammed to the muzzle! aye, that comes of visiting Stills! We have been snapping away at the coveys, and single birds all over the moor, without so much as a pluff, with the right-hand cock—and then, imagining that we had fired, have kept loading away at the bore to the left, till, see! the ramrod absolutely stands upright in the air, with only about three inches hidden in the hollow! What a narrow—a miraculous escape has the world had of losing Christopher North for ever! Had he drawn that trigger instead of this, Brown Bess would have burst to a moral certainty, and blown the old gentleman piecemeal and in fragments over the astonished heather. “In the midst of life we are in death!” Could we but know one in a hundred of the close approachings of the skeleton, we should lead a life of perpetual shudder. Often and often do his bony fingers almost clutch our throat, or his foot is put out to give us a cross-buttock. But a saving arm pulls him back, ere we have seen so much as his shadow. We believe all this—but the belief that comes not from something steadfastly present before our eyes, is barren; and thus it is, since believing is not seeing, that we walk hoodwinked nearly all our days, and worst of all blindness is that of ingratitude and forgetfulness of Him whose shield is for ever over us, and whose mercy shall be with us in the grave, and in the world beyond the grave.

By all that is most beautifully wild in animated nature, a roe! a roe! Shall we slay her where she stands, or let her vanish in silent glidings in among her native woods? What a fool for asking ourselves such a question! Slay her where she stands, to be sure—for many pleasant seasons hath she led in her leafy lairs, a life of leisure, delight, and love, and the hour is come when she must sink down on her knees in a sudden and unpainful death—fair silvan dreamer! We have drawn that multitudinous shot—and both barrels of Brown Bess now are loaded with ball—for Hamish is lying with his head on the rifle. Whiz! whiz! one is through her lungs, and another through her neck—and seemingly rather to sleep than die, (so various are the many modes of expiration!)

"In quietness she lays her down
Gently, as a weary wave
Sinks, when the summer breeze has died,
Against an anchor'd vessel's side."

Aye—Hamish—you may start to your feet—and see realized the vision of your sleep. What a set of distracted dogs! But O'Bronte first catches sight of the quarry—and clearing, with grasshopper spangs, the patches of stunted coppice, stops stock-still beside the roe in the glade, as if admiring and wondering at the beauty of the fair spotted creature! Yes, dogs have a sense of the beautiful. Else how can you account for their loving so to lie down at the feet, and lick the hands of the virgin, whose eyes are mild, and forehead meek, and hair of placid sunshine, rather than act the same part towards ugly women, who, coarser and coarser in each successive widowhood, when at their fourth husband, are beyond expression hideous, and felt to be so by the whole canine tribe? Spenser must have seen some dog like O'Bronte, lying at the feet and licking the hand of some virgin—sweet reader, like thyself—else never had he painted the posture of that lion who guarded through Fairy-land

"Heavenly Una and her milk-white lamb."

A divine line of Wordsworth's, which we shall never cease quoting on to the last article we may write, even on our dying day!

But where, Hamish, are all the flappers, the mawsies, and the maulards? What! You have left them—hare, grouse, bag, and all, at the Still! We remember it now—and all the distillers are to-night to be at our Tent, bringing with them feathers, fur, and hide—ducks, pussey, and deer. But take the roe on your stalwart shoulders, Hamish, and bear it down to the silvan dwelling at the mouth of Gleno. Surefoot has a sufficient burden in us—for we are waxing more corpulent every day—and ere long shall be a Silenus.

Aye, travel all the world over, and a human dwelling lovelier in its wildness shall you nowhere find, than the one that hides itself in the depth of its own beauty, beneath the last of the green knolls besprinkling Gleno, dropt down there in presence of the peacefullest bay of all Loch-Etive, in whose cloud-softened bosom it sees itself reflected among the congenial imagery of the skies. And, hark! a murmur as of swarming bees! 'Tis a Gaelic school—set down in this loneliest of all places, by that religious wisdom that rests not till the seeds of saving knowledge shall be sown over all the wilds. That grey-haired minister of God, whom all Scotland venerates, hath been here from the great city on one of his holy pilgrimages. And, lo! at his bidding, and that of his co-adjutors in the heavenly work, a schoolroom has risen with its blue roof—the pure diamond-sparkling slates of Ballahulish—beneath a tuft of breeze-breaking trees! But whence came they—the little scholars—who are all murmuring there? We said that the shores of Loch-Etive were desolate. So seem they to the eye of Imagination, that loves to gather up a hundred scenes into one, and to breathe over the whole the lonesome spirit of one vast wilderness. But Imagination was a liar ever—a romancer and a dealer in dreams. Hers are the realms of fiction,

But the land of truth is ever the haunt of the heart—there her eye reposes or expatiates, and what sweet, humble, and lowly visions arise before it, in a light that fadeth not away, but abideth for ever! Cottages, huts, shielings, she sees hidden—few and far between, indeed—but all filled with Christian life—among the hollows of the hills—and up, all the way up the great glens—and by the shores of the loveliest lochs—and sprinkled, not so rarely, among the woods that enclose little fields and meadows of their own—all the way down—more and more animated—till children are seen gathering before their doors the shells of the sea.

Look and listen far and wide through a sunshiny day, over a rich wooded region, with hedgerows, single trees, groves, and forests, and yet haply not one bird is to be seen or heard—neither plumage nor song. Yet many a bright lyrist is there, all mute till the harbinger-hour of sunset, when all earth, air, and heaven, shall be ringing with one song. Almost even so is it with this mountain-wilderness. Small bright-haired, bright-eyed, bright-faced children, come stealing out in the morning from many hidden huts, each solitary in its own site, the sole dwelling on its own brae or its own dell. Singing go they one and all, alone, or in small bands, trippingly along the wide moors; meeting into pleasant parties at cross paths, or at fords, till one stated hour sees them all gathered together, as now in the small schoolroom of Gleno, and the echo of the happy hum of the simple scholars is heard soft among the cliffs. But all at once the hum now ceases, and there is a hurry out of doors, and an exulting cry; for the shadow of Hamish, with the roe on his shoulders, has passed the small lead-latticed window, and the schoolroom has emptied itself on the green, which is now brightening with the young blossoms of life. “A roe—a roe—a roe!”—is still the chorus of their song; and the schoolmaster himself, though educated at college for the kirk, has not lost the least particle of his passion for the chase, and with kindling eyes assists Hamish in laying down his burden, and gazes on the spots with a hunter’s joy. We leave you to imagine his delight and his surprise when, at first hardly trusting his optics, he beholds Christopher on Surefoot, and then, patting the sheltie on the shoulder, bows affectionately and respectfully to the old man, and while our hands grasp, takes a pleasure in repeating over and over again that celebrated surname—North—North—North.

After a brief and bright hour of glee and merriment, mingled with grave talk, nor marred by the sweet undisturbance of all those elves maddening on the green around the roe, we express a wish that the scholars shall all again be gathered together in the schoolroom, to undergo an examination by the Christian philosopher of the Lodge. ’Tis in all things gentle, and in nothing severe. All slates are instantly covered with numerals, and ’tis pleasant to see their skill in finest fractions, and in the wonder-working golden rule of three. And now the rustling of their manuals is like that of rainy breezes among the summer leaves. No fears are here that the Book of God will lose its sanctity by becoming too familiar to eye, lip, and hand. Like the sunlight in the sky, the light that shines there is for ever dear—and unlike any sunlight in any skies, never never, is it clouded, permanently bright, and undimmed before pious eyes by one single shadow. We ought, perhaps, to be ashamed, but we are not so—we are happy that not an urchin is there who is not fully better acquainted with the events and incidents recorded in the Old and New Testaments than ourselves—and think not that all these could have been so faithfully committed to memory without the perpetual operation of the heart. Words are forgotten unless they are embalmed in spirit—and the air of the world, blow afterwards rudely as it may, shall never shrivel up one syllable that has been steeped into their souls by the spirit of the Gospel—felt by those almost infant disciples of Christ to be the very breath of God!

We leave a loose sovereign or two to the Bible Fund; and remounting Surefoot, while our friend the school-master holds the stirrup tenderly to our toe, jog down the road which is rather alarmingly like the channel of a drought-dried torrent, and turning round on the saddle, send our farewell salutes to the gazing scholars, first, bonnet waved round our head, and then, that replaced, a kiss flung from our hand. Hamish, relieved of the roe, which will be taken up (how you shall by-and-bye hear) on our way back to the Tent, is close at our side, to be ready should Sheltie stumble; O'Bronte as usual bounds in the van, and Ponto, Piro, and Basta, impatient for the next heather hill, keep close at our heels through the wood.

We do not admire that shooting-ground which resembles a poultry-yard. Grouse and barn-door fowls proceed upon opposite principles, the former being wild, and the latter tame creatures, when in their respective perfection. Of all dull pastimes, the dullest seems to us sporting in a preserve; and we believe that we share that feeling with the Grand Signior. The sign of a lonely wayside inn in the Highlands ought not to be the Hen and Chickens. Some shooters, we know, sick of common sport, love slaughter. From sunrise to sunset of the First Day of the Moors they must bag their hundred brace. That can only be done where pouts prevail, and cheepers keep chiding; and where you have half-a-dozen attendants to hand you double-barrels sans intermission, for a round dozen of hours spent in a perpetual fire. Commend us to a plentiful sprinkling of game; to ground which seems occasionally barren, and which it needs a fine instructed eye to traverse scientifically, and thereof to detect the latent riches. Fear and Hope are the Deities whom Christopher in his Sporting Jacket worships; and were they unpropitious, the Moors would lose all their witchcraft. We are a dead-shot, but not always, for the forefinger of our right hand is the most fitful forefinger in all this capricious world. Like all performers in the Fine Arts, our execution is very uncertain; and though "toujours prêt" is the impress on one side of our shield, "hit and miss" is that on the other, and often the more characteristic. A gentleman ought not to shoot like a gamekeeper, any more than at billiards to play like a sharper, nor with four-in-hand ought he to tool his prads like the Portsmouth Dragsman. We choose to shoot like a philosopher, as we are, and to preserve the golden mean in murder. We hold, with Aristotle, that all virtue consists in the middle between the two extremes; and thus we shoot in a style equidistant from that of the gamekeeper on the one hand, and that of the bagman on the other, and neither killing nor missing every bird; but, true to the spirit of the Aristotelian doctrine, leaning with a decided inclination towards the first rather than the second predicament. If we shoot too well one day, we are pretty sure to make amends for it by shooting just as much too ill another; and thus, at the close of the week, we can go to bed with a clear conscience. In short, we shoot like gentlemen, scholars, poets, philosophers, and contributors, as we are; and looking at us, you have a sight

"Of him who walks (rides) in glory and in joy, Following his dog upon the mountain side,"— a man evidently not shooting for a wager, and performing a match from the mean motive of avarice or ambition, but blazing away at his own delight, and, without seeming to know it, making a great noise in the world. Such, believe us, is ever the mode in which true genius displays at once the earnestness and the modesty of its character.—But, Hamish—Hamish—Hamish—look with both thine eyes on yonder bank—yonder sunny bank beneath the shade of that fantastic cliff's superincumbent shadow—and seest thou not basking there a miraculous amount of the right sort of feathers? They have packed, Hamish—they have packed, early as it yet is in the season; and the question is,—What shall we do? We have it. Take up a position—Hamish—about a hundred yards in the rear—on yonder knoll—with the Colonel's Sweeper. Fire from the rest—mind, from the rest, Hamish—right into the centre of that bed of plumage, and we shall be ready, with Brown Bess and her sister, to pour in our quartette upon the remains as they rise—so that not escape shall one single feather. Let our coming “to the present” be your signal.—Bang! Whew!—what a flutter! Now take that—and that—and that—and that! Ha! Hamish—as at the springing of a mine, the whole company has perished. Count the dead. Twenty-one! Life is short—and by this compendious style we take Time by the forelock. But where the devil are the ducks? Oh, yes! with the deer at the Still. Bag, and be stirring. For the Salmon-pond is murmuring in our ear; and in another hour we must be at Inveraw. Who said that Cruachan was a steep mountain? Why with a gentle, smooth, and easy slope, he dips his footsteps in the sea-salt waters of Loch-Etive's tide, as if to accommodate the old gentleman, who, half-a-century ago, used to board him in his pride on his throne of clouds. Heaven bless him!—he is a kind-hearted mountain, though his forehead be furrowed, and his aspect grim in stormy weather. A million memories “o’auld lang syne” revive, as almost “smooth-sliding without step” Surefoot travels through the silvan haunts, by us beloved of yore, when every day was a dream, and every dream filled full to overflowing with poetic visions, that swarmed on every bough, on every bent, on every heather-bell, in every dewdrop, in every mote o’ the sun, in every line of gossamer, all over greenwood and greensward, grey cliff, purple heath, blue loch, “wine-faced sea,”

“with locks divinely spreading,
Like sullen hyacinths in vernal hue,” and all over the sky, seeming then a glorious infinitude, where light, and joy, and beauty had their dwelling in calm and storm alike for evermore!

Heaven bless thee—with all her sun, moon, and stars! there thou art, dearest to us of all the lochs of Scotland—and they are all dear—mountain-crowned, cliff-guarded, isle-zoned, green-girdled, wide-winding and far-stretching, with thy many-bayed banks and braes of brushwood, fern, broom, and heather, rejoicing in their huts and shielings, thou glory of Argyleshire, rill-and-river-fed, sea-arm-like, floating in thy majesty, magnificent Loch Awe!

But now for the black mass of rapid waters that, murmuring from loch to river, rush roaring through that rainbow-arch, and bathe the green woods in freshening spray-mist through a loveliest landscape, that steals along with its meadow-sprinkling trees close to the very shore of Loch-Etive, binding the two lochs together with a silvan band—her whose calmer spirit never knows the ebb or flow of tide, and her who fluctuates even when the skies are still with the swelling and subsiding tumult, duly sent up into and recalled down from the silence of her inland solitude. And now for one pool in that river, called by eminence the Salmon-pool, whose gravelly depths are sometimes paved with the blue backs of the silver-scaled shiners, all strong as sunbeams, for a while reposing there, till the river shall redden in its glee to the floods falling in Glen-Serae and Glenorchy, and then will they shoot through the cataract—for ’tis all one fall between the lochs—passionate of the sweet fresh waters in which the Abbey-Isle reflects her one ruined tower, or Kilchurn, at all times dim or dark in the shadow of Cruachan, sees his grim turrets, momentarily less grim, imaged in the tremblings of the casual sunshine. Sometimes they lie like stoues, nor, unless you stir them up with a long pole, will they stir in the gleam, more than if they were shadows breathed from trees when all winds are dead. But at other times, they are on feed or frolic; and then no sooner does the fly drop on the water in its blue and yellow gaudiness, (and oh! but the brown mallard wing is bloody—bloody!) than some snout sucks it in—some snout of some swine-necked shoulder-bender—and instantly—as by dexterously dropping your elbow you give him the bult, and strike the barb through his tongue—down the long reach of the river vista’d along that straight oak-avenue—but with clear space of greensward between wood and water—shoots the giant steel-stung in his fear, bounding blue-white into the air, and then down into the liquid element with a plunge as of a man, or rather a horse, till your heart leaps to your mouth, or, as the Greeks we believe used to say, to your nose, and you are seen galloping along the banks, by spectators in search of the picturesque, and ignorant of angling, supposed in the act of making your escape, with an incomprehensible weapon in both hands, from some rural madhouse.

Phin! this rod is thy master-piece. And what gut! There she has it! Reel-music for ever! Ten fathom are run out already—and see how she shoots, Hamish;—such a Somerset as that was never thrown from a spring-board. Just the size for strength and agility—twenty pound to an ounce—jimp weight, Hamish—ha! Harlequin art thou—or Columbine! Assuredly neither Clown nor Pantaloon. Now we have turned her ladyship's nose up the stream, her lugs, if she have any, must be beginning to labour, and we almost hear her snore. What! in the stilks already—sullen among the stones! But we will make you mudge, madam, were we to tear the very tongue out of your mouth. Aye, once more down the middle to the tune of that spirited country-dance—"Off she goes!" Set corners, and reel! The gaff, Hamish—the gaff! and the landing net! For here is a shallow of the silver sand, spreading into the bay of a ford—and ere she recovers from her astonishment, here will we land her—with a strong pull, a long pull, and a pull altogether—just on the edge of the greensward—and then smite her on the shoulder, Hamish—and, to make assurance doubly sure, the net under her tail, and hoist her aloft in the sunshine, a glorious prize, dazzling the daylight, and giving a greener verdure to the woods.

He who takes two hours to kill a fish—be its bulk what it may—is no man, and is not worth his meat, or the vital air. The proportion is a minute to the pound. This rule were we taught by the "Best at Most" among British sportsmen—Scrope the Matchless on moor, mountain, river, loch, or sea; and, with exquisite nicety, have we now carried it into practice! Away with your useless steel-yards. Let us feel her teeth with our forefinger, and then held out at arm's length—so—we know by feeling, that she is, as we said, soon as we saw her side, a twenty-pounder to a drachin, and we have been true to time, within two seconds. She has literally no head; but her snout is in her shoulders. That is the beauty of a fish—high and round shoulders, short waisted, no loins, but all body, and not long of terminating—the shorter still the better—in a tail sharp and pointed, as Diana's, when she is crescent in the sky.

And, lo, and behold! there is Diana—but not crescent—for round and broad is she as the sun himself—shining in the south, with as yet a needless light—for daylight has not gone down in the west—and we can hardly call it gloaming. Chaste and cold though she seem, a nunlike luminary who has just taken the veil—a transparent veil of fine fleecy clouds—yet, alas! is she frail as of old, when she descended on the top of Latmos, to hold dalliance with Endymion. She has absolutely the appearance of being in the family-way—and not far from her time. Lo! two of her children stealing from ether towards her feet! One on her right hand, and another on her left—the fairest daughters that ever charmed mother's heart—and in heaven called stars. What a celestial trio the three form in the sky! The face of the moon keeps brightening as the lesser two twinkle into larger lustre; and now, though Day is still lingering, we feel that it is Night. When the one comes and when the other goes, what eye can note, what tongue can tell—but what heart feels not in the dewy hush divine, as the power of the beauty of earth decays over us, and a still dream descends upon us in the power of the beauty of heaven!

But hark! the regular twang and dip of oars coming sea-ward up the river—and lo! indistinct in the distance, something moving through the moonshine—and now taking the likeness of a boat—a barge—with bonneted heads leaning back at every flashing stroke—and, Hamish, list! a choral song in thine own dear native tongue! Sent hither by the queen of the sea-fairies to bear back in state Christopher North to the Tent! No. 'Tis the big coble belonging to the tacksman of the Awe—and the crew are going to pull her through the few first hours of the night—along with the flowing tide—up to Kinloch-Etive, to try a cast with their long net at the mouth of the river, now winding dim like a snake from King's House beneath the Black Mount, and along the bays at the head of the loch. A rumour that we are on the river has reached them—and see an avning of tartan over the stern, beneath which, as we sit, the sun may not smite our head by day, nor the moon by night. We embark—and descending the river like a dream, rapidly but stilly, and kept in the middle of the current by cunning helmsman, without aid of idle oar, all six suspended, we drop along through the silvan scenery gliding serenely away back into the mountain-gloom, and enter into the wider moonshine, trembling on the wavy verdure of the foam-crested sea. May this be Loch-Etive? Yea—verily; but so broad here is its bosom, and so far spreads the billowy brightness, that we might almost believe that our bark was bounding over the ocean, and marching merrily on the main. Are we—into such a dream might fancy for a moment half beguile herself—rowing back, after a day among the savage islanders, to our ship lying at anchor in the offing, on a voyage of discovery round the world?

Where are all the dogs? Ponto, Piro, Basta, trembling partly with cold, partly with hunger, partly with fatigue, and partly with fear, among and below the seats of the rowers—with their noses somewhat uncomfortably laid between their fore-paws on the tarry timbers—but O'Bronte boldly sitting at our side, and wistfully eyeing the green swell as it heaves beautifully by, ready at the slightest signal to leap overboard, and wallow like a walrus in the brine, of which you might almost think he was born and bred, so native seems the element to the "Dowg of Dowgs." Aye, these are sea-mews, O'Bronte, wheeling white as silver in the moonshine; but we shall not shoot them—no—no—no—we will not shoot you, ye images of playful peace, so fearlessly, nay, so lovingly attending our bark as it bounds over the breasts of the billows, in motion quick almost as your slowest flight, while ye linger around, and behind, and before our path, like fair spirits willing us along up this great Loch, farther and farther through gloom and glimmer, into the heart of profounder solitude. On what errands of your own are ye winnowing your way, stooping ever and anon just to dip your wing-tips in the waves, and then up into the open air—the blue light filling this magnificent hollow—or seen glancing along the shadows of the mountains, as they divide the Loch into a succession of separate bays, and often seem to block it up, till another moonlight reach is seen extending far beyond, and carries the imagination on—on—on—into inland recesses that seem to lose at last all connexion with the forgotten sea. All at once the moon is like a ghost;—and we believe devoutly—heaven knows why—in the authenticity of Ossian's Poems.

The boat in a moment is a bagpipe; and not only so, but all the mountains are bagpipes, and so are the clouds. All the bagpipes in the world are here, and they fill heaven and earth. 'Tis no exaggeration—much less a fiction—but the soul and body of truth. There Hamish stands stately at the prow; and as the boat hangs by midships on the very point that commands all the echoes, he fills the whole night with the "Campbells are coming," till the sky yells with the gathering as of all the Clans. His eyes are triumphantly fixed on ours to catch their emotions; his fingers cease their tinkling; and still that wild gathering keeps playing of itself among the mountains—fainter and fainter, as it is flung from cliff to cliff, till it dies away far—far off—till, as if in infinitude, sweet even and soft in its evanescence as some lover's lute! We are now in the bay of Gleno. For though moonlight strangely alters the whole face of nature, confusing its most settled features, and with a gentle glamour blending with the greensward what once was the grey granite, and investing with apparent woodiness what an hour ago was the desolation of herbless cliffs—yet not all the changes that wondrous nature, in ceaseless ebb and flow, ever wrought on her works, could metamorphose out of our recognition that glen, in which one night—long—long ago—

"In life's morning march, when our spirit was young!"

we were visited by a dream—a dream that shadowed forth in its inexplicable symbols the whole course of our future life—the graves—the tombs where many we loved are now buried—that churchyard, where we hope and believe that one day our own bones will rest!

But who shouts from the shore, Hamish—and now, as if through his fingers, sends forth a sharp shrill whistle that pierces the sky? Ah, ha! we ken his shadow in the light, with the roe on his shoulder. 'Tis the schoolmaster of Gleno, bringing down our quarry to the boat—kilted, we declare, like a true Son of the Mist! The shore here is shelving but stony, and our prow is aground. But strong-spined and loined, and strong in their withers, are the McDougals of Lorn; and, wading up to the red hairy knees, he has flung the roe into the boat, and followed it himself like a deer-hound. So bend to your oars, my hearties—my heroes—the wind freshens, and the tide strengthens from the sea; and at eight knots an-hour we shall sweep along the shadows, and soon see the lantern, twinkling as from a light-house, on the pole of our Tent.

In a boat, upon a great sea-arm, at night, among mountains, who would be so senseless, so soulless as to speak? The hour has its might,

"Because not of this noisy world, but silent and divine!"

A sound there is in the sea-green swell, and the hollows of the rocks, that keep muttering and muttering, as their entrances feel the touch of the tide. But nothing beneath the moon can be more solemn, now that her aspect is so wan, and that some melancholy spirit has obscured the lustre of the stars. We feel as if the breath of old elegiac poetry were visiting the slumber of our soul. All is sad within us, yet why we know not; and the sadness is stranger as it is deeper after a day of almost foolish pastime, spent by a being who believes that he is immortal, and that this life is but the threshold of a life to come! Poor, puny, and paltry pastimes indeed are they all! But are they more so than those pursuits of which the great moral poet has sung,

"The paths of glory lead but to the grave!"

Methinks, now, as we are entering into a sabler mass of shadow, that the doctrine of eternal punishment of sins, committed in time—but—

"Here's a health to all good lasses,
Here's a health to all good lasses,
Pledge it merrily, fill your glasses;
Let the bumper toast go round,
Let the bumper toast go round!"

Rest on your oars, lads. Hamish! the quech! give each man a caulker, that his oar may send a bolder twang from its rollock, and our fish-coble walk the waves like a man-of-war's gig, with the captain on board, going ashore, after a long cruise, to meet his wife. Now she spins! and lo! lights at Kinloch-Etive, and beyond on the breast of the mountain, bright as Hesperus—the Pole-star of our Tent!

Well, this is indeed the Londe of Faery! A car with a nag caparisoned at the water-edge! On with the roe, and in with Christopher and the Fish. Now, Hamish, hand us the crutch. After a cast or two, which, may they be successful as the night is auspicious, your presence, gentlemen, will be expected in the Tent. Now, Hamish, handle thou the ribbons—alias the hair-tether—and we will touch him behind, should he linger, with a weapon that might

"Create a soul under the ribs of death."

Linger! why the lightning flies from his heels, as he carries us along a fine natural causeway, like Ossian's car-borne heroes. From the size and state of the stones over which we make such a clatter, we shrewdly suspect that the parliamentary grant for destroying the old Highland torrent-roads, has not extended its ravages to Glen-Etive. O'Bronte,

"Like panting Time, toils after us in vain;"

and the pointers are following us by our own scent, and that of the roe, in the distant darkness. Pull up, Hamish, pull up, otherwise we shall overshoot our mark, and meet with some accident or other, perhaps a capsizé on Bachaille-Etive, or the Black Mount. We had no idea the circle of greensward in front of the Tent was so spacious. Why, there is room for the Lord Mayor of London's state-coach to turn with its eight horses, and that enormous ass, Parson Dillon, on the dicky. What could have made us think at this moment of London? Certes, the association of ideas is a droll thing, and also sometimes most magnificent. Dancing in the Tent, among strange figures! Celebration of the nuptials of some Arab chief, in an oasis in the Great Desert of Stony Arabia! Heavens, look at Hogg! How he hauls the Hizzies! There is no time to be lost—the Shepherd must not have all the sport to himself; and, by and by, spite of age and infirmity, we shall shew the Tent a touch of the Highland Fling. Hollo! you landloupers! Christopher is upon you—behold the Tenth Avatar incarnated in North.

But what apparitions at the Tent-door salute our approach?

“Back step these two fair angels, half afraid
So suddenly to see the Griesly King!”

Goat-herdesses from the cliffs of Glen-creran or Glenco, kilted to the knee, and not unconscious of their ankles, one twinkle of which is sufficient to bid “Begone dull care” for ever!

One hand on a shoulder of each of the mountain-nymphs,—sweet liberties,—and then embraced by both, half in their arms, and half on their bosoms, was ever Old Man so pleasantly let down from triumphal car, ~~on the~~ soft surface of his mother-earth? Aye, there lies the red-deer! and what heaps of smaller slain! James and Timothy have not been idle—but was there ever such a rush of dogs! We shall be extinguished. Down, dogs, down—nay, ladies and gentlemen, be seated—on one another's knees as before—we beseech you—we are but men like yourselves—and

Oh! what were man?—a world without a sun!”

What, you had begun to fear that the Cock of the North had been overcrowded—fugie from the Tent! Nay, here he is—Cock-a-doodle-doo—Cock-a-doodle-doo—Cock-a-doodle-doo! That sound creates a stir among the pullets. What it is to be the darling of gods and men, and women and children! Why, the very stars burn brighter—and thou, O Moon, art like the Sun! We foresee a night of dancing and drinking—till the mountain-dew melt in the lustre of morn. Such a day should have a glorious death—and a glorious resurrection. Hurra! Hurra!

THE MOORS FOR EVER! THE MOORS! THE MOORS!

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAP. III.

Note to the Editor—~~Intriguing and Mudness~~—The Broken Heart.

NOTE TO THE EDITOR OF BLACKWOOD.

SIR CHRISTOPHER,—A letter under the title of "Blackwood's Magazine v. the Secrets of the Medical Profession," appeared in the Lancet of the 28th August last—"the most influential and popular organ," it says, "the profession possesses"—a paragraph from which I beg to extract, and call the attention of your numerous readers to it. I do this in justice to myself; because, in the event of my name, insignificant perhaps as it is, happening to be disclosed, the said letter is calculated to work me much prejudice with my professional brethren, and also with the public in general; for I need not tell you, Sir Christopher, of the extensive and miscellaneous circulation of the publication alluded to. After some complimentary remarks, the writer proceeds—

"But I enter my protest, as a physician in some little practice, against the custom of disclosing to the public the sacred secrets which are communicated to us in perfect confidence by our patients, and ought to be preserved inviolable. The Editor of Blackwood happily enough says, 'what periodical has sunk a shaft into this rich mine of incident and sentiment?' True: the value has been, and is yet, I hope, to be proved, in the honour of our profession, and the determination of its members to merit the confidence of their patients, by continuing, in the language of Junius, 'the sole depository of their secrets, which shall perish with them.' If the writer of the paper in question, or the Editor of Blackwood, should see this letter, they are implored to consider its purport; and thus prevent the public from viewing their medical attendants with distrust, and withholding those confidential disclosures which are essential to the due performance of our professional duties. The very persons who would read such a series of articles as the 'Passages from the Diary of a late Physician' promise to be, with intense interest, would be the first to act on the principle I have mentioned."

If I were not credibly assured, Sir Christopher, that this letter is the production of a distinguished member of the profession, I should have felt inclined to compress my commentary on it into one emphatic little word—humbug! As it is, however, I beg to ask the writer who is so ready at starting the grave charge of a breach of professional confidence, what I do more, in publishing in your Magazine these papers of my late friend, with the most scrupulous concealment of every thing which could possibly lead to undue disclosures, than is constantly done in the pages of the Lancet itself, as well as all the other professional journals, textbooks, and treatises, which almost invariably append real initials, [I appeal to every medical man whether such is not the fact,] and other indicia, to the most painful, and in many instances, revolting and offensive details? It may possibly be answered—as it really has been—that, in the latter case, the narratives meet only professional eyes. What! in the Lancet? in the Medical Gazette? in Dr Reece's Journal? Are these works to be found in the hands of professional men only?—I have but one other observation to make. Would the delicacy of patients be less shocked at finding the peculiar features of their physical maladies—a subject on which their feelings are morbidly irritable—exposed to every member, high and low, young and old, of our extensive profession—the theme of lectures—the subject of constant allusion and comment, from beneath the thin veil of "Mrs J—M—t," &c.; is this, I say, less likely to hurt their feelings, than seeing [as is improbable, in nine cases out of ten of those who read these Passages] the morale, the sentiment of their case extracted, dressed in the shape of simple narrative, and challenging the sympathy and admiration of the public? Take, as an instance, the first narrative, entitled "Cancer," which appeared in your last Magazine. Could Mrs St —, were she living, be pained at reading it—or any surviving friend or relative, for her? And if any subsequent sketch should disclose matter of reprobation, in the shape of weak, criminal, or infamous conduct, surely the exposure is merited; such subjects should suffer in silence, and none will be the wiser for it. I conceive, that several scenes of this character, which I have trembled and blushed over in my late friend's journal, are properly dealt with, if they are made public property—a source of instruction and warning to all. In a word, I cannot help thinking, that the writer of the letter in question has wasted much fervent zeal to little purpose, and conjured up a ghost for the mere purpose of exorcisation. This I have done for him; and I hope his fears will henceforth abate.

A moment further, good Sir Christopher. As to one or two individuals who have been singled out, by the various knowing pupers of the day, as the writer or subject of these chapters, you and I know well that the proper party has never yet been glanced at, nor is likely to be;—and for the future, no notice whatever will be taken of their curious speculations. Believe me over, revered Sir Christopher, &c. &c.

London, 9th September, 1830.

INTRIGUING AND MADNESS.

WHEN I have seen a beautiful and popular actress, I have often thought how many young play-goers these women must intoxicate—how many even sensible, and otherwise sober heads, they must turn upside down! Some years ago, a case came under my care, which shewed fully the justness of this reflection; and I now relate it, as I consider it pregnant both with interest and instruction. It will shew how the energies of even a powerful and well-informed mind, may be prostrated by the indulgence of unbridled passions. Late one evening in November, I was summoned in haste to visit a gentleman who was staying at one of the hotels in Covent Garden, and informed in a note that he had manifested symptoms of insanity. As there is no time to be lost in such cases, I hurried to the — hotel, which I reached about nine o'clock. The proprietor gave me some preliminary information about the patient to whom I was summoned, which, with what I subsequently gleaned from the party himself, and other quarters, I shall present connectedly to the reader, before introducing him to the sick man's chamber.

Mr Warningham—for that name may serve to indicate him through this narrative—was a young man of considerable fortune, some family, and a member of — College, Cambridge. His person and manners were gentlemanly; and his countenance, without possessing any claims to the character of handsome, faithfully indicated a powerful and cultivated mind. He had mingled largely in College gaieties and dissipations, but knew little or nothing of what is called “town-life;” which may, in a great measure, account for much of the simplicity and extravagance of the conduct I am about to relate. Having from his youth upwards been accustomed to the instant gratification of almost every wish he could form, the slightest obstacle in his way was sufficient to irritate him almost to frenzy. His temperament was very ardent, his imagination lively and active. In short, he passed everywhere for what he really was—a very clever man—extensively read in elegant literature, and particularly intimate with the dramatic writers. About a fortnight before the day on which I was summoned to him, he had come up from College to visit a young lady whom he was addressing; but finding her unexpectedly gone to Paris, he resolved to continue in London the whole time he had proposed to himself, and enjoy all the amusements about town—particularly the theatres. The evening of the day on which he arrived at the — hotel, beheld him at Drury Lane, witnessing a new, and—as the event proved—a very powerful tragedy. In the afterpiece, Miss — was a prominent performer; and her beauty of person—her “maddening eyes,” as Mr Warningham often called them—added to her fascinating naïveté of manner, and the interesting character she sustained that evening—at once laid prostrate poor Mr Warningham among the throng of worshippers at the feet of this “Diana of the Ephesians.”

As he found she played again the next evening, he took care to engage the stage-box; and fancied he had succeeded in attracting her attention. He thought her lustrous eyes fell on him several times during the evening, and that they were instantly withdrawn, with an air of conscious confusion and embarrassment, from the intense and passionate gaze which they encountered. This was sufficient to fire the train of Mr Warningham's susceptible feelings; and his whole heart was in a blaze instantly. Miss — sung that evening one of her favourite songs—an exquisitely pensive and beautiful air; and Mr Warningham, almost frantic with excitement, applauded with such obstreperous vehemence, and continued shouting "encore—encore"—so long after the general calls of the house had ceased, as to attract all eyes for an instant to his box. Miss — could not, of course, fail to observe his conduct; and presently herself looked up with what he considered a gratified air. Quivering with excitement and nervous irritability, Mr Warningham could scarcely sit out the rest of the play; and the moment the curtain fell, he hurried round to the stage-door, determined to wait and see her leave, for the purpose, if possible, of speaking to her. He presently saw her approach the door, closely muffled, veiled, and bonneted, leaning on the arm of a man of military appearance, who handed her into a very gay chariot. He perceived at once that it was the well-known Captain —. Will it be believed that this enthusiastic young man actually jumped up behind the carriage which contained the object of his idolatrous homage, and did not alight till it drew up opposite a large house in the western suburbs; and that this absurd feat, moreover, was performed amid an incessant shower of small searching rain? He was informed by the footman, whom he had bribed with five shillings, that Miss —'s own house was in another part of the town, and that her stay at Captain — was only for a day or two. He returned to his hotel in a state of tumultuous excitement, which can be better conceived than described. As may be supposed, he slept little that night; and the first thing he did in the morning was to dispatch his groom, with orders to establish himself in some public-house which could command a view of Miss —'s residence, and return to Covent-Garden as soon as he had seen her or her maid enter. It was not till seven o'clock that he brought word to his master, that no one had entered but Miss —'s maid. The papers informed him that Miss — played again that evening; and though he could not but be aware of the sort of intimacy which subsisted between Miss — and the Captain, his enthusiastic passion only increased with increasing obstacles. Though seriously unwell with a determination of blood to the head, induced by the perpetual excitement of his feelings, and a severe cold caught through exposure to the rain on the preceding evening—he was dressing for the play, when, to his infinite mortification, his friendly medical attendant happening to step in, positively forbade his leaving his room, and consigned him to bed and physic, instead of the maddening scenes of the theatre. The next morning he felt relieved from the more urgent symptoms; and his servant having brought him word that he had at last watched Miss — enter her house, unaccompanied, except by her maid, Mr Warningham dispatched him with a copy of passionate verses, enclosed in a blank envelope. He trusted that some adroit allusions in them, might possibly give her a clew to the discovery of the writer—especially if he could contrive to be seen by her that evening in the same box he had occupied formerly; for to the play he was resolved to go, in defiance of the threats of his medical attendant. To his vexation, he found the box in question pre-engaged for a family party; and—will it be credited?—he actually entertained the idea of discovering who they were, for the purpose of prevailing on them to vacate in his favour! Finding that, however, of course out of the question, he was compelled to content himself with the corresponding box opposite, where he was duly ensconced the moment the doors were opened.

Miss — appeared that evening in only one piece, but in the course of it she had to sing some of her most admired songs. The character she played, also, was a favourite both with herself and the public. Her dress was exquisitely tasteful and picturesque, and calculated to set off her figure to the utmost advantage. When, at a particular crisis of the play, Mr Warningham, by the softened lustre of the lowered foot-lights, beheld Miss — emerging from a romantic glen, with a cloak thrown over her shoulders, her head covered with a velvet cap, over which drooped, in snowy pendency, an ostrich-feather, while her hair strayed from beneath the clasp of her cap in loose negligent curls, down her face and beautiful cheeks; when he saw the timid and alarmed air which her part required her to assume, and the sweet and sad expression of her eyes, while she stole about as if avoiding a pursuer;—when, at length, as the raised foot-lights were restored to their former glare, she let fall the cloak which had enveloped her, and, like a metamorphosed chrysalis, burst in beauty on the applauding house, habited in a costume, which, without being positively indelicate, was calculated to excite the most voluptuous thoughts;—when, I say, poor Mr Warningham saw all this, he was almost overpowered, and leaned back in his box, breathless with agitation.

A little before Miss — quitted the stage for the last time that evening, the order of the play required that she should stand for some minutes on that part of the stage next to Mr Warningham's box. While she was standing in a pensive attitude, with her face turned full towards Mr Warningham; he whispered, in a quivering and under tone,—"Oh, beautiful, beautiful creature!" Miss — heard him, looked at him with a little surprise; her features relaxed into a smile, and, with a gentle shake of the head, as if hinting that he should not endeavour to distract her attention, she moved away to proceed with her part. Mr Warningham trembled violently; he fancied she encouraged his attentions—and, God knows how—had recognised in him the writer of the verses she had received. When the play was over, he hurried, as on a former occasion, to the stage-door, where he mingled with the inquisitive little throng usually to be found there, and waited till she made her appearance, enveloped, as before, in a large shawl, but followed only by a maid-servant, carrying a bandbox. They stepped into a hackney-coach, and, though Mr Warningham had gone there for the express purpose of speaking to her, his knees knocked together, and he felt so sick with agitation, that he did not even attempt to hand her into the coach. He jumped into the one which drew up next, and ordered the coachman to follow the preceding one, wherever it went. When it approached the street where he knew she resided, he ordered it to stop, got out, and hurried on foot towards the house, which he reached just as she was alighting. He offered her his arm. She looked at him with astonishment, and something like apprehension. At length, she appeared to recognise in him the person who had attracted her attention by whispering when at the Theatre, and seemed, he thought, a little discomposed. She declined his proffered assistance, said her maid was with her, and was going to knock at the door, when Mr Warningham stammered, faintly, "Dear madam, do allow me the honour of calling in the morning, and enquiring how you are, after the great exertions at the Theatre this evening!" She replied, in a cold and discouraging manner; could not conceive to what she was indebted for the honour of his particular attentions, and interest in her welfare, so suddenly felt by an utter stranger—unusual—singular—improper—unpleasant—&c. She said, That, as for his calling in the morning, if he felt so inclined, she, of course, could not prevent him; but if he expected to see her when he called, he would find himself "perfectly mistaken." The door that moment was opened, and closed upon her, as she made him a cold bow, leaving Mr Warningham, what with chagrin and excessive passion for her, almost distracted. He seriously assured me, that he walked to and fro before her door till nearly six o'clock in the morning; that he repeatedly ascended the steps, and endeavoured, as nearly as he could recollect, to stand on the very spot she had occupied while speaking to him, and would remain gazing at what he fancied was the window of her bedroom, for ten minutes together; and all this extravagance, to boot, was perpetrated amidst an incessant fall of snow, and at a time—Heaven save the mark—when he was an accepted suitor of Miss —, the young lady whom he had come to town for the express purpose of visiting! I several times asked him how it was that he could bring himself to consider such conduct consistent with honour or delicacy, or feel a spark of real attachment for the lady to whom he was engaged, if it was not sufficient to steel his heart and close his eyes against the charms of any other woman in the world? His only reply was, that he “really could not help it;”—he felt “rather the patient, than agent.” Miss — took his heart, he said, by storm, and forcibly ejected, for a while, his love for any other woman breathing!

To return, however: About half past six, he jumped into a hackney-coach which happened to be passing through the street, drove home to the hotel in Covent Garden, and threw himself on the bed, in a state of utter exhaustion, both of mind and body. He slept on heavily till twelve o'clock at noon, when he awoke seriously indisposed. In the first few moments, he could not dispossess himself of the idea that Miss — was standing by his bedside, in the dress she wore the preceding evening, and smiled encouragingly on him. So strong was the delusion, that he actually addressed several sentences to her! About three o'clock, he drove out, and called on one of his gay friends, who was perfectly au fait at matters of this sort, and resolved to make him his confidant in the affair. Under the advice of this mentor, Mr Warringham purchased a very beautiful emerald ring, which he sent off instantly to Miss —, with a polite note, saying it was some slight acknowledgment of the delight with which he witnessed her exquisite acting, &c. &c. &c. This, his friend assured him, must call forth an answer of some sort or other, which would lead to another—and another—and another—and so on. He was right. A two-penny post letter was put into Mr Warringham's hands the next morning before he rose, which was from Miss —, elegantly written, and thanked him for the “tasteful present” he had sent her, which she should, with great pleasure, take an early opportunity of gratifying him by wearing in public. There never yet lived an actress, I verily believe, who had fortitude enough to refuse a present of jewellery! What was to be done next? He did not exactly know. But having succeeded at last in opening an avenue of communication with her, and induced her so easily to lie under an obligation to him, he felt convinced that his way was now clear. He determined, therefore, to call and see her that very afternoon; but his medical friend, seeing the state of feverish excitement in which he continued, absolutely interdicted him from leaving the house. The next day he felt considerably better, but was not allowed to leave the house. He could, therefore, find no other means of consoling himself, than writing a note to Miss —, saying he had “something important” to communicate to her, and begging to know when she would permit him to wait upon her for that purpose. What does the reader imagine this pretext of “something important” was? To ask her to sit for her portrait to a young artist! His stratagem succeeded; for he received, in the course of the next day, a polite invitation to breakfast with Miss — on the next Sunday morning; with a hint that he might expect no other company, and that Miss — was “curious” to know what his particular business with her was. Poor Mr Warringham! How was he to exist in the interval between this day and Sunday? He would fain have annihilated it!

Sunday morning at last arrived; and about nine o'clock he sallied from his hotel, the first time he had left it for several days, and drove to the house. With a fluttering heart he knocked at the door, and a maid-servant ushered him into an elegant apartment, in which breakfast was laid. An elderly lady, some female relative of the actress, was reading a newspaper at the breakfast table; and Miss — herself was seated at the piano, practising one of those exquisite songs which had been listened to with breathless rapture by thousands. She wore an elegant morning dress; and though her infatuated visitor had come prepared to see her to great disadvantage—divested of the dazzling complexion she exhibited on the stage—her pale, and somewhat sallow, features, which wore a pensive and fatigued expression, served to rivet the chains of his admiration still stronger, with the feelings of sympathy. Her beautiful eyes beamed on him with sweetness and affability; and there was an ease, a gentleness, in her manners, and a soft animating tone in her voice, which filled Mr Warningham with emotions of indescribable tenderness. A few moments beheld them seated at the breakfast table; and when Mr Warningham gazed at his fair hostess, and reflected on his envied contiguity to one whose beauty and talents were the theme of universal admiration—listened to her lively and varied conversation, and perceived a faint crimson steal for an instant over her countenance, when he reminded her of his exclamation at the theatre—he felt a swelling excitement which would barely suffer him to preserve an exterior calmness of demeanour. He felt, as he expressed it—(for he has often recounted these scenes to me)—that she was maddening him! Of course, he exerted himself in conversation to the utmost; and his observations on almost every topic of polite literature were met with equal spirit and sprightliness by Miss —. He found her fully capable of appreciating the noblest passages from Shakspeare, and some of the older English dramatists, and that was sufficient to lay enthusiastic Mr Warningham at the feet of any woman. He was reciting a passionate passage from Romeo and Juliet, to which Miss — was listening with an apparent air of kindling enthusiasm, when a phaeton dashed up to the door, and an impetuous thundering of the knocker announced the arrival of some aristocratical visitor. The elderly lady, who was sitting with them, started, coloured, and exclaimed—“Good God, will you receive the man this morning?”

“Oh, it’s only Lord —,” exclaimed Miss —, with an air of indifference, after having examined the equipage through the window-blinds, “and I won’t see the man—that’s flat. He pesters me to death,” she continued, turning to Mr Warningham, with a pretty, peevish air. It had its effect on him—“What an enviable fellow I am, to be received when Lords are refused!” thought Mr Warningham.

After the breakfast things were removed, she sat down, at his request, to the piano—a very magnificent present from the Duke of —, Mrs — assured him—and sung and played whatever he asked. She played a certain well-known arch air, with the most bewitching simplicity; Mr Warningham could only look his feelings. As she concluded it, and was dashing off the symphony in a careless, but rapid and brilliant style, Mrs —, the lady once or twice before mentioned, left the room; and Mr Warningham, scarce knowing what he did, suddenly sunk on one knee, from the chair on which he was sitting by Miss —, grasped her hand, and uttered some exclamation of passionate fondness. Miss — turned to him a moment, with a surprised air, her large, liquid, blue eyes almost entirely hid beneath her half-closed lids, her features relaxed into a coquettish smile, she disengaged her hand, and went on playing and singing,—

“He sighs—‘Beauty! I adore thee,
See me fainting thus before thee;’
But I say—
Fal, la! la! la! la! Fal, la! la! la! la!
Fal, la! la! &c.”

“Fascinating, angelic woman!—glorious creature of intellect and beauty, I cannot live but in your presence!” gasped Mr Warningham.

“Oh, Lord, what an actor you would have made, Mr Warningham—indeed you would! Only think how it would sound—‘Romeo, Mr Warningham!’—Lud, lud—the man would almost persuade me that he was in earnest!” replied Miss — with the most enchanting air, and ceased playing. Mr Warningham continued addressing her in the most extravagant manner; indeed, he afterwards told me, he felt "as though his wits were slipping from him every instant."

"Why don't you go on the stage, Mr Warningham?" enquired Miss —, with a more earnest and serious air than she had hitherto manifested, and gazing at him with an eye which expressed real admiration,—for she was touched by the winning, persuasive, and passionate eloquence with which Mr Warningham expressed himself. She had hardly uttered the words, when a loud and long knock was heard at the street door. Miss — suddenly started from the piano; turned pale, and exclaimed in a hurried and agitated tone,—“Lord, Lord, what's to be done!—Captain —!—whatever can have brought him up to town—oh, my —”

“Good God, madam, what can possibly alarm you in this manner?” exclaimed Mr Warningham, with a surprised air. “What in the earth can there be in this Captain — to startle you in this manner? What can the man want here if his presence is disagreeable to you? Pray, madam, give him the same answer you gave Lord —!” “Oh, Mr Warningham, dear! the door is opened—what will become of me if Captain — sees you here? Ah! I have it—you must—country manager—provincial enga—” hurriedly muttered Miss —, as the room door opened, and a gentleman of a lofty and military bearing, dressed in a blue surtout and white trowsers, with a slight walking cane in his hand, entered, and without observing Mr Warningham, who at the moment happened to be standing rather behind the door, hurried towards Miss —, exclaiming with a gay and fond air, “Ha, my charming De Medici, how d’ye?—Why, who the — have we here?” he enquired, suddenly breaking off, and turning with an astonished air towards Mr Warningham.

“What possible business can this person have here, Miss —?” enquired the Captain, with a cold and angry air, letting fall her hand, which he had grasped on entering, and eyeing Mr Warningham with a furious scowl. Miss — muttered something indistinctly about business—a provincial engagement—and looked appealingly towards Mr Warningham, as if beseeching him to take the cue, and assume the character of a country manager. Mr Warningham, however, was not experienced enough in matters of this kind to take the hint.

“My good sir—I beg pardon, Captain”—said he, buttoning his coat, and speaking in a voice almost choked with fury—“what is the meaning of all this? What do you mean, sir, by this insolent bearing towards me?”

“Good God! Do you know, sir, whom you are speaking to?” enquired the Captain, with an air of wonder.

“I care as little as I know, sir; but this I know—I shall give you to understand that, whoever you are, I won't be bullied by you.”

“The devil!” exclaimed the Captain, slowly, as if he hardly comprehended what was passing. Miss —, pale as a statue, and trembling from head to foot, leaned speechless against the corner of the piano, apparently stupified by the scene that was passing.

“Oh, by —! this will never do,” at length exclaimed the Captain, as he rushed up to Mr Warningham, and struck him furiously over the shoulders with his cane. He was going to seize Mr Warningham's collar with his left hand, as if for the purpose of inflicting farther chastisement, when Mr Warningham, who was a very muscular man, shook him off, and dashed his right hand full into the face of the Captain. Miss — shrieked for assistance—while the Captain put himself instantly into attitude, and being a first-rate “miller,” as the phrase is, before Mr Warningham could prepare himself for the encounter, planted a sudden shower of blows about Mr Warningham's head and breast, that fell on him like the strokes of a sledge-hammer. He was of course instantly laid prostrate on the floor in a state of insensibility, and recollected nothing further till he found himself lying in his bed at the — hotel, about the middle of the night, faint and weak with the loss of blood, his head bandaged, and amid all the paraphernalia and attendance of a sick man's chamber. How or when he had been conveyed to the hotel he knew not, till he was informed some weeks afterwards that Captain —, having learned his residence from Miss —, had brought him in his carriage, in a state of stupor. All the circumstances above related combined to throw Mr Warringham into a fever, which increased upon him; the state of nervous excitement in which he had lived for the last few days aggravated the other symptoms—and delirium at last deepened into downright madness. The medical man, who has been several times before mentioned as a friendly attendant of Mr Warringham, finding that matters grew so serious, and being unwilling any longer to bear the sole responsibility of the case, advised Mr Warringham's friends, who had been summoned from a distant county to his bedside, to call me in; and this was the statu quo of affairs when I paid him my first visit.

On entering the room, I found a keeper sitting on each side of the bed on which lay Mr Warringham, who was raving frightfully, gnashing his teeth, and imprecating the most fearful curses upon Captain —. It was with the utmost difficulty that the keepers could hold him down, even though my unfortunate patient was suffering under the restraint of a strait waistcoat. His countenance, which I think I mentioned was naturally very expressive, if not handsome, exhibited the most ghastly contortions. His eyes glared into every corner of the room, and seemed about to start from their sockets.—After standing for some moments a silent spectator of this painful scene, endeavouring to watch the current of his malady, and at the same time soothe the affliction of his uncle, who was standing by my side dreadfully agitated, I ventured to approach nearer, observing him nearly exhausted, and relapsing into silence—undisturbed but by heavy and stertorous breathing. He lay with his face buried in the pillow; and on my putting my fingers to his temples, he suddenly turned his face towards me. “God bless me—Mr Kean!” said he, in an altered tone—“this is really a very unexpected honour!” He seemed embarrassed at seeing me. I determined to humour his fancy—the only rational method of dealing with such patients. I may as well say, in passing, that some persons have not unfrequently found a resemblance—faint and slight, if any at all—between my features and those of the celebrated tragedian for whom I was on the present occasion mistaken.

“Oh, yours are terrible eyes, Mr Kean—very, very terrible! Where did you get them? What fiend touched them with such unnatural lustre? These are not human—no, no! What do you think I have often fancied they resembled?”

“Really, I can't pretend to say, sir,” I replied, with some curiosity.

“Why, one of the damned inmates of hell—glaring through the fiery bars of their prison,” replied Mr Warringham, with a shudder.

“Isn't that a ghastly fancy?” he enquired.

“'Tis horrible enough, indeed,” said I, determined to humour him.

“Ha, ha, ha!—Ha, ha, ha!” roared the wretched maniac, with a laugh which made us all quake round his bedside. “I can say better things than that,—though it is d—d good; it's nothing like the way in which I shall talk to-morrow morning—ha, ha, ha!—for I am going down to hell, to learn some of the fiends' talk; and when I come back, I'll give you a lesson, Mr Kean, shall be worth two thousand a-year to you—ha, ha, ha!—What d'ye say to that, Othello?”—He paused, and continued mumbling something to himself, in a strangely different tone of voice from that in which he had just addressed me.

—“Mr Kean, Mr Kean,” said he suddenly, “you're the very man I want; I suppose they had told you I had been asking for you, eh?”

“Yes, certainly, I heard”——

“Very good—'twas civil of them; but, now you are here, just shade those basilisk eyes of yours, for they blight my soul within me.” I did as he directed—“Now, I'll tell you what I've been thinking—I've got a tragedy ready, very nearly at least, and there's a magnificent character for you in it,—expressly written for you—a compound of Richard, Shylock, and Sir Giles—your masterpieces—a sort of quartum quiddam—eh—you hear me, Mr Kean!”

“Aye, and mark thee, too, Hal,” thinking a quotation from his favourite Shakspeare would soothe and flatter his inflamed fancy.

"Ah—aptly quoted—happy, happy!—By the way, talking of that, I don't at all admire your personation of Macbeth—by G—, Mr Kean, I don't. 'Tis utterly misconceived—wrong from beginning to end; it is, really. You see what an independent, straight-forward critic I am—ha, ha, ha!"—accompanying the words with a laugh, if not as loud, as fearful as his former ones. I told him, I bowed to his judgment.

"Good," he answered, "genius should always be candid. Macready has a single whisper, when he enquires "Is it the King?" which is worth all your fiendish mutterings and gaspings, ha, ha! 'Does the galled jade wince? Her withers are unwrung.'—Mr Kean, how absurd you are, ill-mannered, pardon me for saying it, for interrupting me," he said, after a pause; adding, with a puzzled air, "What was it I was talking about when you interrupted me?"—"Do you mean the tragedy —?" (I had not opened my lips to interrupt him.) "Ha—the tragedy,

'The play, the play's the thing,
Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king.'

Ah—the tragedy was it I was mentioning? Rem acu—ocu tetigisti—that's Latin, Mr Kean! Did you ever learn Latin, and Greek, eh?"—I told him I had studied it a little.

"What can you mean by interrupting me thus unmannerly?—Mr Kean, I won't stand it.—Once more—what was it I was talking about a few minutes ago?" He had again let slip the thread of his thoughts.—"A digression this, Mr Kean; I must be mad—indeed I must!" he continued, with a shudder, and a look of sudden sanity, "I must be mad, and I can't help thinking what a profound knowledge of human nature Shakspeare shews when he makes memory the test of sanity—a d—d depth of philosophy in it,—eh, d'ye recollect the passage,—eh, Kean?" I said I certainly could not call it to mind.

"Then it's infamous!—a shame and a disgrace for you. It's quite true what people say of you—you are a mere tragedy hack! Why won't you try to get out of that mill-horse round of your hackneyed characters! Excuse me; you know I'm a vast admiration of yours, but an honest one!—Curse me," after a sudden pause, adding, with a bewildered and angry air, "what was it I was going to say!—I've lost it again!—oh, a passage from Shakspeare—memory—test of—Ah, now, we have him! 'Tis this: mark and remember it!—'tis in King Lear—

— 'Bring me to the test,
And I the matter will re-word, which madness

Would gambol from.'

Profoundly true—isn't it, Kean?"—Of course I acquiesced.

"Ah," he resumed, with a pleased smile, "nobody now can write like that except myself—Go it, Harry—ha, ha, ha!—Who—oo—o!" uttering the strangest kind of revolting cry I ever heard. "Oh, dear, dear me, what was it I was saying? The thought keeps slipping from me like a lithe eel; I can't hold it. Eels, by the way, are nothing but a sort of water snake—'tis brutal to eat them! What made me name eels, Mr Kean?" I reminded him. "Ah, there must be a screw loose—something wrong here," shaking his head; "it's all upside down—ha! what the d—! was it now?" I once more recalled it to his mind, for I saw he was fretting himself with vexation at being unable to take up the chain of his thoughts.

"Ah!—well now, once more—I said I'd a character for you—good; do it justice—or, d—me, I'll hiss you like a huge boa, coiled in the middle of the pit! There's a thought—stay—he's losing the thought again—hold it—hold it!"

"The tragedy, sir,"—

"Ah, to be sure—I've another character for Miss — [naming the actress beforementioned]—magnificent queen of beauty—nightingale of song—radiant—peerless—Ah, lady, look on me!—look on me!" and he suddenly burst into one of the most tiger-like howls I could conceive capable of being uttered by a human being. It must have been heard in the street and market without. We who were round him stood listening, chilled with horror. When he had ceased, I said, in a soothing whisper, "Compose yourself, Mr Warringham—you'll see her by and bye." He looked me full in the face, and uttered as shocking a yell as before.

"Away!—out on ye! scoundrels!

—fiends!" he shouted, struggling with the men who were endeavouring to hold him down—"Are you come to murder me?—Ha—a—a!"—and he fell back as though he was in the act of being choked or throttled.

"Where—where is the fiend who struck me?"—he groaned in a fierce under-tone; "and in HER presence too; and she stood by looking on!—cruel, beautiful, deceitful woman!—Did she turn pale and tremble?—Oh, will not I have his blood—blood—blood?" and he clutched his fists with a savage and murderous force. "Ah! you around me, say, does not blood cleanse the deepest, foulest stain, or hide it?—Pour it on warm and reeking—a crimson flood—and never trust me if it does not wash out insult for ever! Ha—ha—ha! Oh, let me loose! Let me loose! Let me but cast my eyes on the insolent ruffian—the brutal bully—let me but lay hands on him!" And he drew in his breath with a long, fierce, and deep respiration. "Will I not shake him out of his military trappings, and fooleries? Ha, devils! unhand me—I say, unhand me, and let me loose on this Captain —."

In this strain the unhappy young man continued raving for about ten minutes longer, till he utterly exhausted himself. The paroxysm was over for the present. The keepers, aware of this—for, of course, they were accustomed to such fearful scenes as these, and preserved the most cool and matter-of-fact demeanour conceivable—relaxed their hold. Mr Warningham lay perfectly motionless, with his eyes closed, breathing slow and heavily, while the perspiration burst from every pore. His pulse and other symptoms shewed me that a few more similar paroxysms would destroy him; and that consequently the most active remedies must be had recourse to immediately. I, therefore, directed what was to be done—his head to be shaved—that he should be bled copiously—kept perfectly cool and tranquil—and prescribed such medicines as I conceived most calculated to effect this object. On my way down stairs, I encountered Mr —, the proprietor, or landlord, of the hotel, who, with a very agitated air, told me, he must insist on having Mr Warningham removed immediately from the hotel; for that his ravings disturbed and agitated every body in the place, and had been loudly complained of. Seeing the reasonableness of this, my patient was, with my sanction, conveyed, that evening, to airy and genteel lodgings in one of the adjoining streets. The three or four following visits I paid him, presented scenes little varying from the one I have above been attempting to describe. They gradually, however, abated in violence. I shall not be guilty of extravagance or exaggeration, if I protest, that there was sometimes a vein of sublimity in his ravings. He really said some of the very finest things I ever heard. This need not occasion wonder, if it be recollected, that "out of the fulness of the heart, the mouth speaketh;" and Mr Warningham's naturally powerful mind was filled with accumulated stores, acquired from almost every region of literature. His fancy was deeply tinged with Germanism—with diablerie—and some of his ghostly images used to haunt and creep after me, like spirits, gibbering and chattering the expressions with which the maniac had conjured them into being.

To me, nothing is so affecting—so terrible—so humiliating, as to see a powerful intellect, like that of Mr Warningham, the prey of insanity, exhibiting glimpses of greatness and beauty, amid all the chaotic gloom and havoc of madness; reminding one of the mighty fragments of some dilapidated structure of Greece or Rome, mouldering apart from one another, still displaying the exquisite moulding and chiselling of the artist, and enhancing the beholder's regret that so glorious a fabric should have been destroyed by the ruthless hand of time. Insanity, indeed, makes the most fearful inroads on an intellect distinguished by its activity; and the flame is fed rapidly by the fuel afforded from an excitable and vigorous fancy. A tremendous responsibility is incurred, in such cases, by the medical attendants. Long experience has convinced me, that the only sensible way of dealing with such patients as Mr Warningham, is chiming in readily with their various fancies, without seeming in the slightest degree shocked or alarmed by the most monstrous extravagances. The patient must never be started by any appearance of surprise or apprehension from those around him—never irritated by contradiction, or indications of impatience. Should this be done by some inexperienced attendant, the mischief may prove irremediable by any subsequent treatment; the flame will blaze out with a fury which will consume instantly every vestige of the intellectual structure, leaving the body—the shell—bare, blackened walls alone,—

Let the patient have sea-room; allow him to dash about for a while in the tempest and whirlwind of his disordered faculties; while all that is necessary from those around is, to watch the critical moment, and pour the oil of soothing acquiescence on the foaming waters. Depend upon it, the uproar will subside when the winds of opposition cease.

To return, however, to Mr Warningham: The incubus which had brooded over his intellects for more than a week, at length disappeared, leaving its victim trembling on the very verge of the grave. In truth, I do not recollect ever seeing a patient whose energies, both physical and mental, were so dreadfully shattered. He had lost almost all muscular power. He could not raise his hand to his head, alter his position in the bed, or even masticate his food. For several days, it could barely be said that he existed. He could utter nothing more than an almost inaudible whisper, and seemed utterly unconscious of what was passing around him. His sister, a young and very interesting woman, had flown to his bedside immediately the family were acquainted with his illness, and had continued ever since in daily and nightly attendance on him, till she herself seemed almost worn out. How I loved her for her pallid, exhausted, anxious, yet affectionate looks! Had not this illness intervened, she would have been before this time married to a rising young man at the Bar; yet her devoted sisterly sympathies attached her to her brother's bedside without repining, and she would never think of leaving him. Her feelings may be conceived, when it is known that she was, in a great measure acquainted with the cause of her brother's sudden illness; and it was her painful duty to sit and listen to many unconscious disclosures of the most afflicting nature. This latter circumstance furnished the first source of uneasiness to Mr Warningham, on recovering the exercise of his rational faculties; he was excessively agitated at the idea of his having alluded to, and described, the dissipated and profligate scenes of his college life; and when he had once compelled me to acknowledge, that his sister and other relations were apprised of the events which led to his illness, he sunk into moody silence for some time, evidently scourging himself with the heaviest self-reproaches, and presently exclaimed—“Well, Doctor, thus you see, has

Compell'd the poison'd chalice to my lips,’ and I have drunk the foul draught to the dregs! Yet though I would at this moment lay down half my fortune to blot from their memories what they must have heard me utter, I shall submit in silence—I have richly earned it—I now, however, bid farewell for ever to debauchery—profligacy—dissipation, for ever.”—I interrupted him by saying, I was not aware, nor were his relatives, that he had been publicly distinguished as a debauchee. “Why, Doctor,” he replied, “possibly not—there may be others who have exposed themselves more absurdly than I have—who have drunk and raked more—but mine has been the vile profligacy of the heart—the dissipation of the feelings. But it shall cease! God knows I never thoroughly enjoyed it, though it has occasioned me a delicious sort of excitement, which has at length nearly destroyed me. I have clambered out of the scorching crater of Etna, scathed, but not consumed. I will now descend into the tranquil vales of virtue, and never, never leave them!” He wept—for he had not yet recovered the tone or mastery of his feelings. These salutary thoughts led to a permanent reformation; his illness had produced its effect. One other thing there was which yet occasioned him disquietude and uncertainty; he said he felt bound to seek the usual “satisfaction” from Captain ——! I and all around him, to whom he hinted it, scouted the idea; and he himself relinquished it on hearing that Captain — had called often during his illness, and left many cards, with the most anxious enquiries after his health; and in a day or two had a private interview with Mr Warningham, when he apologized in the most prompt and handsome manner for his violent conduct, and expressed the liveliest regrets at the serious consequences with which it had been attended.

Mr Warningham, to conclude, recovered but slowly; and as soon as his weakness would admit of the journey, removed to the family house in —shire; from thence he went to the seaside, and staid there till the close of the autumn, reading philosophy, and some of the leading writers on morals. He was married in October, and set off for the Continent in the spring. His constitution, however, had received a shock from which it never recovered; and two years after, Mr Warningham died of a decline at Genoa.

THE BROKEN HEART.

There was a large and gay party assembled one evening, in the memorable month of June, 1815, at a house in the remote western suburbs of London. Throngs of handsome and well-dressed women—a large retinue of the leading men about town—the dazzling light of chandeliers blazing like three suns overhead—the charms of music and dancing—together with that tone of excitement then pervading society at large, owing to our successful continental campaigns, which maddened England into almost daily annunciations of victory;—all these circumstances, I say, combined to supply spirit to every party. In fact, England was almost turned upside down with universal fêting!—Mrs —, the lady whose party I have just been mentioning, was in ecstasy at the éclat with which the whole was going off, and charmed with the buoyant animation with which all seemed inclined to contribute their quota to the evening's amusement. A young lady of some personal attractions, most amiable manners, and great accomplishments—particularly musical—had been repeatedly solicited to sit down to the piano, for the purpose of favouring the company with the favourite Scottish air, "The Banks of Allan Water." For a long time, however, she steadfastly resisted their importunities, on the plea of low spirits. There was evidently an air of deep pensiveness, if not melancholy, about her, which ought to have corroborated the truth of the plea she urged. She did not seem to gather excitement with the rest; and rather endured, than shared, the gaieties of the evening. Of course, the young folks around her of her own sex whispered their suspicions that she was in love; and, in point of fact, it was well known by several present, that Miss — was engaged to a young officer who had earned considerable distinction in the Peninsular campaign, and to whom she was to be united on his return from the continent. It need not therefore be wondered at, that a thought of the various casualties to which a soldier's life is exposed—especially a bold and brave young soldier, such as her intended had proved himself—and the possibility, if not probability, that he might ~~and~~ never

"Return to claim his blushing bride"

—but be left behind among the glorious throng of the fallen—sufficed to overcast her mind with gloomy anxieties and apprehensions. It was, indeed, owing solely to the affectionate importunities of her relatives, that she was prevailed on to be seen in society at all. Had her own inclinations been consulted, she would have sought solitude, where she might, with weeping and trembling, commend her hopes to the hands of Him "who seeth in secret," and "whose are the issues" of battle. As, however, Miss —'s rich contralto voice, and skilful powers of accompaniment, were much talked of, the company would listen to no excuses or apologies; so the poor girl was absolutely baited into sitting down to the piano, when she ran over a few melancholy chords with an air of reluctance and displacency. Her sympathies were soon excited by the fine tones—the tumultuous melody—of the keys she touched—and she struck into the soft and soothing symphony of "The Banks of Allan Water." The breathless silence of the bystanders—for nearly all the company was thronged around—was at length broken by her voice, stealing, "like faint blue gushing streams," on the delighted ears of her auditors, as she commenced singing that exquisite little ballad, with the most touching pathos and simplicity. She had just commenced the verse, when, to the surprise of every body around her, she suddenly ceased playing and singing, without removing her hands from the instrument, and gazed steadfastly forward with a vacant air, while the colour faded from her cheeks, and left them pale as the lily. She continued thus for some moments, to the alarm and astonishment of the company—motionless, and apparently unconscious of any one's presence. Her elder sister, much agitated, stepped towards her, placed her hand on her shoulder, endeavoured gently to rouse her, and said hurriedly, "Anne, Anne! What now is the matter?"—Miss — made no answer; but a few moments after, without moving her eyes, suddenly burst into a piercing shriek! Consternation seized all present.

"For his bride a soldier sought her,
And a winning tongue had he!"

"Sister—sister!—Dear Anne, are you ill?" again enquired her trembling sister, endeavouring to rouse her, but in vain. Miss — did not seem either to see or hear her. Her eyes still gazed fixedly forward, till they seemed gradually to expand, as it were, with an expression of glassy horror. All present seemed utterly confounded, and afraid to interfere with her. Whispers were heard, "She's ill—in a fit—run for some water. Good God, how strange—what a piercing shriek," &c. &c. At length Miss —'s lips moved. She began to mutter inaudibly; but by and bye those immediately near her could distinguish the words, "There!—there they are—with their lanterns.—Oh! they are looking out for the de-a-d!—They turn over the heaps.—Ah!—now—no!—that little hill of slain—see, see!—they are turning them over, one by one—There!—THERE HE IS!—Oh, horror! horror! horror!—RIGHT THROUGH

THE HEART!" and with a long shuddering groan, she fell senseless into the arms of her horror-struck sister. Of course all were in confusion and dismay—not a face present, but was blanched with agitation and affright on hearing the extraordinary words she uttered. With true delicacy and propriety of feeling, all those whose carriages had happened to have already arrived, instantly took their departure, to prevent their presence embarrassing or interfering with the family, who were already sufficiently bewildered. The room was soon thinned of all, except those who were immediately engaged in rendering their services to the young lady; and a servant was instantly dispatched, with a horse, for me. On my arrival, I found her in bed, (still at the house where the party was given, which was that of the young lady's sister-in-law.) She had fallen into a succession of swoons ever since she had been carried up from the drawing-room, and was perfectly senseless when I entered the bedchamber where she lay. She had not spoken a syllable since uttering the singular words just related; and her whole frame was cold and rigid—in which she seemed to have received some strange shock, which had altogether paralysed her. By the use, however, of strong stimulants, we succeeded in at length restoring her to something like consciousness, but I think it would have been better for her—judging from the event—never to have woken again from forgetfulness. She opened her eyes under the influence of the searching stimulants we applied, and stared vacantly for an instant on those standing round her bedside. Her countenance, of an ashy hue, was damp with clammy perspiration, and she lay perfectly motionless, except when her frame undulated with long deep-drawn sighs.

"Oh, wretched, wretched, wretched girl!" she murmured at length—"why have I lived till now? Why did you not suffer me to expire? He called me to join him—I was going—and you will not let me—but I MUST go—yes, yes."

"Anne—dearest!—Why do you talk so? Charles is not gone—he will return soon—he will indeed!"—sobbed her sister.

"Oh, never, never! You could not see what I saw, Jane"—she shuddered—"Oh, it was frightful! How they tumbled about the heaps of the dead!—how they stripped—oh, horror, horror!"

"My dear Miss —, you are dreaming—raving—indeed you are," said I, holding her hand in mine—"Come, come—you must not give way to such gloomy, such nervous fancies—you must not indeed. You are frightening your friends to no purpose."

"What do you mean?" she replied, looking me suddenly full in the face. "I tell you it is true! Ah me, Charles is dead—I know it—I saw him! Shot right through the heart. They were stripping him, when—" And heaving three or four short convulsive sobs, she again swooned. Mrs —, the lady of the house, (the sister-in-law of Miss —, as I think I have mentioned,) could endure the distressing scene no longer, and was carried out of the room, fainting, in the arms of her husband. With great difficulty, we succeeded in restoring Miss — once more to consciousness; but the frequency and duration of her relapses began seriously to alarm me. The spirit, being brought so often to the brink, might at last suddenly flit off into eternity, without any one's being aware of it. I, of course, did all that my professional knowledge and experience suggested; and, after expressing my readiness to remain all night in the house, in the event of any sudden alteration in Miss — for the worse, I took my departure, promising to call very early in the morning. Before leaving, Mr — had acquainted me with all the particulars above related; and, as I rode home, I could not help feeling the liveliest curiosity, mingled with the most intense sympathy for the unfortunate sufferer, to see whether the corroborating event would stamp the present as one of those extraordinary occurrences, which occasionally "come o'er us like a summer-cloud," astonishing and perplexing every one.

The next morning, about nine o'clock, I was again at Miss —'s bedside. She was nearly in the same state as that in which I had left her the preceding evening—only feebler, and almost continually stupified.

She seemed, as it were, stunned with some severe but invisible stroke. She said scarcely any thing, but often uttered a low, moaning, indistinct sound, and whispered at intervals, "Yes—shortly, Charles, shortly—tomorrow." There was no rousing her by conversation; she noticed no one, and would answer no questions. I suggested the propriety of calling in additional medical assistance; and, in the evening, met two eminent brother physicians in consultation at her bedside. We came to the conclusion that she was sinking rapidly, and that, unless some miracle intervened to restore her energies, she would continue with us but a very little longer. After my brother-physicians had left, I returned to the sick-chamber, and sat by Miss —'s bedside for more than an hour. My feelings were much agitated at witnessing her singular and affecting situation. There was such a sweet and sorrowful expression about her pallid features, deepening, occasionally, into such hopelessness of heart-broken anguish, as no one could contemplate without deep emotion. There was, besides, something mysterious and awing—something of what in Scotland is called second-sight—in the circumstances which had occasioned her illness.

"Gone—gone!" she murmured, with closed eyes, while I was sitting and gazing in silence on her, "gone—and in glory! Ah! I shall see the young conqueror—I shall! How he will love me!—Ah! I recollect," she continued, after a long interval, "it was the 'Banks of Allan Water' these cruel people made me sing—and my heart breaking the while!—What was the verse I was singing when I saw"—she shuddered—"oh!—this—

'For his bride a soldier sought her,
And a winning tongue had he—
On the banks of Allan water
None so gay as she!

But the summer grief had brought her,
And the soldier—false was he!—

Oh, no, no, never—Charles—my poor murdered Charles—never!" she groaned, and spoke no more that night. She continued utterly deaf to all that was said in the way of sympathy or remonstrance; and, if her lips moved at all, it was only to utter faintly some such words as,

"Oh, let me—let me leave in peace!" During the two next days, she continued drooping rapidly. The only circumstance about her demeanour, particularly noticed, was, that she once moved her hands for a moment over the counterpane, as though she were playing the piano—a sudden flush overspread her features—her eyes stared, as though she were startled by the appearance of some phantom or other, and she gasped, "There, there!"—after which she relapsed into her former state of stupor.

How will it be credited, that on the fourth morning of Miss —'s illness, a letter was received from Paris by her family, with a black seal, and franked by the noble colonel of the regiment in which Charles — had served, communicating the melancholy intelligence, that the young Captain had fallen towards the close of the battle of Waterloo; for while in the act of charging at the head of his corps, a French cavalry officer shot him with his pistol right through the heart! The whole family, with all their acquaintance, were unutterably shocked at the news—almost petrified with amazement at the strange corroboration of Miss —'s prediction. How to communicate it to the poor sufferer was now a serious question, or whether to communicate it at all at present? The family at last, considering that it would be unjustifiable in them any longer to withhold the intelligence, intrusted the painful duty to me. I therefore repaired to her bedside alone, in the evening of the day on which the letter had been received; that evening was the last of her life! I sat down in my usual place beside her, and her pulse, countenance, breathing, cold extremities—together with the fact, that she had taken no nourishment whatever since she had been laid on her bed—convinced me that the poor girl's sufferings were soon to terminate. I was at a loss for a length of time how to break the oppressive silence. Observing, however, her fading eyes fixed on me, I determined, as it were accidentally, to attract them to the fatal letter which I then held in my hand. After a while she observed it; her eye suddenly settled on the ample coroneted seal, and the sight operated something like an electric shock.

She seemed struggling to speak, but in vain. I now wished to Heaven I had never agreed to undertake the duty which had been imposed upon me. I opened the letter, and looking steadfastly at her, said, in as soothing tones as my agitation could command,—"My dear girl—now, don't be alarmed, or I shall not tell you what I am going to tell you."—She trembled, and her sensibilities seemed suddenly restored; for her eyes assumed an expression of alarmed intelligence, and her lips moved about like those of a person who feels them parched with agitation, and endeavours to moisten them. "This letter has been received to-day from Paris," I continued; "it is from Colonel Lord —, and brings word that—that—that—" I felt suddenly choked, and could not bring out the words.

"That my Charles is dead—I know it. Did I not tell you so?" said Miss —, interrupting me, with as clear and distinct a tone of voice as she ever had in her life. I felt confounded. Had the unexpected operation of the news I brought been able to dissolve the spell which had withered her mental energies, and afford promise of her restoration to health?

Has the reader ever watched a candle which is flickering and expiring in its socket, suddenly shoot up into an instantaneous brilliance, and then be utterly extinguished? I soon saw it was thus with poor Miss —. All the expiring energies of her soul were suddenly collected to receive this corroboration of her vision—if such it may be called—and then she would,

"Like a lily drooping, Bow her head, and die."

To return: She begged me, in a faltering voice, to read her all the letter. She listened with closed eyes, and made no remark, when I had concluded. After a long pause, I exclaimed—"God be praised, my dear Miss —, that you have been able to receive this dreadful news so firmly!"

"Doctor, tell me, have you no medicine that could make me weep?—Oh, give it, give it me; it would relieve me, for I feel a mountain on my breast—it is pressing me," replied she feebly, uttering the words at long intervals. Pressing her hand in mine, I begged her to be calm, and the oppression would soon disappear.

"Oh—oh—oh, that I could weep, Doctor!" She whispered something else, but inaudibly. I put my ear close to her mouth, and distinguished something like the words—"I am—I am—call her—hush—" accompanied with a faint, fluttering, gurgling sound. Alas, I too well understood it! With much trepidation I ordered the nurse to summon the family into the room instantly. Her sister Jane was the first that entered, her eyes swollen with weeping, and seemingly half suffocated with the effort to conceal her emotions.

"Oh, my darling, precious, precious sister Anne!" she sobbed, and knelt down at the bedside, flinging her arms round her sister's neck—kissing the gentle sufferer's cheeks and mouth.

"Anne!—love!—darling!—Don't you know me?" She groaned, kissing her forehead repeatedly. Could I help weeping? All who had entered were standing around the bed, sobbing, and in tears. I kept my fingers at the wrist of the dying sufferer; but could not feel whether or not the pulse beat, which, however, I attributed to my own agitation.

"Speak—speak—my darling Anne! speak to me; I am your poor sister Jane!" sobbed the agonized girl, continuing fondly kissing her sister's cold lips and forehead. She suddenly started—exclaimed, "Oh, God, she's dead!" and sunk instantly senseless on the floor. Alas, alas, it was too true; my sweet and broken-hearted patient was no more!

THE NOVEL—A SATIRE.

ONE night the Poet—(for in these dull times,
Each fool becomes a poet when he rhymes)—
Feasted his friend, yet gave no feast more fine
Than plain boil'd beef, a pudding, and old wine.
In gentle converse pass'd the hours away,
Kings mix'd with grouse, and politics with hay;
Each in soft chair luxuriously reclined,
Each pleased with each, and every care resign'd;
Strong and more strong the stream of friendship flow'd;
Bright and more bright their wit and glances glow'd,
Till the pleased Squire on many a mingled pile
Of tales and statutes cast approving smile—
On Bowles and Blackstone fix'd his softest looks,
And, though the scene was Suffolk, talk'd of books.

THE SQUIRE.

Thank Heaven, which many comforts round me placed,
Gave health, ease, freedom, and denied me taste—
No critic I, discerning or severe,
To find a beauty there, a blemish here;
One equal rapture fills me as I stray
Through Scott's bright song, or Shiel's uproarious play—
I own each fancy fine, each image just,
And read Leigh Hunt himself—without disgust!

POET.

Al! blest your fate, who thus a charm can find
Where scorn and anger vex another's mind;
Whose spell-bound eyes, with Oberon's plant o'erspread,
See sense or beauty in an ass's head;
Whose chemic mind, by reason uncontroll'd,
Can turn the dross of dulness into gold.
Alas! some demon, when I read, presides,
Reveals each fault, and every beauty hides;
Bids idiot pathos in each sentence whine,
And vulgar folly flaunt in every line.

Bards bold and true no more on earth are found
To stir our hearts "as with a trumpet's sound,"
But loud-tongued nonsense wakes the turgid strain,
And impious weakness grovels in her train—
Creation's glories fill the soul of Ball,
And Milton's muse awakes at Cox's call,
Bæotian owls round hell's vast confines croak,
And Satan dies—o'ercome by Gummery's smoke.

SQUIRE.

These I disclaim; with scorn I turn away
From each dull driveller's sanctimonious lay,
Whose pompous rhymes Religion's self degrade,
Make Prayer a farce, and Piety a trade—
Yet surely genius in our land is strong,
Though now no longer it breaks forth in song—
To other themes our bards have turn'd their might;
And, lo! the Novel rises on the sight.

POET.

Granted, that some remain, whose muse of fire,
Though wing'd no longer, still escapes the mire;
Whose Pegasus no more in Cloudland glows,
But drags Life's chariot through the realms of prose;
Yet fiery still, scarce half subdued to earth,
Th' ethereal courser shews a heav'nly birth.
But, lo! what creatures follow in their track!
What tottering limbs betray each long-eared hack!
What hideous discord marks each jocund bray,
As with vain toil they labour to be gay!

SQUIRE.

Oh, hard to please! to wit's best flashes blind!
Do force and humour fail to soothe your mind?
Does Fashion's self describe her glittering train,
And ope the secrets of her halls in vain?
Can high-born damsels write, yet fail to please,
Nor letter'd lords your critic rage appease?
Can titled Morgan unrequited tell,
How princes talk, how wisely, and how well?

POET.

Titled indeed! Miladi shews her skill
In wondrous wit, and sense more wondrous still—Travels or Tales, whiche'er engage her mind,
Shew the same spirit and deep thought combined,
The virtuous wish, the pure and patriot heart,
And the meek woman's unassuming part.
All these she shews; and flaunts before our eyes,
A thing to elevate, instruct, surprise,
The soul of whim, too meteor-like to fix,
The chief in fashion, and in politics.
Yet strong suspicions oft unbidden rise,
That the fair lady is more fair than wise,
That fancy still in all her statements blends,
But revels chiefly in her list of friends,—
That the dear dukes of whom she fondly sings
Owe rank and title to Utopian kings,—
That her Romances scarce her facts outdo,
And that her facts are all Romances too.—
And fashion?—Are there two of all the tribe
Of would-be wits, who know what they describe?—
Lo! the fair laundress, perch'd in high St Giles,
Paints to one dimple how the Countess smiles;
While Prince and Peer their wit and wisdom owe
To pilfering valets housed in Rottenrow.

Footmen discharged draw statesmen out of place;
 And cooks first pillage, and then paint his Grace.
 And Love, young Love, thou universal theme O'er fashion's scribblers first, last, best, supreme!
 Whether in Grosvenor Square thou takest thy rise,
 Where Weippert's madd'ning bow resistless flies,
 Or in the country's sentimental shades
 Attack'st patrician youths and noble maids,
 Thy fate's the same, unceasing doom'd to stray
 'Mid ball and rout, drums, opera, park, and play:
 The scoundrel friend deceives, the uncle dies,
 Pure, happy scenes to bless each charmer rise;
 And thou, immortal Love! so strong thy root,
 Surviv'st a duel and a Chancery suit!
 Then flows such wealth as Lowther never knew,
 Then ope the stores of Stafford and Buccleuch;
 Then shirtless scribes bestow whole counties' rents,
 Exhaust the mint, and rob the four per cents,—
 And senseless heroes thus our praise secure—
 Their lordships may be fools, but shan't be poor.
 And oh! what language marks each titled dame,
 How high each lord ranks Lindley Murray's fame!
 Indignant wit on prudish grammar frowns,
 While singular verbs coquette with plural nouns,
 And Ton exults in similes like these,
 "As fine as tenpence," and "as thick as pease."
 Proverbs from loveliest lips unnumber'd fly,
 And Lieven's self "has other fish to fry."
 Austria's gay princess who so blind as miss
 In "dat, mi lor', mit, vat, madear, and dis?"*
 Such foreign graces every heart must melt—
 Alas! they're only foreign while they're spelt.

SQUIRE.

What only while they're spelt?—oh wise and sage!
 Why, real French fills half of every page—

POET.

And why?—You can't suppose that English wives
 Talk such a piebald babel all their lives;
 That English daughters spoil their native grace
 With grin, and exclamation, and grimace;
 End with bad English what worse French began,
 And speak upon the Hamiltonian plan—
 That English sons in every sentence shew
 Italian, French, and English in a row;
 Swear with Dutch boors, or drink with Spanish friars—
 Poor polyglott editions of their sires.
 Believe it not; pure English undefiled,
 Such as of old was spoke when Wortley smiled,
 Such still is spoke—and surely far more dear
 Is good plain English to an English ear,
 Than hisp'd-out phrases stol'n from every clime,
 And strangely alter'd—to conceal the crime.

SQUIRE.

Yet, without French, how dull the page would look;
 Must no Italics mark when speaks a Duke?
 Must peers and beauties flirt in common print;
 And no small letters aid a statesman's hint?

POET.

Yes! let them write; let cook and scullion scrawl;
 Let Colburn or Minerva print them all!

* Vid. The Exclusives.

If lively Betty in her book transfer
 To Lady Jane, what Thomas sighs to her ;
 If the old Earl's the coachman in disguise,
 And if the Duchess Dolly's place supplies ;
 If John, ennobled, holds a high debauch,
 And breaks the head of Priscian and the watch,
 What is't to me ? The tale's a pleasing tale,
 And murdering nature scarce deserves the jail.
 Flourish ye vulgar drivellings of the vain,
 The fill'd with folly, and the void of brain !
 Ye Tales of Ton shine on for countless years,
 Proud of your idiot squires and witless peers !
 Tales of High Life, in endless beauty bloom
 Mirrors of grandeur in the butler's room !
 And ye, in servants' hall for aye be seen,
 Obscure Blue Stockings, Davenels, and D'Erbine !
 Yet Sympathy her gentle woes may add,
 Where sorry authors made their readers sad ;
 The thoughtful student well may sigh to know
 That mortal dulness ever sank so low ;
 The pensive tear may innocently fall
 On scenes where simple Folly rules o'er all.—
 Not so, when Ribaldry, 'neath Fiction's name,
 Shews equal dulness with a deadlier aim ;
 Paints not Almack's to bid the kitchen stare,
 Nor fills the pantry with St James's air ;
 But soars to crime, and strives to gain the art,
 To sap the morals, and corrupt the heart.—
 See where Ecarté's prurient scenes betray
 The madd'ning reign of beauty and of play ;
Seeming to guard against the bait they throw,
Seeming to hide what most they mean to shew.
 Tempting, like Spartan maids, by half revealing,
 And tempting more, perhaps, by half concealing.
 Where'er we move, some yielding beauty woos,
 Rich in the sensual graces of the stews ;
 While warm descriptions every charm define,
 And all the brothel breathes from every line.
 Nor pass the Roué in this list of shame,
 Whose equal faults an equal scorn may claim,—
 Where Drury Lane her morals deigns to teach,
 And Covent Garden yields her flow'rs of speech ;
 Where heroes, witty, graceful, gay, polite,
 Act like Count Fathom, and like Egan write ;*
 Describe such scenes as Harriet might disgrace,
 Or call a blush on pimpled Hazlitt's face !
 Ingenious authors ! who so closely shape
 Your course betwixt seduction and a rape,
 That wondering readers catch the pleasing hope,
 To see your heroes dangling from a rope,
 Think ye the "morals" ye drawl forth at last,
 Shall shield, like penitence, your actions past ;
 Even though your rake, by one unchanging rule,
 Is tamed and married to a flirt or fool ?
 Or, harder fate, if harder fate you know,
 Dies e'er his pen has traced the last huge O !!!†
 Think ye two ribald volumes are forgiven,
 Provided in the third he talks of heaven ?

* The comparison here is only to the "slang," not to the vivacity of that ingenious fingerigrapher of the Ring.

† The Roué concludes with this very appalling exclamation.

As if, dull rogues! our scorn ye could assuage,
 For Berkeley's youth by Zachary's old age!
 Nature, which all things righteously ordains,
 Gives rascals malice, but denies them brains;
 So to some puppy fill'd with fear and spite,
 She gives the wish—without the power—to bite;
 So to Sir Roger, scarce released from school,*
 She gives obscenity—but proclaims him fool.

But turn we now where other scenes invite,
 Where sense and pathos, wit and mirth, unite.
 Lo, in some dell, far hid amidst the wild,
 In virtue's sunshine, blooms the cottage child;
 No charm she borrows from appalling deeds,
 No spectres rise, no dark-eyed rival bleeds;
 Yet in bleak vale, lone moor, or heath-clad hill,
 The awaken'd heart attends and loves her still.
 And near the poor man's couch what thoughts arise
 'Mid tearful prayers, as yon grey Elder dies!
 How rock and cliff resound the shepherd's lays!
 How earth seems vocal with her Maker's praise!
 Whether with Hannah Lee we wander slow,
 Through the thick midnight and the drifting snow;
 Or with lone Margaret every pang endure,
 Which makes her own pure heart more heavenly pure;
 In smiles or tears, in storm or calm, we find,
 How thrills the touch of Genius through the mind!
 And Nature holds her sway as Lockhart tells,
 How dark the grief that with the guilty dwells;
 How various passions through the bosom move,
 Dalton's high hope, and Ellen's sinless love.
 Creative fancy gives a lovelier green
 To Godstowe's glade; and hallows all the scene
 Where Love's low whisper sooth'd their wildest fears,
 Till Joy grew voiceless and flow'd forth in tears.
 But wherefore idly thus proceed to shew
 Where wit, truth, nature, mix in genial glow?
 Galt's humorous pow'r, Hogg's tale to nature true,
 And her rich pencil who Clan Albin drew?
 Smith—though a model seems before him still,
 And all his art seems imitative skill,—
 Though still the mimic in each step he shews,
 Like Davy "majorin" in Bradwardine's clothes,— Smith yet has wit, has humour, fancy, fire,
 And what the devil more can one desire?
 De Vere and t'other Dromio—nice Tremaine,
 Well-bred, good dressers, sensible and vain;
 Judges of wit, teas, books, and pantaloons,
 Are "spoons" indeed, but then—they're polish'd "spoons."
 Yet in this catalogue of glorious names,
 From Anastasius Hope, to Darnley James,
 First, best of all, oh, never be forgot—

SQUIRE.

Stop. Not a single word of Walter Scott.
 I listen'd long impatient for a close,
 But still one name and then another rose;
 I sigh'd, cough'd, yawn'd, and snored in very spite—
 I've had a pleasant sleep, and now—good-night.

* This blockhead has published a novel called Sir Thomas Gastaneys, a minor; of which the less that is said the better.

EXPIATION.

MARGARET BURNSIDE was an orphan. Her parents, who had been the poorest people in the parish, had died when she was a mere child; and as they had left no near relatives, there were few or none to care much about the desolate creature, who might be well said to have been left friendless in the world. True, that the feeling of charity is seldom wholly wanting in any heart; but it is generally but a cold feeling among hard-working folk, towards objects out of the narrow circle of their own family affections, and selfishness has a ready and strong excuse in necessity. There seems, indeed, to be a sort of chance in the lot of the orphan offspring of paupers. On some the eye of Christian benevolence falls at the very first moment of their uttermost destitution—and their worst sorrows, instead of beginning, terminate with the tears shed over their parents' graves. They are taken by the hands, as soon as their hands have been stretched out for protection, and admitted as inmates into households, whose doors, had their fathers and mothers been alive, they would never have darkened. The light of comfort falls upon them during the gloom of grief, and attends them all their days. Others, again, are overlooked at the first fall of affliction, as if in some unaccountable fatality; the wretchedness with which all have become familiar, no one very tenderly pities; and thus the orphan, reconciled herself to the extreme hardships of her condition, lives on uncheered by those sympathies out of which grow both happiness and virtue, and yielding by degrees to the constant pressure of her lot, becomes poor in spirit as in estate, and either vegetates like an almost worthless weed that is carelessly trodden on by every foot, or if by nature born a flower, in time loses her lustre, and all her days—not long—leads the life not so much of a servant, as of a slave.

Such, till she was twelve years old, had been the fate of Margaret Burnside. Of a slender form and weak constitution, she had never been able for much work; and thus from one discontented and harsh master and mistress to another, she had been transferred from house to house—always the poorest—till she came to be looked on as an encumbrance rather than a help in any family, and thought hardly worth her bread. Sad and sickly she sat on the braces herding the kine. It was supposed that she was in a consumption—and as the shadow of death seemed to lie on the neglected creature's face, a feeling something like love was awakened towards her in the heart of pity, for which she shewed her gratitude by still attending to all household tasks with an alacrity beyond her strength. Few doubted that she was dying—and it was plain that she thought so herself; for the Bible, which, in her friendlessness, she had always read more than other children, who were too happy to reflect often on the Word of that Being from whom their happiness flowed, was now, when leisure permitted, seldom or never out of her hands, and in lonely places, where there was no human ear to hearken, did the dying girl often support her heart when quaking in natural fears of the grave, by singing to herself hymns and psalms. But her hour was not yet come—though by the inscrutable decrees of Providence doomed to be hideous—and sad with almost inextinguishable guilt. As for herself—she was innocent as the linnet that sang beside her in the broom, and innocent was she to be up to the last throbbings of her religious heart. When the sunshine fell on the leaves of her Bible, the orphan seemed to see in the holy words, brightening through the radiance, assurances of forgiveness of all her sins—small sins indeed—yet to her humble and contrite heart exceeding great—and to be pardoned only by the intercession of Him who died for us on the tree. Often, when clouds were in the sky, and blackness covered the Book, Hope died away from the discoloured page—and the lonely creature wept and sobbed over the doom denounced on all who sin, and repent not—whether in deed or in thought. And thus religion became with her an awful thing—till, in her resignation, she feared to die. But look on that flower by the hill-side path, withered, as it seems, beyond the power of sun and air, and dew and rain, to restore it to the beauty of life. Next day, you happen to return to the place, its leaves are of a dazzling green, its blossoms of a dazzling crimson, and its joyful beauty is felt over all the wilderness. So was it with this Orphan. Nature, as if kindling towards her in sudden love, not only restored her in a few weeks to life—but to perfect health; and ere long she, whom few had looked at, and for whom still fewer cared, was acknowledged to be the fairest girl in all the parish—and the most beautiful of any while she continued to sit, as she had always done from very childhood, on the poor's form in the lobby of the kirk. Such a face, such a figure, and such a manner, in one so poorly attired, and so meekly placed, attracted the eyes of the young Ladies in the Patron's Gallery. Margaret Burnside was taken under their especial protection—sent for two years to a superior school, where she was taught all things useful for persons in humble life—and while yet scarcely fifteen, returning to her native parish, was appointed teacher of a small school of her own, to which were sent all the female children that could be spared from home, from those of parents poor as her own had been, up to those of the farmers and small proprietors, who knew the blessings of a good education—and that without it, the minister may preach in vain. And thus Margaret Burnside grew and blossomed like the lily of the field—and every eye blessed her—and she drew her breath in gratitude, piety, and peace.

Thus a few happy and useful years passed by—and it was forgotten by all—but herself—that Margaret Burnside was an orphan. But to be without one near and dear blood-relative in all the world, must often, even to the happy heart of youthful innocence, be more than a pensive—a painful thought; and therefore, though Margaret Burnside was always cheerful among her little scholars, and wore a sweet smile on her face, yet in the retirement of her own room (a pretty parlour, with a window looking into a flower-garden,) and on her walks among the braes, her mien was somewhat melancholy, and her eyes wore that touching expression, which seems doubtfully to denote—neither joy nor sadness—but a habit of soul which, in its tranquillity, still partakes of the mournful, as if memory dwelt often on past sorrows, and hope scarcely ventured to indulge in dreams of future repose. That profound orphan-feeling embued her whole character; and sometimes when the young Ladies from the Castle smiled praises upon her, she retired in unendurable gratitude to her chamber—and wept.

Among the friends at whose houses she visited were the family at Moor-side, the highest hill-farm in the parish, and on which her father had been a hind. It consisted of the master, a man whose head was grey, his son and daughter, and a grandchild, her scholar, whose parents were dead. Gilbert Adamson had long been a widower—indeed his wife had never been in the parish, but had died abroad. He had been a soldier in his youth and prime of manhood; and when he came to settle at Moor-side, he had been looked at with no very friendly eyes; for evil rumours of his character had preceded his arrival there—and in that peaceful pastoral parish, far removed from the world's strife, suspicions, without any good reason perhaps, had attached themselves to the morality and religion of a man, who had seen much foreign service, and had passed the best years of his life in the wars. It was long before these suspicions faded away, and with some they still existed in an invincible feeling of dislike, or even aversion. But the natural fierceness and ferocity which, as these peaceful dwellers among the hills imagined, had at first, in spite of his efforts to control them, often dangerously exhibited themselves in fiery outbreaks, advancing age had gradually subdued; Gilbert Adamson had grown a hard-working and industrious man; affected, if he followed it not in sincerity, even an austere religious life; and as he possessed more than common sagacity and intelligence, he had acquired at last, if not won, a certain ascendancy in the parish, even over many whose hearts never opened nor warmed towards him—so that he was now an elder of the kirk—and, as the most unwilling were obliged to acknowledge, a just steward to the poor. His grey hairs were not honoured, but it would not be too much to say that they were respected. Many who had doubted him before came to think they had done him injustice, and sought to wipe away their fault by regarding him with esteem, and shewing themselves willing to interchange all neighbourly kindnesses and services with all the family at Moorside. His son, though somewhat wild and unsteady, and too much addicted to the fascinating pastimes of flood and field, often so ruinous to the sons of labour, and rarely long pursued against the law without vitiating the whole character, was a favourite with all the parish. Singularly handsome, and with manners above his birth, Ludovic was welcome wherever he went, both with young and old. No merry-making could deserve the name without him, and at all meetings for the display of feats of strength and agility, far and wide, through more counties than one, he was the champion. Nor had he received a mean education. All that the parish schoolmaster could teach he knew; and having been the darling companion of all the gentlemen's sons in the Manse, the faculties of his mind had kept pace with theirs, and from them he had caught, too, unconsciously, that demeanour so far superior to what could have been expected from one in his humble condition, but which, at the same time, seemed so congenial with his happy nature, as to be readily acknowledged to be one of its original gifts. Of his sister, Alice, it is sufficient to say, that she was the bosom-friend of Margaret Burnside, and that all who saw their friendship felt that it was just. The small parentless grand-daughter was also dear to Margaret—more than perhaps her heart knew, because that, like herself, she was an orphan. But the creature was also a merry and a madcap child, and her freakish pranks, and playful perversenesses, as she tossed her golden head in untameable glee, and went dancing and singing, like a bird on the boughs of a tree, all day long, by some strange sympathies entirely won the heart of her who, throughout all her own childhood, had been familiar with grief, and a lonely shedder of tears. And thus did Margaret love her, it might be said, even with a very mother's love. She generally passed her free Saturday afternoons at Moorside, and often slept there all night with little Ann in her bosom. At such times Ludovic was never from home, and many a Sabbath he walked with her to the kirk—all the family together—and once by themselves for miles along the moor—a forenoon of perfect sunshine, which returned upon him in his agony on his dying day.

No one said, no one thought that Ludovic and Margaret were lovers—nor were they, though well worthy indeed of each other's love; for the orphan's whole heart was filled and satisfied with a sense of duty, and all its affections were centred in her happy school, where all eyes blessed her, and where she had been placed for the good of all those innocent creatures, by them who had rescued her from the penury that kills the soul, and of whose gracious bounty she every night dreamt in her sleep. In her prayers she beseeched God to bless them rather than the wretch on her knees—their images, their names, were ever before her eyes and on her ear; and next to that peace of mind which passeth all understanding, and comes from the footstool of God into the humble, lowly, and contrite heart, was to that orphan, day and night, waking or asleep, the deep bliss of her gratitude. And thus Ludovic to her was a brother, and no more; a name sacred as that of sister, by which she always called her Alice, and was so called in return. But to Ludovic, who had a soul of fire, Margaret was dearer far than ever sister was to the brother whom, at the sacrifice of her own life, she might have rescued from death. Go where he might, a phantom was at his side—a pale fair face for ever fixed its melancholy eyes on his, as if foreboding something dismal even when they faintly smiled; and once he awoke at midnight, when all the house were asleep, crying, with shrieks, "O God of mercy! Margaret is murdered!" Mysterious passion of Love! that darkens its own dreams of delight with unimaginable horrors! Shall we call such dire bewilderment the superstition of troubled fantasy, or the inspiration of the prophetic soul!

From what seemingly insignificant sources—and by means of what humble instruments—may this life's best happiness be diffused over the households of industrious men! Here was the orphan daughter of forgotten paupers, both dead ere she could speak; herself, during all her melancholy childhood, a pauper even more enslaved than ever they had been—one of the most neglected and unvalued of all God's creatures—who, had she then died, would have been buried in some nettled nook of the kirkyard, nor her grave been watered almost by one single tear—suddenly brought out from the cold and cruel shade in which she had been withering away, by the interposition of human but angelic hands, into the heaven's most gracious sunshine, where all at once her beauty blossomed like the rose. She, who for so many years had been even begrudgingly fed on the poorest and scantiest fare, by Penury ungrateful for all her weak but zealous efforts to please by doing her best, in sickness and sorrow, at all her tasks, in or out of doors, and in all weathers, however rough and severe—was now raised to the rank of a moral, intellectual, and religious being, and presided over, tended, and instructed many little ones, far far happier in their childhood than it had been her lot to be, and all growing up beneath her now untroubled eyes, in innocence, love, and joy inspired into their hearts by her their young and happy benefactress. Not a human dwelling in all the parish, that had not reason to be thankful to Margaret Burnside. She taught them to be pleasant in their manners, neat in their persons, rational in their minds, pure in their hearts, and industrious in all their habits. Rudeness, coarseness, sullenness, all angry fits, and all idle dispositions—the besetting vices and sins of the children of the poor, whose home-education is often so miserably, and almost necessarily neglected—did this sweet Teacher, by the divine influence of meekness never ruffled, and tenderness never troubled, in a few months subdue and overcome—till her school-room, every day in the week, was, in its cheerfulness, sacred as a Sabbath, and murmured from morn till eve with the hum of perpetual happiness. The effects were soon felt in every house. All floors were tidier, and order and regularity enlivened every hearth. It was the pride of her scholars to get their own little gardens behind their parents' huts to bloom like that of the Brae—and in imitation of that flowery porch, to train up the pretty creepers on the wall. In the kirkyard, a smiling group every Sabbath forenoon waited for her at the gate—and walked, with her at their head, into the House of God—a beautiful procession to all their parents' eyes—one by one dropping away into their own seats, as the band moved along the little lobby, and the minister sitting in the pulpit all the while, looked solemnly down upon the fair flock—the shepherd of their souls!

It was Sabbath, but Margaret Burnside was not in the kirk. The congregation had risen to join in prayer, when the great door was thrown open, and a woman, apparelled as for the house of worship, but wild and ghastly in her face and eyes as a maniac hunted by evil spirits, burst in upon the service, and, with uplifted hands, beseeched the man of God to forgive her irreverent entrance, for that foulest and most unnatural murder had been done, and that her own eyes had seen the corpse of Margaret Burnside lying on the moor in a pool of blood! The congregation gave one groan, and then an outcry as if the roof of the kirk had been toppling over their heads. All cheeks waxed white, women fainted, and the firmest heart quaked with terror and pity, as once and again the affrighted witness, in the same words, described the horrid spectacle, and then rushed out into the open air, followed by hundreds, who, for some minutes, had been palsy-stricken; and now the kirkyard was all in a tumult round the body of her who lay in a swoon. In the midst of that dreadful ferment, there were voices crying aloud that the poor woman was mad, and that such horror could not be beneath the sun; for such a perpetration on the Sabbath-day, and first heard of just as the prayers of his people were about to ascend to the Father of all mercies, shocked belief, and doubt struggled with despair as in the helpless shud-derings of some dream of blood. The crowd were at last prevailed on by their pastor to disperse, and sit down on the tomb-stones, and water being sprinkled over the face of her who still lay in that mortal swoon, and the air suffered to circulate freely round her, she again opened her glassy eyes, and raising herself on her elbow, stared on the multitude, all gathered there so with and silent, and shrieked out, "The Day of Judgment! The Day of Judgment!"

The aged minister raised her on her feet, and led her to a grave, on which she sat down, and hid her face on his knees. "O that I should have lived to see the day—but dreadful are the decrees of the Most High—and she whom we all loved has been cruelly murdered! Carry me with you, people, and I will shew you where lies her corpse."

"Where—where is Ludovic Adamson?" cried a hoarse voice which none there had ever heard before; and all eyes were turned in one direction; but none knew who had spoken, and all again was hush. Then all at once a hundred voices repeated the same words, "Where—where is Ludovic Adamson?" and there was no reply. Then, indeed, was the kirkyard in an angry and a wrathful ferment, and men looked far into each other's eyes for confirmation of their suspicions. And there was whispering about things, that, though in themselves light as air, seemed now charged with hideous import; and then arose sacred appeals to Heaven's eternal justice, horribly mingled with oaths and curses; and all the crowd, springing to their feet, pronounced, "that no other but he could be the murderer."

It was remembered now, that for months past, Margaret Burnside had often looked melancholy—that her visits had been less frequent to Moor-side—and one person in the crowd said, that a few weeks ago she had come upon them suddenly in a retired place, when Margaret was weeping bitterly, and Ludovic tossing his arms, seemingly in wrath and distraction. All agreed that of late he had led a disturbed and reckless life—and that something dark and suspicious had hung about him, wherever he went, as if he were haunted by an evil conscience. But did not strange men sometimes pass through the Moor—squalid mendicants, robber-like from the far-off city—one by one, yet seemingly belonging to the same gang—with bludgeons in their hands—half-naked, and often drunken in their hunger, as at the doors of lonesome houses they demanded alms, or more like foot-pads than beggars, with stern gestures, rising up from the ditches on the way-side, stopped the frightened women and children going upon errands, and thanklessly received pence from the poor? One of them must have been the murderer! But then, again, the whole tide of suspicion would set in upon Ludovic—her lover—for the darker and more dreadful the guilt, the more welcome is it to the fears of the imagination when its waking dreams are floating in blood!

A tall figure came forward from the porch, and all was silence, when the congregation beheld the father of the suspected criminal! He stood still as a tree in a calm day,—trunk, limbs, moved not,—and his grey head was uncovered. He then stretched out his arm, not in an imploring, but in a commanding attitude, and essayed to speak; but his white lips quivered, and his tongue refused its office. At last, almost fiercely, he uttered, "Who dares denounce my son?" and like the growling thunder, the crowd cried, "All—all—he is the murderer!" Some said that the old man smiled; but it could have been but a convulsion of the features—outraged nature's wrung-out and writhing expression of disdain, to shew how a father's love brooks the cruelty of foolish falsehood and injustice.

Men, women, and children—all whom grief and horror had not made helpless—moved away towards the Moor—the woman who had seen the sight leading the way—for now her whole strength had returned to her, and she was drawn and driven by an irresistible passion to look again at what had almost destroyed her judgment. Now they were miles from the kirk, and over some brushwood, at the edge of a morass some distance from the common footpath, crows were seen diving and careering in the air, and a raven flapping suddenly out of the covert, sailed away with a savage croak along a range of cliffs. The whole multitude stood stock still at that carrion-sound. The guide said shudderingly, in a low hurried voice, "See, see—that is her mantle,"—and there indeed Margaret lay, all in a heap, maimed, mangled, murdered, with a hundred gashes. The corpse seemed as if it had been baked in frost, and was embedded in coagulated blood. Shreds and patches of her dress, torn away from her bosom, bestrewed the bushes—for many yards round about, there had been the trampling of feet, and a long lock of hair that had been torn from her temples, with the dews yet unmelted on it, was lying upon a plant of broom a little way from the corpse. The first to lift the body from the horrid bed was Gilbert Adamson. He had been long familiar with death in all its ghastliness, and all had now looked to him—forgetting for the moment that he was the father of the murderer—to perform the task from which they recoiled in horror. Resting on one knee, he placed the corpse on the other—and who could have believed, that even the most violent and cruel death could have wrought such a change on a face once so beautiful! All was distortion—and terrible it was to see the dim glazed eyes, fixedly open, and the orbs insensible to the strong sun that smote her face white as snow among the streaks as if left by bloody fingers! Her throat was all discoloured—and a silk handkerchief twisted into a cord, that had manifestly been used in the murder, was of a redder hue than when it had veiled her breast. No one knows what horror his eyes are able to look on, till they are tried. A circle of stupified gazers was drawn by a horrid fascination closer and closer round the corpse—and women stood there holding children by the hands, and fainted not, but observed the sight, and shuddered without shrieking, and stood there all dumb as ghosts. But the body was now borne along by many hands—at first none knew in what direction, till many voices muttered, "To Moorside—to Moorside"—and in an hour it was laid on the bed in which Margaret Burnside had so often slept with her beloved little Ann in her bosom.

The hand of some one had thrown a cloth over the corpse. The room was filled with people—but all their power and capacity of horror had been exhausted—and the silence was now almost like that which attends a natural death, when all the neighbours are assembled for the funeral. Alice, with little Ann beside her, kneeled at the bed, nor feared to lean her head close to the covered corpse—sobbing out syllables that shewed how passionately she prayed—and that she and her little niece—and, oh! for that unhappy father—were delivering themselves up into the hands of God. That father knelt not—neither did he sit down—nor move—nor groan—but stood at the foot of the bed, with arms folded almost sternly—and with his eyes fixed on the sheet, in which there seemed to be neither ruth nor dread—but only an austere composure, which, were it indeed but resignation to that dismal decree of Providence, had been most sublime—but who can see into the heart of a man either righteous or wicked, and know what may be passing there, breathed from the gates of heaven or of hell!

Soon as the body had been found, shepherds and herdsmen, fleet of foot as the deer, had set off to scour the country far and wide, hill and glen, mountain and morass, moor and wood, for the murderer. If he be on the face of the earth, and not self-plunged in despairing suicide into some quagmire, he will be found,—for all the population of many districts are now afoot, and precipices are clomb till now brushed but by the falcons. A figure, like that of a man, is seen by some of the hunters from a hill top, lying among the stones by the side of a solitary loch. They separate, and descend upon him, and then gathering in, they behold the man whom they seek, Ludovic Adamson, the murderer.

His face is pale and haggard—yet flushed as if by a fever centred in his heart. That is no dress fit for the Sabbath-day—soiled and savage-looking—and giving to the eyes that search an assurance of guilt. He starts to his feet, as they think, like some wild beast surprised in his lair, and gathering itself up to fight or fly. But—strange enormity—a Bible is in his hand! And the shepherd who first seized him, taking the book out of his grasp, looks into the page, and reads, "Whoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be surely shed." On a leaf is written, in her own well-known hand, "The gift of Margaret Burnside!" Not a word is said by his captors—they offer no needless violence—no indignities—but answer all enquiries of surprise and astonishment (O! can one so young be so hardened in wickedness!) by a stern silence, and upbraiding eyes, that like daggers must stab his heart. At last he walks doggedly and sullenly along, and refuses to speak—yet his tread is firm—there is no want of composure in his face—now that the first passion of fear or anger has left it; and now that they have the murderer in their clutch, some begin almost to pity him, and others to believe, or at least to hope, that he may be innocent. As yet they have said not a word of the crime of which they accuse him—but let him try to master the expression of his voice and his eyes as he may, guilt is in those stealthy glances—guilt is in those reckless tones—And why does he seek to hide his right hand in his bosom?—And whatever he may affect to say—they ask him not—most certainly that stain on his shirt-collar is blood. But now they are at Moorside.

There is still a great crowd all round about the house—in the garden—and at the door—and a troubled cry announces that the criminal has been taken, and is close at hand. His father meets him at the gate—and, kneeling down, holds up his clasped hands, and says, "My son, if thou art guilty, confess, and die." The criminal angrily waves his father aside, and walks towards the door. "Fools! fools! what mean ye by this? What crime has been committed? And how dare ye to think me the criminal? Am I like a murderer?"—"We never spoke to him of the murder—we never spoke to him of the murder!" cried one of the men who now held him by the arm; and all assembled then exclaimed, "Guilty, guilty—that one word will hang him! O, pity, pity, for his father and poor sister—this will break their hearts!" Appalled, yet firm of foot, the prisoner forced his way into the house; and turning, in his confusion, into the chamber on the left, there he beheld the corpse of the murdered on the bed—for the sheet had been removed—as yet not laid out, and disfigured and deformed just as she had been found on the moor, in the same misshapen heap of death! One long insane glare—one shriek, as if all his heartstrings at once had burst—and then down fell the strong man on the floor like lead. One trial was past which no human hardihood could endure—another, and yet another, awaits him—but these he will bear as the guilty brave have often borne them, and the most searching eye shall not see him quail at the bar or on the scaffold.

They lifted the stricken wretch from the floor, placed him in a chair, and held him upright, till he should revive from the fit. And he soon did revive; for health flowed in all his veins, and he had the strength of a giant. But when his senses returned, there was none to pity him; for the shock had given an expression of guilty horror to all his looks, and, like a man walking in his sleep under the temptation of some dreadful dream, he moved with fixed eyes towards the bed, and looking at the corpse, gobbled in hideous laughter, and then wept and tore his hair like a distracted woman or a child. Then he stooped down as he would kiss the face, but staggered back, and, covering his eyes with his hands, uttered such a groan as is sometimes heard rending the sinner's breast when the avenging Furies are upon him in his dreams. All who heard it felt that he was guilty—and there was a fierce cry through the room of, "Make him touch the body, and if he be the murderer, it will bleed!"—"Fear not, Ludovic, to touch it, my boy,"—said his father; "bleed afresh it will not, for thou art innocent; and savage though now they be, who once were proud to be thy friends, even they will believe thee guiltless when the corpse refuses to bear witness against thee—and not a drop leaves its quiet heart!" But his son spake not a word, nor did he seem to know that his father had spoken, but he suffered himself to be led passively towards the bed. One of the bystanders took his hand and placed it on the naked breast, when out of the corners of the teeth-clenched mouth, and out of the swollen nostrils, two or three blood-drops visibly oozed—and a sort of shrieking shout declared the sacred faith of all the crowd in the dreadful ordeal. "What body is this? 'tis all over blood!" said the prisoner, looking with an idiot vacancy on the faces that surrounded him. But now the sheriff of the county entered the room, along with some officers of justice—and he was spared any farther shocks from that old saving superstition. His wrists soon after were manacled. These were all the words he had uttered since he recovered from the fit—and he seemed now in a state of stupor.

Ludovic Adamson, after examination of witnesses who crowded against him from many unexpected quarters, was committed that very Sabbath night to prison on a charge of murder. On the Tuesday following, the remains of Margaret Burnside were interred. All the parish were at the funeral. In Scotland it is not customary for females to join in the last simple ceremonies of death. But in this case they did; and all her scholars, in the same white dresses in which they used to walk with her at their head into the kirk on Sabbaths, followed the bier. Alice and little Ann were there, nearest the coffin, and the father of him who had wrought all this woe was one of its supporters. The head of the murdered girl rested, it might be said, on his shoulder—but none can know the strength which God gives to his servants—and all present felt for him as he walked steadily under that dismal burden, a pity, and even an affection, which they had been unable to yield to him ere he had been so sorely tried. The Ladies from the Castle were among the other mourners, and stood by the open grave. A sunnier day had never shone from heaven, and that very grave itself partook of the brightness, as the coffin, with the gilt letters—"Margaret Burnside—Aged 18"—was let down, and in the darkness below disappeared. No flowers were sprinkled there—nor afterwards planted on the turf—vain offerings of unavailing sorrow! But in that nook—beside the bodies of her poor parents—she was left for the grass to grow over her, as over the other humble dead—and nothing but the very simplest headstone was placed there, with a sentence from Scripture below the name. There was less weeping, less sobbing, than at many other funerals; for as sure as Mercy ruled the skies, all believed that she was there—all knew it, just as if the gates of heaven had opened and shewed her a white-robed spirit at the right hand of the throne. And why should any rueful lamentation have been wailed over the senseless dust! But on the way home over the hills, and in the hush of evening beside their hearths, and in the stillness of night on their beds—all—young and old—all did nothing but weep!

For weeks—such was the pity, grief, and awe inspired by this portentous crime and lamentable calamity, that all the domestic ongoings in all the houses far and wide, were melancholy and mournful, as if the country had been fearing a visitation of the plague. Sin, it was felt, had brought not only sorrow on the parish, but shame that ages would not wipe away; and strangers, as they travelled through the moor, would point the place where the foulest murder had been committed in all the annals of crime. As for the family at Moorside—the daughter had their boundless compassion—though no eye had seen her since the funeral; but people, in speaking of the father, would still shake their heads, and put their fingers to their lips, and say to one another in whispers, that Gilbert Adamson had once been a bold, bad man—that his religion, in spite of all his repulsive austerity, wore not the aspect of truth—and that had he held a stricter and a stronger hand on the errors of his misguided son, this foul deed had not been perpetrated, nor that wretched sinner's soul given to perdition. Yet others had gentler and humaner thoughts. They remembered him walking along God-supported beneath the bier—and at the mouth of the grave—and feared to look on that head—formerly grizzled, but now quite grey—when on the very first Sabbath after the murder he took his place in the elder's seat—and was able to stand up along with the rest of the congregation, when the minister prayed for peace to his soul, and hoped for the deliverance out of jeopardy of him now lying in bonds. A low Amen went all round the kirk at these words—for the most hopeless called to mind that maxim of law, equity, and justice—that every man under accusation of crime should be held innocent till he is proved to be guilty. Nay, a human tribunal might condemn him, and yet might he stand acquitted before the tribunal of God.

There were various accounts of the behaviour of the prisoner. Some said that he was desperately hardened—others, sunk in sullen apathy and indifference—and one or two persons belonging to the parish who had seen him, declared that he seemed to care not for himself, but to be plunged in profound melancholy for the fate of Margaret Burnside, whose name he voluntarily mentioned, and then bowed his head on his knees and wept. His guilt he neither admitted at that interview, nor denied—but he confessed that some circumstances bore hard against him—and that he was prepared for the event of his trial—condemnation and death. “But if you are not guilty, Ludovic, who can be the murderer? Not the slightest shade of suspicion has fallen on any other person—and did not, alas! the body bleed when?”—The unhappy wretch sprang up from the bed, it was said, at these words, and hurried like a madman back and forward along the stone-floor of his cell. “Yea—yea,” at last he cried, “the mouth and nostrils of my Margaret did indeed bleed, when they pressed down my hand on her cold bosom. It is God’s truth!”—“God’s truth?”—“Yes—God’s truth. I saw one drop, and then another, trickle towards me—and I prayed to our Saviour to wipe them off before other eyes might behold the dreadful witness against me—but at that hour Heaven was most unmerciful—for those two small drops—as all of you saw—soon became a very stream—and all her face, neck, and breast—you saw it as well as I miserable—were at last drenched in blood. Then I may have confessed that I was guilty—did I, or did I not, confess it? Tell me—for I remember nothing distinctly;—but if I did—the judgment of offended Heaven, then punishing me for my sins, had made me worse than mad—and so had all your abhorrent eyes—and, men, if I did confess, it was the cruelty of God that drove me to it—and your cruelty—which was great —for no pity had any one for me that day, though Margaret Burnside lay before me a murdered corpse—and a hoarse whisper came to my ear urging me to confess—I well believe from no human lips, but from the Father of Lies, who, at that hour, was suffered to leave the pit to ensnare my soul.” Such was said to have been the main sense of what he uttered in the presence of two or three who had formerly been among his most intimate friends, and who knew not, on leaving his cell and coming into the open air, whether to think him innocent or guilty. As long as they thought they saw his eyes regarding them, and that they heard his voice speaking, they believed him innocent—but when the expression of the tone of his voice, and of the look of his eyes—which they had felt belonged to innocence—died away from their memory—then arose against him the strong, strange circumstantial evidence, which—wisely or unwisely—lawyers and judges have said cannot lie—and then, in their hearts, one and all of them pronounced him guilty.

But had not his father often visited the prisoner’s cell? Once—and once only—for in obedience to his son’s passionate prayer, beseeching him—if there were any mercy left either on earth or heaven—never more to enter that dungeon, the miserable parent had not again entered the prison—but he had been seen one morning at dawn, by one who knew his person, walking round and round the walls, staring up at the black building in distraction, especially at one small grated window in the north tower—and it is most probable that he had been pacing his rounds there during all the night. Nobody could conjecture, however dimly, what was the meaning of his banishment from his son’s cell. Gilbert Adamson, so stern to others, even to his own only daughter, had been always but too indulgent to his Ludovic—and had that lost wretch’s guilt, so exceeding great, changed his heart into stone, and made the sight of his old father’s grey hairs hateful to his eyes? But then the jailor, who had heard him imploring—beseeching—commanding his father to remain till after the trial at Moorside, said, that all the while the prisoner sobbed and wept like a child—and that when he unlocked the door of the cell, to let the old man out, it was a hard thing to tear away the arms and hands of Ludovic from his knees, while the father sat like a stone-image on the bed, and kept his tearless eyes fixed sternly upon the wall, as if not a soul had been present, and he himself had been a criminal condemned next day to die.

The father had obeyed, religiously, that miserable injunction, and from religion it seemed that he had found comfort. For Sabbath after Sabbath he was at the kirk—he stood, as he had been wont to do for years, at the poor's-plate, and returned grave salutations to those who dropt their mite into the small sacred treasury—his eyes calmly, and even critically, regarded the pastor during prayer and sermon—and his deep bass voice was heard, as usual, through all the house of God, in the Psalms. On week-days, he was seen by passers-by to drive his flocks a-field, and to overlook his sheep on the hill pastures, or in the pinfold; and as it was still spring, and seed-time had been late this season, he was observed holding the plough, as of yore—nor had his skill deserted him—for the furrows were as straight as if drawn by a rule on paper—and soon bright and beautiful was the braird on all the low lands of his farm. The Comforter was with him, and, sorely as he had been tried, his heart was not yet wholly broken, and it was believed that, for years, he might outlive the blow that at first had seemed more than a mortal man might bear and be! Yet that his woe, though hidden, was dismal, all ere long knew, from certain tokens that intrenched his face—cheeks shrunk and fallen, brow not so much furrowed as scarred, eyes quenched, hair thinner and thinner far, as if he himself had torn it away in handfuls during the solitude of midnight—and now absolutely as white as snow; and over the whole man an indescribable ancientness far beyond his years—though they were many, and most of them had been passed in torrid climes—all shewed how grief has its agonies as destructive as those of guilt, and those the most wasting when they work in the heart, and in the brain, unrelieved by the shedding of one single tear—when the very soul turns dry as dust, and life is imprisoned, rather than mingled, in the decaying—the mouldering frame!

The Day of Trial came, and all labour was suspended in the parish, as if it had been a mourning fast. Hundreds of people from this remote district poured into the circuit town, and besieged the court-house. Horsemen were in readiness, soon as the verdict should be returned, to carry the intelligence—of life or death—to all those glens. A few words will suffice to tell the trial, the nature of the evidence, and its issue. The prisoner, who stood at the bar, in black, appeared—though miserably changed from a man of great muscular power and activity, a magnificent man, into a tall thin shadow—perfectly unappalled; but in a face so white, and wasted, and woe-begone, the most profound physiognomist could read not one faintest symptom either of hope or fear, trembling or trust, guilt or innocence. He hardly seemed to belong to this world, and stood fearfully and ghastly conspicuous between the officers of justice, above all the crowd that devoured him with their eyes, all leaning towards the bar to catch the first sound of his voice, when to the indictment he should plead “Not Guilty.” These words he did utter, in a hollow voice altogether passionless, and then was suffered to sit down, which he did in a manner destitute of all emotion. During all the many long hours of his trial, he never moved head, limbs, or body, except once, when he drank some water, which he had not asked for, but which was given to him by a friend. The evidence was entirely circumstantial, and consisted of a few damning facts, and of many of the very slightest sort, which, taken singly, seemed to mean nothing, but which, when considered all together, seemed to mean something against him—how much or how little, there were among the agitated audience many differing opinions. But slight as they were, either singly or together, they told fearfully against the prisoner, when connected with the fatal few which no ingenuity could ever explain away; and though ingenuity did all it could do, when wielded by eloquence of the highest order—and as the prisoner's counsel sat down, there went a rustle and a buz through the court, and a communication of looks and whispers, that seemed to denote that there were hopes of his acquittal—yet, if such hopes there were, they were deadened by the calm, clear, logical address to the jury by the counsel for the crown, and destroyed by the judge's charge, which amounted almost to a demonstration of guilt, and concluded with a confession due to his oath and conscience, that he saw not how the jury could do their duty to their Creator, and their fellow-creatures, but by returning one verdict. They retired to consider it; and during a deathlike silence, all eyes were bent on a deathlike Image.

It had appeared in evidence, that the murder had been committed—at least all the gashes inflicted—for there were also finger-marks of strangulation—with a bill-hook, such as foresters use in lopping trees—and several witnesses swore that the bill-hook which was shewn them, stained with blood, and with hair sticking on the haft—belonged to Ludovic Adamson. It was also given in evidence—though some doubts rested on the nature of the precise words—that on that day, in the room with the corpse, he had given a wild and incoherent denial to the question then put to him in the din, "What he had done with the bill-hook?" Nobody had seen it in his possession since the spring before—but it had been found, after several weeks' search, in a hag in the moss, in the direction that he would have most probably taken—had he been the murderer—when flying from the spot to the loch where he was seized. The shoes which he had on when taken, fitted the foot-marks on the ground, not far from the place of the murder, but not so perfectly as another pair which were found in the house. But that other pair, it was proved, belonged to the old man; and therefore the correspondence between the foot-marks and the prisoner's shoes, though not perfect, was a circumstance of much suspicion. But a far stronger fact, in this part of the evidence, was sworn to against the prisoner. Though there was no blood on his shoes—when apprehended his legs were bare—though that circumstance, strange as it may seem, had never been noticed till he was on the way to prison! His stockings had been next day found lying on the sward, near the shore of the loch, manifestly after having been washed and laid out to dry in the sun. At mention of this circumstance a cold shudder ran through the court; but neither that, nor indeed any other circumstance in all the evidence—not even the account of the appearance which the murdered body exhibited when found on the moor, or when afterwards laid on the bed—extorted from the prisoner one groan—one sigh—or touched the imperturbable deathliness of his countenance. It was proved, that when searched—in prison—and not before—for the agitation that reigned over all assembled in the room at Moorside that dreadful day, had confounded even those accustomed to deal with suspected criminals—there were found in his pocket a small French gold watch, and also a gold brooch, which the Ladies of the Castle had given to Margaret Burnside. On these being taken from him, he had said nothing, but looked aghast. A piece of torn and bloody paper, which had been picked up near the body, was sworn to be in his handwriting; and though the meaning of the words yet legible was obscure, they seemed to express a request that Margaret would meet him on the moor on that Saturday afternoon she was murdered. The words, "Saturday"—"meet me"—"last time"—were not indistinct, and the paper was of the same quality and colour with some found in a drawer in his bedroom at Moorside. It was proved that he had been drinking with some dissolute persons—poachers and the like—in a public-house in a neighbouring parish all Saturday, till well on in the afternoon, when he left them in a state of intoxication—and was then seen running along the hillside in the direction of the moor. Where he past the night between the Saturday and the Sabbath, he could give no account, except once when, unasked, and as if speaking to himself, he was overheard by the jailor to mutter, "Oh! that fatal night—that fatal night!" And then, when suddenly interrogated, "Where were you?" he answered, "Asleep on the hill ;" and immediately relapsed into a state of mental abstraction. These were the chief circumstances against him, which his counsel had striven to explain away. That most eloquent person dwelt with affecting earnestness on the wickedness of putting any evil construction on the distracted behaviour of the wretched man when brought without warning upon the sudden sight of the mangled corpse of the beautiful girl, whom all allowed he had most passionately and tenderly loved ; and he strove to prove—as he did prove to the conviction of many—that such behaviour was incompatible with such guilt, and almost of itself established his innocence. All that was sworn to against him, as having passed in that dreadful room, was in truth for him—unless all our knowledge of the best and of the worst of human nature were not, as folly, to be given to the winds. He beseeched the jury, therefore, to look at all the other circumstances that did indeed seem to bear hard upon the prisoner, in the light of his innocence, and not of his guilt, and that they would all fade into nothing. What mattered his possession of the watch and other trinkets ? Lovers as they were, might not the unhappy girl have given them to him for temporary keepsakes ? Or might he not have taken them from her in some playful mood, or received them—(and the brooch was cracked, and the mainspring of the watch broken, though the glass was whole)—to get them repaired in the town, which he often visited, and she never ? Could human credulity for one moment believe, that such a man as the prisoner at the bar had been sworn to be by a host of witnesses—and especially by that witness, who, with such overwhelming solemnity, had declared he loved him as his own son, and would have been proud if heaven had given him such a son—he who had baptized him, and known him well ever since a child,—that such a man could rob the body of her whom he had violated and murdered ? If, under the instigation of the devil, he had violated and murdered her, and for a moment were made the hideous supposition, did vast hell hold that demon whose voice would have tempted the violator and murderer—suppose him both—yea that man at the bar—sworn to by all the parish, if need were, as a man of tenderest charities, and generosity unbounded,—in the lust of lucre, consequent on the satiating of another lust—to rob his victim of a few trinkets ! Let loose the wildest imagination into the realms of wildest wickedness, and yet they dared not, as they feared God, to credit for a moment the union of such appalling and such paltry guilt, in that man who now trembled not before them, but who seemed cut off from all the sensibilities of this life by the scythe of Misery that had shorn him down ! But why try to recount, however feebly, the line of defence taken by the speaker, who on that day seemed all but inspired. The sea may overturn rocks, or fire consume them till they split in pieces ; but a crisis there sometimes is in man's destiny, which all the powers ever lodged in the lips of man, were they touched with a coal from heaven, cannot avert, and when even he who strives to save, feels and knows that he is striving all in vain—aye, vain as a worm—to arrest the tread of Fate about to trample down its victim into the dust. All hoped—many almost believed—that the prisoner would be acquitted—that a verdict of " Not Proven," at least, if not of " Not Guilty," would be returned—but they had not been sworn to do justice before man and before God—and, if need were, to seal up even the fountains of mercy in their hearts—flowing, and easily set a-flowing, by such a spectacle as that bar presented—a man already seeming to belong unto the dead !

In about a quarter of an hour the Jury returned to the box—and the verdict, having been sealed with black wax, was handed up to the Judge, who read, " We unanimously find the prisoner Guilty." He then stood up to receive sentence of death. Not a dry eye was in the court during the Judge's solemn and affecting address to the criminal—except those of the Shadow on whom had been pronounced the doom. " Your body will be hung in chains on the moor—on a gibbet erected on the spot where you murdered the victim of your unhallowed lust, and there will your bones bleach in the sun, and rattle in the wind, after the insects and the birds of the air have devoured your flesh; and in all future times, the spot on which, God-forsaking and God-forsaken, you perpetrated that double crime, at which all humanity shudders, will be looked on from afar by the traveller passing through that lonesome wild, with a sacred horror!"—Here the voice of the Judge faltered, and he covered his face with his hands; but the prisoner stood unmoved in figure, and in face untroubled—and when all was closed, was removed from the bar, the same ghostlike and unearthly phantom, seemingly unconscious of what had passed, or even of his own existence.

Surely now he will suffer his old father to visit him in his cell! "Once more only—only once more let me see him before I die!" were his words to the clergyman of the parish, whose Manse he had so often visited, when a young and happy boy! That servant of Christ had not forsaken him, whom now all the world had forsaken. As free from sin himself as might be mortal and fallen man—mortal because fallen—he knew from Scripture and from nature, that in "the lowest deep there is still a lower deep" in wickedness, into which all of woman born may fall, unless held back by the arm of the Almighty Being, whom they must serve steadfastly in holiness and in truth. He knew, too, from the same source, that man cannot sin beyond the reach of God's mercy—if the worst of all imaginable sinners seek, in a Bible-breathed spirit at last, that mercy through the Atonement of the Redeemer. Daily—and nightly—he visited that cell; nor did he fear to touch the hand—now wasted to the bone—which, at the temptation of the Prince of the Air, who is mysteriously suffered to enter in at the gates of every human heart that is guarded not by the flaming sword of God's own Seraphim—lately drenched in the blood of the most innocent creature that ever looked on the day. Yet a sore trial it was to his Christianity to find the criminal so obdurate. He would make no confession! Yet said that it was fit—that it was far best—he should die!—that he deserved death! But ever when the deed without a name was alluded to, his tongue was tied—and once in the midst of an impassioned prayer, beseeching him to listen to conscience and confess—he that prayed shuddered to behold him frown, and to hear bursting out in terrible energy, "Cease—cease to torment me, or you will drive me to deny my God!"

No father came to visit him in his cell. On the day of trial he had been missing from Moorside, and was seen next morning—(where he had been all night never was known—though it was afterwards rumoured, that one like him had been seen sitting, as the gloaming darkened, on the very spot of the murder)—wandering about the hills, hither and thither, and round and round about, like a man stricken with blindness, and vainly seeking to find his home. When brought into the house, his senses were gone, and he had lost the power of speech. All he could do was to mutter some disjointed syllables, which he did continually, without one moment's cessation, one unintelligible and most rueful moan! The figure of his daughter seemed to cast no image on his eyes—blind and dumb he sat where he had been placed, perpetually wringing his hands, with his shaggy eyebrows drawn high up his forehead, and the fixed orbs—though stone-blind, at least to all real things—beneath them flashing fire. He had borne up bravely—almost to the last—but had some tongue syllabled his son's doom to him in the wilderness, and at that instant had insanity smitten his soul?

Such utter prostration of intellect had been expected by none; for the old man, up to the very night before the Trial, had expressed the most confident trust of his son's acquittal. Nothing had ever served to shake his conviction of his innocence—though he had always forborne speaking about the circumstances of the murder—and had communicated to nobody any of the grounds on which he more than hoped in a case so hopeless; and though a trouble in his eyes often gave the lie to his lips, when he used to say to the silent neighbours, "We shall soon see him back at Moorside." Had his belief in his Ludovic's innocence, and his trust in God that that innocence would be established and set free, been so sacred, that the blow, when it did come, had smitten him like a hammer, and felled him to the ground, from which he had risen with a brain rent and riven? In whatever way the shock had been given, it had been terrible; for old Gilbert Adamson was now a confirmed lunatic, and keepers were in Moorside—not keepers from a mad-house—for his daughter could not afford such tendance—but two of her brother's friends who sat up with him alternately, night and day, while the arms of the old man, in his distraction, had to be bound with cords. That dreadful moaning was at an end now; but the echoes of the hills responded to his yells and shrieks; and people were afraid to go near the house. It was proposed among the neighbours to take Alice and little Ann out of it; and an asylum for them was in the Mause; but Alice would not stir at all their entreaties; and as, in such a case, it would have been too shocking to tear her away by violence, she was suffered to remain with him who knew her not, but who often—it was said—stared distractedly upon her, as if she had been some fiend sent in upon his insanity from the place of punishment. Weeks passed on, and still she was there—hiding herself at times from those terrified eyes; and from her watching corner, waiting from morn till night, and from night till morn—for she never lay down to sleep, and had never undressed herself since that fatal sentence—for some moment of exhausted horror, when she might steal out, and carry some slight gleam of comfort, however evanescent, to the glimmer or the gloom in which the brain of her Father swam through a dream of blood. But there were no lucid intervals; and ever as she moved towards him, like a pitying angel, did he furiously rage against her, as if she had been a fiend. At last, she who, though yet so young, had lived to see the murdered corpse of her dearest friend—murdered by her own only brother, whom, in secret, that murdered maiden had most tenderly loved—that murderous brother loaded with prison-chains, and condemned to the gibbet for inextinguishable and unpardonable crimes—her father raving like a demon, self-murderous were his hands but free, nor visited by one glimpse of mercy!

Him who rules the skies—after having borne more than, as she meekly said, had ever poor girl borne, she took to her bed quite heart-broken, and, the night before the day of execution, died. As for poor little Ann, she had been wiled away some weeks before; and in the blessed thoughtlessness of childhood, was not without hours of happiness among her playmates on the braes!

The Morning of that Day arose, and the Moor was all blackened with people round the tall gibbet, that seemed to have grown, with its horrid arms, out of the ground, during the night. No sound of axes or of hammers had been heard clinking during the dark hours—nothing had been seen passing along the road—for the windows of all the houses from which any thing could have been seen, had been shut fast against all horrid sights—and the horses' hoofs and the wheels must have been muffled that had brought that hideous Framework to the Moor! But there it now stood—a dreadful Tree! The sun moved higher and higher up the sky, and all the eyes of that congregation were at once turned towards the east, for a dull sound, as of rumbling wheels and trampling feet, seemed shaking the Moor in that direction; and lo! surrounded with armed men on horseback, and environed with halberds, came on a cart, in which three persons seemed to be sitting, he in the middle all dressed in white—the death-clothes of the murderer, the un pitying shedder of most innocent blood.

There was no bell to toll there—but at the very moment he was ascending the scaffold, a black cloud knelled thunder, and many hundreds of people all at once fell down upon their knees. The man in white lifted up his eyes and said, "O Lord God of Heaven! and Thou his blessed Son, who died to save sinners! accept this sacrifice!"

Not one in all that immense crowd could have known that that white apparition was Ludovic Adamson. His hair that had been almost jet-black, was now white as his face—as his figure, dressed, as it seemed, for the grave. Are they going to execute the murderer in his shroud? Stone-blind, and stone-deaf, there he stood—yet had he, without help, walked up the steps of the scaffold. A hymn of several voices arose—the man of God close beside the criminal, with the Bible in his uplifted hands—but those bloodless lips had no motion—with him this world was not, though yet he was in life—in life and no more! And was this the man, who, a few months ago, flinging the fear of death from him, as a flash of sunshine flings aside the shades, had descended into that pit which an hour before had been bellying, as the foul vapours exploded like cannons, and brought up the bodies of them that had perished in the womb of the earth? Was this he who once leapt into the devouring fire, and re-appeared, after all had given over for lost the glorious boy, with an infant in his arms, while the flames seemed to eddy back, that they might scathe not the head of the deliverer, while a shower of blessings fell upon him as he laid it in its mother's bosom, and made the heart of the widow to sing for joy? It is he. And now the executioner pulls down the cord from the beam, and fastens it round the criminal's neck. His face is already covered, and that fatal handkerchief is in his hand. The whole crowd are now kneeling, and one multitudinous sob convulses the air;—when wild outcries, and shrieks, and yells, are at that moment heard from the distant gloom of the glen that opened up to Moorside, and three figures, one far in advance of the other two, come flying as on the wings of the wind, towards the gibbet. Hundreds started to their feet, and “’Tis the maniac—’tis the lunatic!” was the cry. Precipitating himself down a rocky hillside, that seemed hardly accessible but to the goats, the maniac, the lunatic, at a few desperate leaps and bounds, just as it was expected he would have been dashed in pieces, alighted unshaken upon the level greensward; and now, far ahead of his keepers, with incredible swiftness neared the scaffold—and, the dense crowd making a lane for him in their fear and astonishment, he flew up the ladder to the horrid platform, and, grasping his son in his arms, howled dreadfully over him; and then with a loud voice cried, “Saved—saved—saved!”

So sudden had been that wild rush, that all the officers of justice—the very executioner—stood aghast; and lo! the prisoner's neck is free from that accursed cord—his face is once more visible without that hideous shroud—and he sinks down senseless on the scaffold. “Seize him—seize him!” and he was seized—but no maniac—no lunatic was the father now—for during the night, and during the dawn, and during the morn, and on to midday—on to the Hour of ONE—when all rueful preparations were to be completed—had Providence been clearing and calming the tumult in that troubled brain, and as the cottage clock struck ONE, memory brightened at the chime into a perfect knowledge of the past, and prophetic imagination saw the future lowering upon the dismal present. All night long, with the cunning of a madman—for all night long he had still been mad—the miserable old man had been disengaging his hands from the manacles, and that done, springing like a wild beast from its cage, he flew out of the open door, nor could a horse's speed on that fearful road have overtaken him, before he reached the scaffold.

No need was there to hold the miserable man. He who had been so furious in his manacles at Moorside, seemed now to the people at a distance, calm as when he used to sit in the elder's seat beneath the pulpit in that small kirk. But they who were on or near the scaffold, saw something horrid in the fixedness of his countenance. “Let go your hold of me, ye fools,” he muttered to some of the mean wretches of the law, who still had him in their clutch—and tossing his hands on high, cried with a loud voice,—“Give ear, ye Heavens! and hear, O Earth! I am the Violator—I am the Murderer!”

The moor groaned as in earthquake—and then all that congregation bowed their heads with a rustling noise, like a wood smitten by the wind. Had they heard aright the unimaginable confession? His head had long been grey—he had reached the term allotted to man's mortal life here below—threescore and ten. Morning and evening, never had the Bible been out of his hands at the hour set apart for family worship. And who so eloquent as he in expounding its most dreadful myteries! The unregenerate heart of man, he had ever said—in scriptural phrase—was “desperately wicked.” Desperately wicked indeed! And now again he tossed his arms wrathfully—so the wild motion looked—in the wrathful skies. “I ravished—I murdered her—ye know it, ye evil spirits in the depths of hell!” Consternation now fell on the minds of all—and the truth was clear as light—and all eyes knew at once that now indeed they looked on the murderer. The dreadful delusion under which all their understandings had been brought by the power of circumstances, was by that voice destroyed—the obduracy of him who had been about to die, was now seen to have been the most heroic virtue—the self-sacrifice of a son to save a father from ignominy and death!

“O monster, beyond the reach of redemption! and the very day after the murder, while the corpse was lying in blood on the Moor, he was with us in the House of God! Tear him in pieces—read him limb from limb—tear him into a thousand pieces!”—“The Evil One had power given him to prevail against me, and I fell under the temptation. It was so written in the Book of Predestination, and the deed lies at the door of God!”—“Tear the blasphemer into pieces! Let the scaffold drink his blood!”—“So let it be, if it be so written, good people! Satan never left me since the murder till this day—he sat by my side in the kirk—when I was ploughing in the field—there—ever as I came back from the other end of the furrows—he stood on the head-rig—in the shape of a black shadow. But now I see him not—he has returned to his den in the pit. I cannot imagine what I have been doing, or what has been done to me, all the time between the day of trial and this of execution. Was I mad? No matter. But you shall not hang Ludovic—he, poor boy, is innocent;—here, look at him—here—I tell you again—is the Violator and the Murderer!”

But shall the men in authority dare to stay the execution at a maniac’s words? If they dare not—that multitude will, now all rising together like the waves of the sea. “Cut the cords asunder that bind our Ludovic’s arms”—a thousand voices cried—and the murderer, unclasping a knife, that, all unknown to his keepers, he had worn in his breast when a maniac, sheared them asunder as the sickle shears the corn. But his son stirred not—and on being lifted up by his father, gave not so much as a groan. His heart had burst—and he was dead! No one touched the grey-headed murderer, who knelt down—not to pray—but to look into his son’s eyes—and to examine his lips—and to feel his left breast—and to search out all the symptoms of a fainting-fit, or to assure himself,—and many a corpse had the plunderer handled on the field after hush of the noise of battle,—that this was death. He rose; and standing forward on the edge of the scaffold, said, with a voice that shook not, deep, strong, hollow, and hoarse—“Good people! I am likewise now the murderer of my daughter and of my son! and of myself!” Next moment, the knife was in his heart—and he fell down a corpse on the corpse of his Ludovic. All round the sultry horizon the black clouds had for hours been gathering—and now came the thunder and the lightning—and the storm. Again the whole multitude prostrated themselves on the moor—and the Pastor, bending over the bodies, said,

“THIS IS EXPIATION!”

LIFE OF RICHARD BENTLEY, D.D. BY J. H. MONK, D.D.

PART II.

THE age is past in which men rendered a cheerful justice to the labours of the classical scholar. Joseph Scaliger, Isaac Casaubon, and the monster of erudition, Claudius Salmasius, are supposed by multitudes of sciolists to have misdirected their powers. In that case, Richard Bentley must submit to the same award. Yet it would perhaps be no difficult achievement to establish a better apology for the classical student than is contemplated by those who give the tone to the modern fashion in education.

What it is proposed to substitute for classical erudition, we need not too rigorously examine. Some acquaintance with the showy parts of Experimental Philosophy and Chemistry—a little practical Mathematics—a slight popular survey of the facts of History and Geography—a sketch of empirical Political Economy—a little Law—a little Divinity—perhaps even a little Medicine and Ferriery; such are the elements of a fashionable education. All that is really respectable in a scheme of this complexion, the mathematics and the mechanical philosophy, judging by the evidence of the books which occasionally appear, should seem to be attained with any brilliant success only in that university (Cambridge) where these studies are pursued jointly with the study of classical literature. The notion of any hostility, therefore, between the philological researches of the Greek and Latin literator on the one hand, and the severe meditations on the other, of the geometrician and the inventive analyst—such a hostility as could make it necessary to weigh the one against the other—is, in practice, found to be imaginary. No comparative estimate, then, being called for, we may confine ourselves to a simpler and less invidious appreciation of classical erudition upon the footing of its absolute pretensions.

Perhaps a judicious pleading on this subject would pursue something of the following outline:

First, It is undeniable that the progress of sacred literature is dependent upon that of profane. The vast advances made in Biblical knowledge, and in other parts of divinity, since the era of the Reformation, are due, in a great proportion, to the general prosecution of classical learning. It is in vain to attempt a distinction between the useful parts of this learning and the ornamental: All are useful, all are necessary. The most showy and exquisite refinements in the doctrine of Greek metric metre, even where they do not directly avail us in expelling anomalies of syntax or of idiom from embarrassed passages, and thus harmonizing our knowledge of this wonderful language, yet offer a great indirect benefit: they exalt the standard of attainment, by increasing its difficulty and its compass; and a prize placed even at an elevation useless for itself, becomes serviceable as a guarantee that all lower heights must have been previously traversed.

Secondly, The general effect upon the character of young men from a classical education, is pretty much like that which is sought for in travelling; more unequivocally even than that, coming at the age which is best fitted for receiving deep impressions, it liberalizes the mind. This effect is derived in part from the ennobling tone of sentiment which presides throughout the great orators, historians, and littérateurs of antiquity; and in part it is derived from the vast difference in temper and spirit between the modern (or Christian) style of thinking, and that which prevailed under a Pagan religion, connected, in its brightest periods, with republican institutions. The mean impression from home-keeping, and the contracted views of a mere personal experience, are thus, as much as by any other conceivable means, broken and defeated. Edmund Burke has noticed the illiberal air which is communicated to the mind by an education exclusively scientific, even where it is more radical and profound than it is likely to be under those theories which reject classical erudition. The sentiments which distinguish a gentleman receive no aid from any attainments in science; but it is certain, that familiarity with the classics, and the noble direction which they are fitted to impress upon the thoughts and aspirations, do eminently fall in with the few other chivalrous sources of feeling that survive at this day. It is not improbable, also, that a reflection upon the "uselessness" of such studies, according to the estimate of coarse Utilitarians—that is, their inapplicability to any object of mercenary or mechanic science, co-operates with their more direct influences in elevating the taste. Thence, we may explain the reason of the universal hatred amongst plebeian and coarse-minded Jacobins to studies and institutions which point in this direction. They hate the classics for the same reason that they hate the manners of chivalry, or the characteristic distinctions of a gentleman.

Thirdly, A sentiment of just respect belongs to the classical scholar, if it were only for the numerical extent of the items which compose the great total of his knowledge. In separate importance, the acquisitions of the mathematician transcend his: each several proposition in that region of knowledge has its distinct value and dignity. But in the researches of the scholar, more truly than in any other whatsoever, the details are infinite. And for this infinity of acts, on the parts of the understanding and the memory, if otherwise even less important, he has a special claim upon our consideration.

Fourthly, The difficulty, as derived from peculiar idiom and construction, of mastering the two classical languages of antiquity, more especially the Greek, is in itself a test of very unusual talent. Modern languages are learned inevitably by simple efforts of memory. And, if the learner has the benefit of a rational plan of tuition, viz. the tuition of circumstances, which oblige him to speak the language, and to hear it spoken, for all purposes of daily life, there is perhaps no living idiom in Europe which would not be mastered in three months. Certainly, there is none which presupposes any peculiar talent, as a conditio sine qua non for its attainment.

Greek does; and we affirm peremptorily, that none but a man of singular talent can attain (what, after all, goes but a small way in the accomplishments of a scholar) the power of reading Greek fluently at sight. The difficulty lies in two points: First, in the peculiar perplexities of the Greek construction; and, secondly, in the continual inadequation (to use a logical term) of Greek and modern terms; a circumstance which makes literal translation impossible, and reduces the translator to a continued effort of compensation. Upon a proper occasion, it would be easy to illustrate this point. Meantime the fact must strike every body, be the explanation what it may, that very few persons ever do arrive at any tolerable skill in the Greek language. After seven years' application to it, most people are still alarmed at a sudden summons to translate a Greek quotation; it is even ill-bred to ask for such a thing; and we may appeal to the candour of those even who, upon a case of necessity, are able to "do the trick," whether, in reading a Greek book of history for their own private amusement, (Herodian for example,) they do not court the assistance of the Latin version at the side. Greek rarely becomes as familiar as Latin. And, as the modes of teaching them are pretty much the same, there is no way of explaining this but by supposing a difficulty sui generis in the Greek language, and a talent sui generis for contending with it.

Upon some such line of argument as we have here sketched—illustrating the claims of the classical student according to the several grounds now alleged, viz. the difficulty of his attainments in any exquisite form, their vast extent, their advantageous tendency for impressing an elevated tone upon the youthful mind; and, above all, their connexion with the maintenance of that "strong book-mindedness," and massy erudition, which are the buttresses of a reformed church, and which failing (if they ever should fail) will leave it open to thousands of factious schisms, and finally even to destructive heresies—possibly a fair pleader might make out a case, stronger than a modern education-monger could retort, for the scholar, technically so called, meaning the man who has surrendered his days and nights to Greek, Latin, and the Biblical languages.

Such a scholar, and modelled upon the most brilliant conception of his order, was Bentley. Wisely concentrating his exertions, under a conviction, that no length of life or reach of faculties was sufficient to exhaust that single department which he cultivated, he does not appear to have carried his studies, in any instance, beyond it. Whatsoever more he knew, he knew in a popular way; and doubtless for much of that knowledge he was indebted to conversation. Carried by his rank and appointments (and, from a very early age, by the favour of his patron, Bishop Stillingfleet) into the best society, with so much shrewd sense, and so powerful a memory, he could not but bear away with him a large body of that miscellaneous knowledge which floats upon the surface of social intercourse. He was deficient, therefore, in no information which naturally belongs to an English gentleman. But the whole of it, if we except, perhaps, that acquaintance with the English law, and the forms of its courts, which circumstances obliged him to cultivate, was obtained in his hours of convivial relaxation; and rarely indeed at the sacrifice of a single hour, which, in the distribution of his time, he had allotted to the one sole vocation of his life—the literature of classical antiquity. How much he accomplished in that field, will be best learned from a catalogue raisonné of his works, (including his contributions to the works of others,) and from a compressed abstract of that principal work to which he is indebted for much of the lustre which still settles upon his memory.

His coup d'essai in literature, as we have already mentioned, was his appendix to the Chronicle of Malelas. It was written in the winter of 1690; but not published until June 1691. Bentley was at this time twenty-nine years old, and could not therefore benefit by any consideration of his age. But he needed no indulgences. His epistle travels over a prodigious extent of ground, and announces everywhere a dignified self-respect, combined with respect for others. In all that relates to the Greek dramatic poets, Euripides in particular, and in the final disquisition (which we have already analysed) on the laws which govern the Latinization of Grecian proper names, the appendix to Malelas is still worthy of most attentive study.

He soon after began to prepare editions of Philostratus, of Hesychius, and the Latin poet Manilius. From these labours he was drawn off, in 1692, by his first appointment to preach the Boyle Lecture. Those sermons are published. They were serviceable to his reputation at that time, and are still worthy of their place as the inaugural dissertations in that distinguished series of English divinity. It would be idle to describe them as in any eminent sense philosophical; they are not so; but they present as able a refutation of the infidel notions then prevalent,* and (in the two latter lectures) as popular an application to the same purpose of the recent Newtonian discoveries, as the times demanded, or a miscellaneous audience permitted.

In 1694, Bentley was again appointed to preach the Boyle Lecture:

* Misled by Dr Monk, (who, though citing the passage from Bentley's Letters about the Hobbists, yet, in the preceding page, speaks of "the doctrines of Spinoza," as having contributed to taint the principles of many in the higher classes,) we had charged Bentley with the common error of his order, in supposing a book so rare as the B. D. S. Opera Posthuma to have been, by possibility, an influential one in England. But we now find, on consulting Dr Burney's Collection of Bentley's Letters, (p. 146 of the Leipsic edition, 1825,) that Bentley expressly avowed our own view of the case. His words to Dr Bernard are as follows:—"But are the Atheists of your mind, that they have no books written for them? Not one of them but believes Tom Hobbes to be a rank one; and that his corporeal God is a mere sham to get his book printed. I have said something to this in my first sermon, and I know it to be true, by the conversation I have had with them. There may be some Spinozists, or immaterial Fatalists, beyond seas; but not one English infidel in a hundred is other than a Hobbist."

but his sermons on that occasion have not been printed. On various pleas he delayed preparing them for the press so long, that before he found himself at leisure for that task, the solicitations of his friends had languished, and his own interest in the work had probably died away. Fifty-two years ago, when the life of Bentley was published in the Biographia Britannica, they were still in existence; but his present biographer has not been able to ascertain their subsequent fate.

By this time the Philostratus was ready for the press, but an accident put an end to that undertaking. The high duties upon paper, and other expenses of printing in England, had determined Bentley to bring out his edition at Leipsic; and accordingly one sheet was printed in that university. But Bentley, who had the eye of an amateur for masterly printing, and the other luxuries of the English and Dutch press, was so much disgusted with the coarseness of this German specimen, that he peremptorily put an end to the work, and transferred his own collations of two Oxford MSS. to Olearius of Leipsic. In the edition published by this person in 1709, there will be found so much of Bentley's notes as were contained in the specimen sheet; these, however, extend no farther than page 11; and what is become of the rest, a matter of some interest to ourselves, we are unable to learn.

In July 1696, on taking his doctor's degree, Bentley maintained three separate theses: one on the Rationality of the Mosaic Cosmogony and Deluge; a second on the Divine Origin of the Christian Miracles; and a third on the Relation between the Christian and Platonic Trinities. These themes (at any rate the last) appear to us somewhat above the reach of Bentley's philosophy, or indeed of any English philosophy, since the days of Henry More, Cudworth, and Stillington. The last of these persons, however, his own friend and patron, had probably furnished Bentley with directions and materials for treating the question. This dissertation we should have delighted to read; but it seems to have vanished as completely as the public breakfast which accompanied it. On the Sunday following, he preached before the University what is called the Commencement Sermon (of Revelation and the Messiah.) Many years afterwards, this was added as an appropriate sequel to an edition of his Boyle Lectures, in 1692. It is a powerful and learned defence of the Christian faith, and of the claims of its founder to the character of the Jewish Messiah.

Meantime, his professional exertions had not abated his zeal for literature. In the course of this year, he finished his notes and emendations to the text of Callimachus. These, together with a complete digest of that poet's fragments, admirably corrected, he transmitted to his learned friend Grævius of Utrecht, for the improvement of a sort of Variorum Callimachus, which he was then carrying through the press. This had been originally projected, and some part already printed, by a son of Grævius, who died prematurely. In the very first letter of Grævius, September 17, 1692,* thus much had been explained to Bentley,—and that amongst the ornaments of the edition would be a copious commentary of Ezechiel Spanheim, a distinguished Prussian, envoy at one time to England from the court of Berlin, and next after Bentley, perhaps, the best Grecian of the age. Drest in this pomp of learned apparel, the muse of Callimachus came forth with unexpected effect: pars minima est ipsa puella sui; and Bentley was perhaps sincere in assuring Grævius (15th February, 1698) that, according to the judgment of one learned friend, no writer of antiquity had been so richly endowed with editorial services.

* Of all biographers, Dr Monk is the most perversely obscure in fixing dates. As one instance, at p. 21, we defy any critic to explain the reference of the words—"This happened in the latter part of 1690." What happened? The words immediately preceding are, "that Bentley should publish his remarks on Maleias." Naturally, therefore, every reader would understand the reference as pointing to the actual publication of those remarks; but in the middle of the next page, he finds that this did not occur until June 1691. Here, again, with respect to Callimachus, the wit of man could not make out, from the sentence which opens chapter V., whether the publication took place in the August of 1696 or of 1697. But by a letter of Grævius, dated on the 6th of September, 1697, and stating that he had three weeks before dispatched six copies of the Callimachus as presents to Bentley, we ascertain that 1697 was the true date.

In May 1697 was published the original Dissertation on Phalaris, as a supplement to the second edition of Wotton's Essay on Ancient and Modern Learning. By way of suitable accompaniments, were added shorter dissertations on the spurious Letters of Themistocles, Socrates, and Euripides; and finally, on the Fables, and the personal deformity, imputed to Æsop. At the beginning of 1699 appeared the second (or complete) dissertation on Phalaris, from which (on account of the great expansion given to the principal theme) all supplementary parts were now unavoidably retrenched.

Soon after this period, the manifold business which occupied Bentley, upon his promotion to the headship of Trinity College, upon his marriage, and various University appointments, appears to have interrupted his literary pursuits; and perhaps he surrendered himself the more tractably to these avocations from the ordinary tenor of his life, in consideration of the excessive price of English paper, which, in 1698, he had assigned to Grævius* as a satisfactory motive for renouncing the press. However, when he did not work himself, he was always ready to assist those who did; and in 1701, we find him applying his whole academic influence to the promotion of the Prussian, Kuster's, edition of Suidas, which he enriched partly from the MSS. of the deceased Bishop Pearson, partly from his own stores.

In the summer of the year 1702, Bentley first formed the design of editing a body of classics for the use of the students in his own college; and a Horace, which occupied him at intervals for the next ten years, was selected as the leader of the series.

In 1708, by way of assisting his old friend, Ludolf Kuster, in a hasty edition of Aristophanes, he addressed to him three Critical Epistles on the Plutus and the Clouds. These were dislocated and mangled by Kuster, under the pressure of haste, and the unfortunate arrangements of the printer. Two, however, of the three have been preserved and published, exactly as Bentley wrote them; and in this instance, we are happy to agree with Dr Monk that these letters (and, we may add, the general tone, and much of the peculiar merit which belongs to the Phalaris Dissertation) point out Aristophanes, beyond all other writers of antiquity, as that one who would have furnished the fullest arena for Bentley's various and characteristic attainments. About the same time, Bentley had the honour of giving a right direction to the studies of Tiberius Hemsterhuis, the founder of a distinguished school of continental scholars, whose metrical deficiencies had been made known by his recent edition of Julius Pollux. The two letters of Bentley have since been published by Ruhken.

In the year 1709, he assisted Davies in his edition of the Tusculan Questions of Cicero, by a large body of admirable emendations; and in the same year, he communicated to Needham, who was then editing Hierocles, a collection of conjectures on the text of that author, which, though not equally sound, have the customary Bentleian merit of extraordinary ingenuity.

It is one illustration of the universal favour which Bentley extended to the interests of knowledge, even in those departments which promised no glory to himself, that he had long laboured to obtain a second and improved edition of Sir Isaac Newton's Principia. Sir Isaac, however, was, at this time, engrossed by his employments at the Mint; but at length, in this year, 1709, Bentley had the satisfaction of engaging Professor

* ——— “de libris edendis consilium capere stultum esset, ob immanem in his reglōnibus charta charitatem.”—Feb. 15, 1698.

Cotes in that task, and of opening a long correspondence* between the Professor and Sir Isaac, which arranged the whole alterations and additions.

In the spring of 1710 was published one of Bentley's occasional works, which caused at that time, and yet continues to cause, some speculation. An unexplained mystery hung even then over the mode of publication; and a mystery still hangs over its motive. In the latter end of 1709, the well-known Clericus, or Le Clerc, whose general attainments Dr Monk rates far too highly, published an edition of the Fragmenta of Menander and Philemon, with a brutish ignorance of Greek. Simple ignorance, however, and presumption, cannot be supposed sufficient to have provoked Bentley, who uniformly left such exposures to the inevitable hand of time. Yet so it was, that, in December of the same year, Bentley sat down and wrote extemporal emendations on 323 passages in the Fragmenta, with a running commentary of unsparing severity upon the enormous blunders of Le Clerc. This little work, by a circuitous channel, in the spring of 1710, he conveyed into the hands of Peter Burman, the bitterest enemy of Le Clerc. It may readily be conceived that Burman, thirsty as he was at that particular moment for vengeance, received with a frenzy of joy these thunderbolts from the armoury of Jove. He published the work immediately, under the title of Emendationes in Menandri et Philemonis Reliquias, auctore Phileleuthero Lipsiensi, and with an insulting preface of his own. Before the press had completed its work, Le Clerc heard of the impending castigation. The author's name also was easily suspected in the small list of Greek scholars. Le Clerc, who conducted a severe review, wrote in his usual spirit of dictatorial insolence to Bentley, calling upon him to disavow so shocking an attack. Bentley replied by calmly pointing out to him his presumption as a Grecian editor, and his arrogant folly as a bully. Meantime the book was published, and read with so much avidity, (although in a learned language,) that in three weeks the entire impression was exhausted. It was attacked by the old hornet James Gronovius, who hated Le Clerc and Bentley with an equal hatred, and also by the scoundrel De Pauw; but, said Bentley, with the most happy application of a line from Phædrus, "nondum eorum ictus tanti facio, ut iterum a me vapulent":

Multo majoris colaphi necum veneunt."

On the 8th December, 1711, Bentley put the finishing hand to his edition of Horace—the most instructive, perhaps, in its notes, of all contributions whatsoever to Latin literature. The attacks which it provoked were past counting; the applauses were no less vehement from every part of Europe; and, amongst others, from an old enemy—Atterbury, the ring-leader in the Phalaris controversy. A second and improved impression of the work was immediately called for, and issued from the press of Amsterdam.

In 1713, Bentley replied, under his former signature of Phileleutherus Lipsiensis, to Anthony Collins's "Discourse of Freethinking." His triumph, in this instance, was owing less to his own strength than to the weakness of his antagonist. Collins had some philosophical acuteness, as he shewed elsewhere; but of learning, properly so called, he had none. The most useful service which Bentley rendered to the public on this occasion, was the just colouring which he gave to an argument for impeaching the credit of the New Testament, recently impressed upon the timid and the scrupulous by the notoriety of Dr Mill's labours upon its text. Many Christians had been scandalized and alarmed by a body of thirty thousand various readings in a text issuing from inspiration. But Bentley re-assured their trembling faith, by shewing that an immense majority of these variations scarcely affected the sense at all; and, of those which did, few, indeed, would be found to disturb any cardinal doctrine, which, after all, was otherwise secured by unsuspected passages. It is an interesting reflection to us at this day, that the Collins here refuted was that friend of Locke, as appears from his letters, originally published by Des Maizeaux, upon whom he lavished every proof of excessive regard in the last moments of his life. He introduced him even with the most flattering recommendations to his hostess, Lady Masham, the daughter of that Cudworth, who had spent his life in the refutation of philosophic scepticism !*

In 1715, on occasion of the first Pretender's expedition, Bentley preached before the University a sermon on Popery, which, though merely occasional, ranks amongst the most powerful expositions of the corruptions introduced into pure Christianity by that stupendous superstition. The force of its natural and manly rhetoric may be conceived from this fact, that Sterne, the wholesale plagiarist, has borrowed from it a long passage for the sermon which he puts into the mouth of Corporal Trim, who is made to express its terrible energy by saying, that "he would not read another line of it for all the world."

On the 15th of April, 1716, Bentley, in a letter to Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury, brought forward a scheme, which of itself should have immortalized him, for retrieving the original text of the New Testament, exactly as it was at the time of the Council of Nice, without the difference of "twenty words," or "even twenty particles." Compressed within a few words, his plan was this :—Mill, and other collectors of various readings, had taken notice only of absolute differences in the words—never of mere variations in their order and arrangement; these they conceived to be purely accidental. Bentley thought otherwise; for he had noticed, that, wherever he could obtain the genuine reading of the old authorized Latin version, technically called the Vulgate, the order of the words exactly corresponded to the order of the original Greek. This pointed to something more than accident. A sentence of St Jerome ripened this suspicion into a certainty. Hence it occurred to him, that, if by any means he could retrieve the true text of the Latin Vulgate, as it was originally reformed and settled by St Jerome, he would at once obtain a guide for selecting, amongst the crowd of variations in the present Greek text, that one which St Jerome had authenticated as the reading authorized long before his day. Such a restoration of the Vulgate, Bentley believed to be possible by means of MSS., of which the youngest should reach an age of 900 years. How far this principle of restoration could have been practically carried through, is a separate question; but, for the principle itself, we take upon ourselves to say, that a finer thought does not occur in the records of inventive criticism. It is not a single act of conjectural sagacity, but a consequential train of such acts.

In the same year, Bentley wrote a letter to Biel upon the Scriptural glosses in our present copies of Hesychius, which he considered interpolations from a later hand. This letter, which evidences the same critical acquaintance with Hesychius, which, in the aids given to his friend Kuster, he had already manifested with Suidas, has been published by Alberti, in the Prolegomena to his edition of that lexicographer.

In this year also, a plan was agitated (according to one tradition, by the two Chief Justices, Parker and King) for an edition of the Classics, in usum Principis Frederici. Such a project could not fail to suggest a competition with the famous French series, in usum Delphini. Difficulty there was none in making the English one far more learned; and, with that view, it was designed that Bentley should preside over the execution. For this service, he is said to have demanded L.1000 per annum for life; on the other hand, Lord

* Collins wanted something more than plety; he was not even an honest man; for he reprinted his work in Holland, purified from the gross cases of ignorance exposed by Bentley; and then circulating this improved edition amongst his friends in England, which he had taken care to mask by a lying title-page, he persuaded them that the passages in question were mere forgeries of Bentley's.

Townshend, by the same account, would give no more than L.500. Some misunderstanding arose, and, finally, the whole plan was dismissed by the court, in company with the liberal minister who had entertained it. Perhaps this is not to be regretted; for a corpus of editions, as much more learned than the Delphin, as Bentley was more learned than Huet, would stand a good chance of being almost useless to boys.

In 1717, Bentley preached before the King. This sermon was published; and is described by Dr Monk as being, perhaps, not worse calculated to win the favourable opinion of general readers, than any thing else which its author has left. For ourselves, we have not been so fortunate as to meet with it.

Not long after, in the same year, Bentley was elected the Regius Professor of Divinity in Cambridge. On the 1st of May, the day preceding his election, he delivered his probationary lecture. The subject, even more than the occasion, made this so interesting, that we do not hear, without indignation, of the uncertainty which all parties profess with regard to the fate of a copy of it, known to have been in existence 40 years ago. The lecture treated the famous question of the disputed passage—On the Three Heavenly Witnesses, (1 Epist. of St John, v. 7.) Porson, to whom such a lecture must have been peculiarly interesting, had read it; so had Dr Vincent, the late Dean of Westminster. Could neither of these gentlemen have copied it? Or, if that were forbidden, could they not have mastered the outline of the arguments?—Meantime, as to the result, every body is agreed that Bentley peremptorily rejected the verse. Yet, in a correspondence, at the beginning of this very year, with some stranger, which has been since published, Bentley is less positive on that matter, and avows his determination to treat the case, not as a question for critical choice and sagacity, but simply as a question of fact—to be decided, whenever he came to that part of his new edition of the Greek Testament, by the balance of readings, as he should happen to find them on this side or that in the best MSS. "What will be the event," he says,

"I myself know not yet; having not used all the old copies I have information of." Within the four months' interval between this correspondence and his probationary lecture, it is improbable that Bentley should have made any such progress in his Greek Testament, as could materially affect his view of this question; and we infer from that consideration, that, in his lecture, he must have treated it purely as a question for sagacity and tentative conjecture, not for positive evidence. This latter mode of deciding the case, by which he promised his correspondent that he would finally abide, remains therefore unaffected by the award of his lecture. We agree with Dr Middleton, the first Bishop of Calcutta, that the controversy is not yet exhausted. In the following month, (June 1717,) he delivered his inaugural oration, which lasted for two hours and a half, on entering upon the duties of his chair. This, which unfortunately has not been preserved, except in the slight and sneering sketch of an enemy, appears to have been chiefly an apologetic account of his whole literary career; doubtless for the purpose of disarming the general presumption, that a course of study, which had been so peculiarly directed to what, in the old university phrase, are called the humanities of literature, could not but have impressed a bias upon his enquiries unfavourable to the austerer researches of divinity. He reminded his audience, however, that he had been appointed on two separate occasions a public champion of Christianity; and that, in another instance, when he had stepped forward as a volunteer in the same august service, he had earned the solemn thanks of the university.

In 1718, Bentley resumed, but suddenly and finally discontinued, the third part of his answer to Collins. He had agreed to pursue it, at the particular request of the Princess of Wales; and two half-sheets were actually printed; but, conceiving himself ill-treated by the court, he protested that he would do nothing to gratify those who behaved no better than his declared enemies.

Meantime he had been prosecuting his great scheme for the restoration of the Nicene text of the New Testament, according to the opportunities of leisure which his public duties allowed him, with his usual demoniac energy, and with a generous disregard of expense. Through different agents, he had procured collations of MSS. all over Europe; and in particular, had maintained a correspondence with the Benedictines of St Maur, one extract from which has been published by Sabatier, in his Bibliorum Sacrorum Versiones Antiquæ. By the autumn of 1720, his work was so far advanced, that, in October, he issued a formal prospectus, stating its plan, (as originally sketched, in the spring of 1716, to the Archbishop of Canterbury,) its form and price, and the literary aids which he counted upon. The 22d chapter of the Revelations accompanied these proposals, as a specimen—not of the paper or printing, (which were to be the best that Europe afforded,)—but of the editorial management. And with that just appreciation of his own merits which the honest frankness of Bentley would seldom allow him to suppress, he solemnly consecrated the work “as a κατάβλητον, a κατάβλητον ἡ δὲ ἀντιγραφή, a charter, a Magna Charta, to the whole Christian Church; to last when all the ancient MSS. may be lost and extinguished.” Conyers Middleton, incapable of understanding this grand burst of enthusiasm, immediately wrote a pamphlet to disparage the project, which he stigmatized (in allusion to the South-Sea schemes, recently exposed) as Bentley’s Bubble. One instance will explain the character of his malice: He made it a theme for scurrilous insinuations against Bentley, that he published by subscription. Now, in any age, an expensive undertaking, which presupposes a vast outlay for the collation* (or occasionally the purchase) of MSS., and rare editions, is a privileged case, as respects subscriptions; but in that age every body published by subscription. Pope did so, and in that way made his fortune by the Iliad. And, what marks the climax in Middleton’s baseness, he himself published his knavish

Life of Cicero, in the most deliberate manner, upon the ordinary terms of a subscription. Early in January 1721, appeared a caustic reply to Middleton’s pamphlet, which, upon internal evidence, is, and was, ascribed to Bentley. In about three months, Middleton retorted in a pamphlet four times as long as his first, and openly avowing himself by name as the author. These pamphlets we have read; for they are printed in a quarto republication of Middleton’s Miscellanies. And we are bold to say, in opposition to Dr Monk, that they offer no shadow of sound or scholarlike objection to Bentley’s Programmæ. That was written in one evening by candlelight. Why not? It fell into no real error by its precipitancy. Cavils are the best of Middleton’s argument; malice his best inspiration; and, as to the beautiful style, which (according to the old catechism of Blair, &c.) Dr Monk attributes to Middleton, we presume that many, of equal merit, are sold daily at 6d. a-lb. to trunk-makers and pastry-cooks.

It was the fate of Dr Bentley, that every work, executed or projected by him, should be assailed. Accordingly, on this occasion, concurrently with the pamphlets of Middleton, appeared many others, with or without names, English and Latin, virulent or gentle. To Middleton, however, has always been imputed the honour of having crushed the project; how erroneously, we now first learn from Dr Monk. Bentley could not be disturbed by what he had not seen; now he declared to Bishop Atterbury, that he “scorned to read the rascal’s book;” and there is full proof, that, for eight years and upwards after these attacks, he procured collations as zealously as ever. The subscriptions again, which are stated to have been not less than two thousand guineas, shew that purchasers were undeterred by the clamours of malice. However, the fact is, that the work did at length languish, for what reason is still doubtful. Wetstein, in his Prolegomena, says, that the abandonment of the work rose out of Bentley's disgust at the meanness of the Treasury in refusing to remit the duty upon the paper for this national undertaking. The facts are truly stated; but we have proof that the effect was insufficient to retard his labour "even for a day." The best guess we can offer to account for the final wreck of so much labour and expense, is, that being continually withdrawn from Bentley's attention, by the perplexities of his multiplied lawsuits, until the shades of old age had overtaken him, the work gradually ceased to occupy his thoughts, or to interest his ambition.

* Bentley had paid Wetstein L.50 for the collation of a single Palimpsest; which sum, in relation to the vast extent of the MS., seems to us, with Dr Monk’s leave, a trifle; though, in relation to Bentley’s purse, and the many demands upon it of the same nature, and his prospects of remuneration, it might be a large one.

During the long vacation of 1722, Bentley read a copy of Nicander's Theriaca, put into his hands by Dr Mead, and wrote his corrections on the margin. These have since been published by Dr Monk, in the Cambridge Museum Criticum.

In 1723, the edition of the Tusculan Questions, by Davies, to which Bentley had communicated its original value, was reprinted. On this occasion, he again enriched it with an ample dowery of his own conjectural emendations. These it was his intention to support by notes. Unfortunately, a pressure of business had pre-occupied his attention at the critical moment; the press could not wait; and the book was launched, leaving the best part of its freight behind; and that part, unfortunately, without which the rest was of little value.

In 1724, Dr Hare, Dean of Worcester, originally a confidential friend of Bentley's, who had on three several occasions injured him by his indiscretion or his meanness, consummated his offences by an act of perfidious dishonesty: he published an edition of Terence, in which every thing meritorious was borrowed, without acknowledgment, from the colloquial instructions of Bentley, imperfectly apprehended, and clumsily explained. In revenge for this treachery, Bentley carried rapidly through the press a Terence of his own; and by way of anticipating Hare, who had announced a Phædrus, he united an edition of that author (connected, as usual, with P. Syrus) in the same volume. This was published at the beginning of 1726. The Phædrus was a precipitate, in fact an extempore, performance; but the Terence is, in our opinion, of all Bentley's editions, the most brilliantly finished. With relation to the critic, undoubtedly his Horace is by much the most elaborately learned; but with relation to the interests of the author, his Terence is the most complete.

In 1731 occurred an incident in the literary life of Bentley, upon which no rational judgment has ever yet been pronounced. At the latter end of that year, he undertook his edition of the Paradise Lost; it was carried on with his usual haste, and was published in January 1732. He was now seventy years old, and his age, combined with the apparent extravagance of some of his corrections, might seem, at first, to countenance Dr Monk's insinuation of dotage.* But the case is totally misconceived. His edition of Milton had the same merits as his other editions; peculiar defects it had, indeed, from which his editions of Latin classics were generally free; these, however, were due to no decays in himself, but to original differences in the English classic from any which he could have met with in Pagan literature. The romantic, or Christian, poetry, was alien to Bentley's taste; he had no more sense or organs of perception for this grander and more imaginative order of poetry, than a hedgehog for the music of Mozart. Consequently, whatsoever was peculiarly characteristic in it, seemed to him a monstrous abortion; and had it been possible that passages in the same impassioned key should occur in the austere and naked works of the Roman or Grecian muse, he would doubtless have proscribed

* Dr Monk says, truly enough, that Bentley's corrections would often "lop off the most beautiful parts of the poem." But we are petrified on finding the first instance which he gives—Bentley's very reasonable censure of a well-known bull which all the world has laughed at:

"Adam, the goodliest man of men since born

them as interpolations of monks, copyists, or scholiasts, with the same desperate hook which operated so summarily on the text of Paradise Lost. With these infirmities, and this constitutional defect of poetic sensibility, the single blunder which he committed, was in undertaking such a province. The management of it did him honour; for he complied honestly with the constitution of his mind, and was right in the sense of taking a true view, but from a false station. Whenever a wise man plays the fool, we may suspect that a woman is at the bottom; and for this blunder of Bentley's, we are to thank Queen Caroline, who had a curiosity to see the English Hercules at work upon some task within her own range of sympathy; and accordingly, with the same womanish folly which in Queen Elizabeth imposed upon Shakspeare the grotesque labour of exhibiting Falstaff in love, she laid her commands upon Bentley for a kind of service which obliged him too frequently to abjure all his characteristic powers and accomplishments. That a suspicion at times crossed his own mind, (his nephew's it certainly did,) that for her Majesty's amusement he was making himself a stupendous jackass, is very probable from his significant excuse at the end—"non injussa cecini." Meantime we agree altogether with Dr Monk, that to any moral blame in this affair, on account of his fiction of an editorial man of straw, Bentley is not liable, let Dr Johnson say what he will. It was a fiction of modesty at once and of prudence, which saved him from the necessity of applying his unmeasured abuse immediately to Milton. This middleman was literally a mediator between Milton and the Bentleian wrath of damnation, which is already too offensive even as applied to a shadow.

This foolery over, Bentley recoiled with the spring of a Roman catapult to his natural pursuits. In 1732, he undertook an edition of Homer, chiefly with a view to the restoration of the digamma to its place and functions in the metre. This design he had first seriously adopted in 1726; and now, upon the instigation of Lord Carteret, he noted and corrected the entire Iliad and Odyssey, rejecting those lines which would not bend to his hypothesis. The Homer was never published; but the MS., having been bequeathed in 1786 to Trinity College by Dr R. Bentley, the nephew, was afterwards liberally transmitted to Göttingen, for the use of Heyne, who, in his own edition of Homer, acknowledged the profoundest obligations to it, and made the world circumstantially acquainted with its merits.

The Homer must be considered as virtually the final labour of Bentley. For his Manilius, which he published in 1739, when he was in his 78th year, had been prepared for the press forty-five years before. The notes on this singular poem, which has always been as interesting to us as it was to Bentley and to Joseph Scaliger, have the usual merits and the usual faults of Bentley's notes—being all ingenious, sometimes very learned, defences of innovations on the received text, bold, original, or absolutely licentious, as may happen. In Horace or Lucan we seek for no more—but we confess, that in a poem like the Astronomicum, crowded with triple difficulties—of science in the first place; secondly, of science disfigured by the perplexed hypothesis of the old astronomy; and thirdly, of all this warped from its natural expression by the necessities of the metre and the ornaments of a poetic treatment, we read Bentley's philological notes with singular disadvantage after the philosophic commentaries of Joseph Scaliger. The astronomy has never been cleared up entirely, Scaliger having in this part committed singular errors. But much of the poem, which assigns the temperament, the bias of character, and habits of men born under all the leading aspects of the stars, is less in need of elucidation, unless when it is particularly corrupt; and in such places Bentley is of great service.

Fourteen years after the death of Bentley, Horace Walpole published at his private press a Lucan, illustrated by the notes of Bentley, combined with those of Grotius. This poet was within Bentley's range of sympathy: and, as plausible conjectures for the emendation of the text, we know of nothing comparable to his suggestions.

Such is the long list of Bentley's literary labours, without including his speculations upon four separate Greek inscriptions, and perhaps other occasional assistances, as yet imperfectly ascertained, to his friends, which his generosity made him at all times no less ready to grant, than the careless prodigality of inexhaustible wealth made him negligent to resume. We have also purposely excluded from our list the fugitive pamphlets of business, or of personal defence, by which Bentley met his ungenerous assailants; a part of his works which, as a good man, though with human infirmities, he would doubtless wish to be now cancelled or forgotten, under that comprehensive act of Christian forgiveness which there can be no doubt, that, in his latter days, he extended even to those unjust enmities which provoked them. Confining ourselves to his purely literary works, and considering the great care and attention which belong almost to each separate sentence in works of that class, we may perhaps say that, virtually, no man has written so much.

By way of bringing his characteristic merits within the horizon of the least learned readers, we shall now lay before them a close analysis of his ablest and most famous performance, the Phalaris; and it happens, favourably for our purpose, though singularly, that the most learned of Bentley's works is also that which is best fitted for popular admiration.

Phalaris had happened to say, that some worthy people in Sicily had been kind enough to promise him a loan; not, however, on any pastoral considerations, such as might seem agreeable to that age and country, but on the bare Judæan terms of so much per shent (δανίσιν). Here the forger of the Letters felt that it was indispensable to assign real names. Bills upon Simonides, endorsed by Pythagoras, would have been likely to fall to a discount in critical estimation, and to have damaged the credit of the letters. The contractors for his loan, therefore, are not humble individuals, but cities—Phintia, to wit, and Hybla. Well, and what of them? Were their acceptances likely to be protested for non-payment? By no means; both were probably solvent; and, at all events, their existence, which is something, is guaranteed by Ptolemy, by Antoninus, and by Pliny. "But," says Bentley, (oh that ominous but!) "it is ill luck for this forger of letters, that a fragment of Diodorus was preserved, to be a witness against him." From this little fragment, now raised up from the dust of ages, Bentley deduces a summary conviction of the forgery. This city of Phintia, in fact, had its name from the author of its existence, one Phintias; he was a petty prince, who flourished about the time of Pyrrhus the Epirot, and built the city in question, during the one hundred and twenty-fifth Olympiad;* that is to say, abiding by the chronology most favourable to the authenticity of the Letters, above 270 years after Phalaris. "A pretty slip," says Bentley—"A pretty slip this of our Sophist, to introduce his tyrant borrowing money of a city almost three hundred years before it was named or built!"

Such is the starting argument of Bentley. It will be admitted to be a knock-down blow; and though only one, and applied to a single letter of the whole series, a candid looker-on will own, that it is such a one as settles the business; and no prudent champion, however game, would have chosen to offer himself to the scratch for a second round. However, ἡ βασις τοῦ Βαλίας thought otherwise.

The next argument is of the same description, being a second case of

* Bentley, upon grounds which are satisfactory, and most elaborately developed, fixes the flourishing of Phalaris to the 57th Olympiad. In this the reader may happen to know that he differed with that learned chronologist, but most confused writer, H. Dodwell. It is important, however, to remark, that, logically speaking, it would be a circle (or petitio principii) to press Bentley with Dodwell's authority in this particular instance, inasmuch as Dodwell had, in fixing the era of Phalaris, mainly relied upon the very Letters in dispute; at that time unsuspected, or nearly so. That fact, important to Bentley, as disarming the chronological authority of Dodwell, is no less important, as demonstrating that the question of Phalaris is not one of mere taste, but operatively connected with historical results.

anachronism; but it merits a separate statement. In the instance of Phintia the proof was direct, and liable to no demur; but here the anachronism is made out circumstantially: Hence it is less readily apprehended; and the Boyle party, in their anger or their haste, did in fact misapprehend it; and upon their own blunder they built a charge against Bentley of vicious reasoning, which gave him an opening (not likely to be missed by him) for inflicting two courses of the knout instead of one. The case is this: Stesichorus, the lyric poet, had incurred the displeasure of Phalaris, not for writing verses against him, but for overt acts of war; the poet had been levying money and troops, and, in fact, making hostile demonstrations at two separate places—Aluntium and Alæsa. Accordingly, Letter 92 takes him to task, and insinuates an ugly consequence; viz. the chance of being “snapt” (so Bentley calls it) by the bull before he got safe home to Himera. The objection raised upon this passage regards Alæsa: Did that town exist so early as the days of Phalaris? No, says Bentley, nor for 140 years after Phalaris—having been founded by Archonides in the second year of the 94th Olympiad, consequently 140 years after the death of Phalaris; and then, upon a testimony which cannot be resisted by a Boyle man, viz. the testimony of these very Letters, 152 at the very least, after this particular letter. But might there not be other cities, earlier than this, which bore the same name? There might—in fact there were. How, then, shall it be known whether that particular Alæsa, which would involve the anachronism, viz. the Alæsa founded by Archonides, is the Alæsa of the Letter-writer? As the argument by which Bentley replies to this question has been so much misconceived, and is in fact not very clearly stated in either dissertation, we shall throw it into a formal syllogism.

Major Proposition.—The Alæsa of the Pseudo-Phalaris and Stesichorus is the maritime Alæsa.

Minor Proposition.—The maritime Alæsa is the Alæsa founded by Archonides.

Ergo. The Alæsa of Archonides (viz. an Alæsa of nearly two centuries later than the era of Phalaris) is the Alæsa of the Pseudo-Phalaris.

Now comes a famous argument, in which Bentley makes play beautifully. Phalaris had been ill, and, wishing to reward his Greek physician in a manner suitable to a prince, amongst other presents he sends the doctor πρωτη των θερικελσιων ζεύγη δέκα, i. e. ten couple, or pair, of Thericlean cups. What manner of things were these? “They were,” says Bentley, “large drinking-cups, of a peculiar shape, so called from the first contriver of them, one Thericles, a Corinthian potter.” Originally, therefore, as to the material, they must have been porcelain—or, however, earthen-ware of some quality or other, (Pliny having by general consent tripped in supposing Thericles a turner.) But, as often happens, in process of time “they were called Thericlean from their shape, whatsoever artisan made them, or whether of earth, or of wood, or of metal.” So far well. But “there is another thing,” says Bentley, “besides a pretty invention, very useful to a liar, and that is a good memory.” For “the next thing to be enquired is—the age of this Thericles; and we learn that from Athenæus—one* witness indeed, but as good as a multitude in a matter of this nature. This cup (says he) was invented by Thericles, the Corinthian potter, who was contemporary with Aristophanes the comedian.”

This is enough. Bentley goes on to compute, that all the surviving plays of Aristophanes range within a period of thirty-six years; so that, allowing the full benefit of this latitude to the Pseudo-Phalaris, viz. that Thericles invented his cups in the very first year of this period, still, even upon that concession, the very earliest baking of the potter’s china will be 120 years after the final baking of Phalaris himself.

* There is, however, a collateral testimony from a poet contemporary with the old age of Thericles, viz. Eubulus, which gives a perfect confirmation to that of Athenæus. In the final dissertation, Bentley brought forward this fragment. In fact, the good luck of Bentley, in meeting all the out-of-the-way evidence which he sometimes required, is not less remarkable than his skill in using it.

This article in the first Dissertation was short; but the Oxford critique upon it furnished him with an occasion, and almost a necessity, for supporting it, in the second, with a bravura display of his learning upon all the collateral points that had been connected with the main question. And, as the attack had been in unusual terms of insolence, (asking him, for instance, how he "durst" oppose men such as Grotius and Scaliger,*) Bentley was under no particular obligation to use his opportunities with forbearance, or to renounce his triumph. This was complete. It is not Boyle, or his half-learned associates, but the very heroes of classical literature for the preceding 150 years — Buchanan, Scaliger, Grotius, Casaubon, Salmasius, who on this occasion (respectfully) are shewn to be in error. Most readers are aware, that amongst the multifarious researches which belong to what is called learning, the res metrica has been developed more slowly than any other. The field, therefore, being so under-cultured, had naturally drawn the attention of an ambitious young scholar like Bentley; and, in his epistle to Mill upon John Malelas, he had already made his name illustrious by the detection of a canon in Anapestic metre. "Ned," says Dr Parr, writing to Dr Maltby in 1814, "I believe Bentley knew nothing scientifically of choral metre." Why, no, Sam, perhaps he did not; neither did Porson, if we speak strictly of choral metre; and for Sam himself, little indeed upon any metre whatsoever, except that he somewhere conceives himself to have corrected a few loose iambics of a Latin comic poet, (a feat which did not require a Titan.) However, at that day (1690) it was no trifle to have revealed a canon which had certainly escaped the most eagle-eyed scholars we have mentioned. On the present occasion, it was an appropriate sequel of that triumph, and one which will remind scholars of a similar feat by Porson with regard to iambic metre, (see Pref. to the Hecuba of Euripides,) that a formidable array of passages, objected by the Boyle party as overthrowing his canon, and twelve others, volunteered by himself, are all corrected in a way which, whilst it delivers his canon from the supposed contradiction, forces from him the finest display of his own critical sagacity.

The fourth argument exposes an anachronism pretty much like that of Alæsa in the second. The Pseudo-Phalaris having occasion to speak of the Zancleans, and in three previous Letters of the Messanians, manifestly betrays that he thought Zancle and Messana two different towns. "Certainly," says Bentley, "the true Phalaris could not write thus; and it is a piece of ignorance inexcusable in our Sophist not to know that these names belonged to one and the same city at different times." But, perhaps, the change from the early name of Zancle, to the later one of Messana, may have happened during the progress of these very Letters. The present arrangement of the Letters is indeed inconsistent with that supposition; for it is the 85th which mentions the old name Zancle, whilst the 1st, 21st, and 84th mention Messana. But that objection, if there were no other, might be eluded by supposing the particular order in which the Letters stand in our present editions to have been either purely accidental, or even arbitrarily devised by some one of the early librarii. But allowing all this, the evasion of Bentley's argument will still be impossible on grounds of chronology. Thucydides tells us the occasion of that irreparable expulsion which the Zancleans suffered—and the time, viz. about the last year of the 70th Olympiad. The same author states the circumstances under which the new name Messana arose; and though he does not precisely date this latter incident, he says generally that it was ἄσφαλον ὕστερον (not long after the other.) Separate parts of this statement are corroborated by other historians; and, upon the whole, taking the computus least favourable to Bentley, the new name of Messana appears not to have been imposed by Anaxilaus until more than sixty years after Phalaris was dead and gone.

* This, by the way, shews the variety of hands employed in Boyle's book, and the want of an editor to impress harmony upon them; elsewhere, the Scaligers, and such people, are treated as pedants.

One objection there is undoubtedly to this argument, and Bentley frankly avows it; Pausanias antedates Anaxilaus by not less than 180 years. But there is no need to recite the various considerations which invalidate his authority, since the argument derived from him is one of those which prove too much. Doubtless, it would account for the use of "Messana" in the Letters of Phalaris, but so effectually account for it as to make it impossible that any other name should have been familiarly employed at an age when "Zancle" must have been superannuated by a century. Such is the dilemma in which Bentley has noosed his enemies; skilfully leaving it a matter of indifference to his cause, whether they accept or reject the authority of Pausanias.

From this dilemma, however, Boyle attempts to escape, by taking a distinction between the town, and the people who drew their name from it. Zancleans, he thinks, might subsist under that name long after Zancle had changed its masters and forfeited its name. But this hypothesis is destroyed by means of an inscription which Bentley cites from a statue at Olympia, connected with the comment of the person who records it: the statue, it seems, had been set up by Evagoras, who inscribed himself upon it as a Zanclean; from which single word the recorder infers the antiquity of the statue, arguing that the mere name "Zanclean" sufficiently proved its era to have been anterior to the imposition of the modern name of Messana; whereas clearly, had there been a race of Zancleans who survived (under that name) the city of Zancle, this argument would have been without force, and could not have occurred to the writer who builds upon it.

The fifth argument will perhaps not be thought so entirely satisfactory as it seemed to Bentley. Phalaris, in threatening the people of Himera, says—αὐτὰς ἐκτερίψω ὡς ἐλάαν—I will extirpate them like a pine-tree; that is to say, root and branch. Now, this Delphic threat, and in these identical words, appears first of all in Herodotus, who explains the force of it to lie in this—that of all trees the pine only was radically destroyed by mere lopping. That historian ascribes the original use of this significant allusion to Cræsus, who did not begin his reign until six years after the pretended use of it by Phalaris. But Bentley conceives that he has sufficient reason to father it upon Herodotus himself; in which case it will be younger than the age of Phalaris by a century. But we confess ourselves dissatisfied; or, if that word is too strong, imperfectly satisfied. "We see," says Bentley, "the phrase was then" (i. e. in the time of Cræsus) "so new and unheard-of, that it puzzled a whole city." But it is probable that accidents of place, rather than of time, would determine the intelligibility of this proverb: wherever the pine-tree was indigenous, and its habits familiarly known, the allusion would suggest itself, and the force of it would be acknowledged, no matter in what age. And as to the remark that Aulus Gellius, in the title of a chapter now lost, seems to consider Herodotus as the real author of the saying, it amounts to nothing: at this day we should be apt to discuss any vulgar error which has the countenance of Shakspeare, under a title such as this—"On the Shakspearian notion that a toad is venomous," meaning merely to remind our readers that the notion has a real popular hold and establishment, not surely that Shakspeare was the originator of it. The authority of Eustathius, so very modern an author, adds no strength at all to Bentley's hypothesis. No real links of tradition could possibly connect two authors removed from each other by nearly 2000 years. Eustathius ascribes, or seems to ascribe, the mot to Herodotus, not in a personal sense, but as a short-hand way of designating the book in which it is originally found. The truth is, that such a proverb would be co-eval and co-extensive with the tree. Symbolical forms are always delightful to a semibarbarous age; such, for instance, as the emblematic advice of that silent monitor to a tyrant, who, walking through a garden, cut off the heads of all the plants which overtopped the rest. Threats more especially assume this form: where they are perfectly understood, they are thus made more lively and significant; and, on the other hand, where they are enigmatical, the uncertainty (according to a critical remark of Demetrius Phalareus) points the attention to them under a peculiar advantage of awe and ominous expectation.

The sixth argument is another case of the second and fourth. Phalaris exults that he had routed the Tauromenites and the Zancleans. "But," says Bentley, "there is an old true saying—Πολλὰ καὶ τὰ πολεμικά—many new and strange things happen in war. We have just now seen those same routed Zancleans rise up again, after a thousand years, to give him a worse defeat. And now the others, too, are taking their time to revenge their old losses: for these, though they are called Tauromenites both here and in three other letters, make protestation against the name, and declare they were called Naxians in the days of the true Phalaris. Taurominium, quæ antea Naxos, says Pliny. Whence it is that Herodotus and Thucydides, because they wrote before the change of the name, never speak of Taurominium, but of Naxos."

Yet it will be objected that Bentley himself has made Pythagoras contemporary with Phalaris: now of this very Pythagoras, Porphyry says—"that he delivered Croton, Himera, and Taurominium from tyrants;" and Iamblichus says—"that a young man of Taurominium being drunk, Pythagoras played him sober by a few airs of grave spondees." A third writer also, Conon, says, of a person in the age of Cyrus the elder, contemporary with Pythagoras and Phalaris, that he "went to Taurominium in Sicily." The answer to all this is obvious: Taurominium is here used with the same sort of licensed Prolepsis, as when we say, Julius Cæsar conquered France, and made an expedition into England, though we know that Gaul and Britain were the names in that age.

The seventh, eighth, and eighteenth arguments may be thrown together, all turning upon the same objection, viz. that Phalaris is apt to appropriate the thoughts of better men than himself—a kind of robbery which possibly other royal authors have practised, but hardly (like Phalaris) upon men born long after their own time. The three cases of this, cited by

Bentley, are of very different weight. Let us begin with the weakest. Writing to Polygnotus, Phalaris is found sporting this sentiment—λόγος ἐστὶ σκιὰ παρὰ τοῖς σωφρονιστοῖς πισκίεσθαι—that words are regarded as the shadow of deeds by persons of good sense. "It is a very notable saying, and we are obliged to the author of it; and, if Phalaris had not modestly hinted that others had said it before him, we might have taken it for his own. But then there was either a strange jumping of good wits, or Democritus was a sorry plagiarist; for he laid claim to the first invention of it. What shall we say to this matter? Democritus had the character of a man of probity and wit. Besides, here are Plutarch and Diogenes, two witnesses that would scorn to flatter. This bears hard upon the author of the Letters. But how can we help it? He should have minded his hits better, when he was minded to play the tyrant. For Democritus was too young to know even Pythagoras; τὰ τῶν χροίων μέχεται—considerations of chronology are inconsistent with it; and yet Pythagoras survived Phalaris." Such is Bentley's argument; but undoubtedly it is unfair. He says "besides," as though Plutarch and Diogenes were supplementary evidences to a matter otherwise established upon independent grounds; whereas it is from them only, and from Suidas, whom he afterwards brought forward, that we know of any such claim for Democritus. Again, Bentley overrates their authority. That of Plutarch, upon all matters of fact and critical history, is at this day deservedly low; and, as to Diogenes Laertius, nobody can read him without perceiving that precisely upon this department of his labour, viz. the application of all the stray apophthegms, prose epigrams, and "good things," which then floated in conversation, he had no guide at all. Sometimes there might be a slight internal indication of the author; philosophic sarcasms, for instance, of every age, were ascribed boldly to the cynical Diogenes; sometimes an old tradition might descend with the saying; but much more frequently every aphorism or pointed saying was attributed by turns to each philosopher in succession, who, in his own generation, had possession of the public ear. Just the same thing has happened in England; multitudes of felicitous mots have come down through the 18th century to our days—doing duty first under the names of Swift, Dr Sheridan, &c., next of Lord Chesterfield, then of Quin, Foote, and above all, of George Selwyn, who enjoyed a regal benefit of claim over all waifs and derelicts; and, finally, of Jekyll, Brinsley Sheridan, Courtenay, Sam Rogers, and Thomas Moore. Over and above all this, Bentley is obliged to make two concessions, which take the edge off his argument. Michael Psellus ascribes the saying to Simonides; and Isidore, the Pelusiot, generally to the Lacedæmonians. Now, at all events, this breaks the unanimity of the ascription to Democritus, though each for itself should happen to be false. The objection to Simonides is, that he was but seven years old when Phalaris was killed. This, though surely, in a matter so perplexed as the chronology of that era, it is driving rather closely, we may allow. But what objection is there to the Lacedæmonians? Certainly we can discern, in the very nature of the sentiment, a reason that may have influenced Isidore for tracing it up to a Laconic parentage; but though this is an argument for suspicion, it is none for absolute rejection. Neither does Bentley make any objection of that sort. Here again he seems to rely upon chronology; for his own words are no stronger than these,—that “though the date be undetermined, it might fairly be presumed to be more recent than he,” (i. e. Phalaris.) “Fairly to be presumed!” is that all? And why is it to be presumed? Simply because “four parts out of five” among the Lacedæmonian apophthegms collected by Plutarch are, in Bentley’s judgment, later than the age of Phalaris. Even this leaves a chance not quite inconsiderable, that the anachronism may not exist in the apophthegm before us. But, finally, had Bentley been called on for his proof of the particular proportions here assigned to the Anti-Phalaridean and Post-Phalaridean apophthegms, it would perhaps have appeared that the present argument of his was utterly worthless. For how came he to discriminate two classes? Of necessity, by some marks, (as, suppose diction of a certain quality, more or less archaic, and metrical arrangement, which would belong to all the ῥωμαῖοι taken from the dramatic writers.) And are these criteria sufficient? Undoubtedly they are; for example, before the iambics of the Greek tragedy existed, iambic apophthegms could not be detached from it. No such metrical ῥωμαῖοι, therefore, can pretend to an earlier date than that of the drama itself. Well, then, having so effectual a test, with what propriety could Bentley throw the decision upon a ratio of chances—“4 out of 5”? For no matter if the chances against a fact had been even a thousand to one before examination, yet if, after examination and submission to the test, the result were in favour of that fact, it will be established no less certainly than if the chances had been just the other way. The positive application of the test is transcendent to all presumptions and probabilities whatsoever, however reasonable it might have been to rely upon them in a case where no examination had been possible. So much for this section, which—though the weakest of the whole—is wound up in the most stinging manner; for Boyle having argued that apparent plagiarisms in a case like this proved nothing, since, in fact, no absolute originality, and therefore no manifest plagiarism, could be imagined in sentiments which belong to human nature itself, Bentley assures him that he is mistaken—exhibiting in his own person a refutation of that maxim; “for there are many such nostrums in his book, such proper and peculiar mistakes, as were never thought on nor said by any man before him.”

The argument in the eighteenth section, which would fix upon Phalaris a reference to an epitaph first cited by Demosthenes in his Crown Oration, delivered in the third year of the 112th Olympiad, nearly 220 years after his own death, is about as dubious as the last. But the case in the eighth section is unanswerable. Phalaris is made to say—οὐ γὰρ ὄντας ἀθάνατον ἑστίν εἶναι, ὡς φασι τινες, ἀ περὶ σέμεναι—(i. e. That we, being ourselves mortal, should cherish immortal anger, is, according to the saying, unfitting.) Now, here the iambic metre, and the tone of a tragic ἰαμβῶν, are too evident to leave any doubts about the fountain from which the Pseudo-Phalaris is drawing.

The inference of Bentley is—"that, if this iambic came from the stage, it must be later than Phalaris, let it belong to what poet soever, tragic or comic." Boyle, on the other hand, is "very well satisfied that there were both tragic and comic poets before the days of Phalaris." And upon this, in law phrase, issue is joined.

Comedy is discussed in the present section. Bentley argues the following points against Boyle:—First, that Epicharmus is to be considered the father of Comedy upon more and better authorities than Susarion; Secondly, this being admitted, that upon chronological grounds Phalaris could not borrow a verse from comedy; Thirdly, even supposing Susarion to have contributed something to the invention, yet that this could not have availed Phalaris, unless he had come over incognito to the villages of Attica, inasmuch as "his plays were extemporal, and never published in writing;" and, Fourthly, granting even "that they were published, it is more likely they were in tetrametres and other chorical measures, than in iambics." And why so? Because, as the Drama grew up from a festival, in which the main elements were singing and dancing, it is certain that the earliest metres were those which adapted themselves to dancing. It is, however, true, though at that time unknown to the learned, that an unpublished MS. of one Diomedes Scholasticus upon Dionysius Thrax, which MS. is in the King's Library, asserts, that "Susarion was the beginner of comedy in verse, whose plays were all lost in oblivion: but there are two or three iambics of a play of his still remembered." In fact, there are in all five: the four first in this very MS. which had been seen only by Bentley, (and some of them in two other authors;) the last (which, by the way, seems to us a later addition by way of ἐπιμαυθίον) in Stobæus. We shall give the whole, as the sentiment unfortunately belongs to all ages:

Ἀκούετε, λαῶς· Συσάριον λέγει τὰδε
 ὕμνος Φιλίνῳ Μισαρῶνι Τριποδίσκῳ·
 Κακὸν γυναῖκες· ἀλλ' ὅμως, ἴδμενόςται,
 Οὐκ ἔστιν οἰκίῃ οἰκίαν ἔννυ κακῶ.
 Καὶ γὰρ τὸ ἥμῃσι, καὶ τὸ μὴ ἥμῃσι, κακόν.

Hear, O people: thus speaks Susarion, &c. Women are a torment; but still, my countrymen, there is no keeping house without this torment. To marry, then, and not to marry, is alike calamitous. Bentley produces this evidence (which, by the way, he corrects capitally) against himself; but disarms it chiefly by this argument. Susarion is here introduced addressing the audience in his own person; now that, taken in connexion with the iambic metre, will prove the verses to be no part of a play. For though sometimes the poet did address the parterre, yet this was always done through the chorus; and what were the measures that the chorus used at that time? "Never iambics, but always anapests or tetrametres; and I believe," says Bentley, "there is not one instance that the chorus speaks at all to the pit in iambics; to the actor it sometimes does." Boyle, in treating the case of Susarion, had made much use of a passage in the Arundel Marbles. Unfortunately the words, which he particularly relied on, were mere emendations of Palmerius and Selden. Now it happened that Selden, whose Greek knowledge we ourselves consider miserably inaccurate, had in this instance made but a very imperfect examination of the marble chronicle itself. The consequence was, that Boyle had here unintentionally prepared an opening for a masterly display of skill on the part of Bentley, who had the pleasure at one and the same moment of exhibiting his Greek without ostentation—of doing a critical service to that famous Arundelian monument, on which so many learned heads had been employed—of dragging after him, as captives, a whole host of heroes in literature, whom he had indisputably defeated—and finally, of establishing his triumph in the question immediately before him.* All this learning, however, Bentley

* Seldom, perhaps, has there been a more ingenious correction than that of Selden's in Ἀθήναις on the Arundel Marble. Bentley had remarked elsewhere that the marble fails not to remind his readers, is ex abundanti, so much over and above what was necessary to decide the dispute, and, in fact, an excursus forced from him by his antagonist. For in reality certain words in the apophthegm, no ways essential to its expression, are proofs (or so Bentley regards them) that the Pseudo-Phalaris was borrowing not merely from the Greek drama before it existed, but from a specific dramatist, Euripides, to wit; and a specific tragedy now lost, viz. Philoctetes. However, we must own that this part of the argument appears to us questionable at least, and perhaps positively wrong; questionable, because Bentley has laid far too much stress on two words so exceedingly common as ἔχιν and προσήκει, the rest being (as he himself admits) absolutely indispensable to the expression of the thought, and therefore sure to occur to any writer having occasion to express it. To these two words confessedly he commits the entire burden of the tragedian's claim; and upon the ground, that, where so many equivalent expressions were at hand, it was hardly to be supposed that two persons writing independently, "would have hit upon the same by chance." But we reply, that the words ἔχιν and προσήκει, each containing an iambus, are convenient, and likely to offer to any man writing in iambic metre, which several of Bentley's equivalents are not. At any rate, the extent of the coincidence is not sufficient. But, secondly, we think that unquestionably the apophthegm was not from the fragment of the Philoctetes; for the words there stand thus:—

"Ὄσπιν δὲ θνητὸν καὶ τὸ σῶμ' ἡμῶν ἔφιν,
Οὕτω προσήκει μηδὲ τὴν ὀργὴν ἔχιν
'Αθάνατον.

In this there is some difference, even as to the form of the thought; and the Pseudo-Phalaris must greatly have disturbed the order, and without apparent reason, to obtain his own. But the best answer is this, that the words, as they now stand, are in a natural iambic arrangement—

Θητὸς μὲν ὄντας ἀθάνατον ὀργὴν ἔχιν
'Ου—προσήκει.

The defect in the second line might be supplied in a thousand ways. And we therefore throw Bentley back upon that general form of his argument, which he imagined to be superseded by a special one: King Phalaris, in any case, is detected borrowing from a tragic drama, if not from this particular drama of Euripides; and as elsewhere we have seen him drawing loans from cities before they were founded, so here he is manifestly borrowing a sentiment from some tragedian unknown, before tragedy itself existed.

The two next arguments may be thrown together. In the first of them, Phalaris is convicted of borrowing a phrase (τὸν ὀλιθρον εἶπε) from Callimachus; and another, (ἐτίρω δαίμονι, in the sense of bad fortune), perhaps also from Callimachus—if not, from Pindar; no matter which, since either way there would be an anachronism. These cases are, perhaps, doubtful; in fact, the acknowledged coincidence of two original poets, shews that the last phrase, at any rate, had gained a sort of proverbial footing. Not so with regard to the word phi- uniformly said Ἀθήναι: why, then, should it suddenly, and in this place only, say ἱν Ἀθηναις, (which was Selden's suggestion for filling up the ENA ΑΙΣ?) Bentley's reading of ἱν ἀπῆναις, in plaustris, immediately recalls the line of Horace, Dicitur et plaustris vexisse poemata Thespis.

No less important is Bentley's confirmation of a reading formerly proposed by one who distrusted it. Palmerius, much against his will, (for he could find no sense in the words,) had made out upon the marble that the inventor of Comedy received as his prize ἰσχάδων ἄρσιχον, αἰθον ὄνου—a basket of figs, and a hogshhead of wine. Bentley produced an unpublished couplet of Dioscorides, the last line of which fully confirms the marble:

Χ' ἑτίλας ἦν Σύκων ἄρριχος ἄθλος ἔτι

—i. e. and a basket of figs besides was the Attic prize. Another reading of this line, which substitutes ἰθλός for ἄθλος, we need not notice more particularly, as it is immaterial to the point before us.

losopher, which furnishes the matter for another section. The 56th Letter is addressed to Pythagoras the Philosopher; this being only the superscription, may have been the addition of a copier; and, if so, the argument of Bentley would be eluded; but in the 23d Letter, the word philosophy cannot be detached from the context. Now, it is universally agreed, that Pythagoras himself introduced* the word; a fact which hardly needs an attestation; however, from a crowd of authors, Bentley quotes Cicero to the following effect:—"That, when Pythagoras had discoursed before Leon, (the tyrant of Sicily,) that prince, much taken with his wit and eloquence, asked him what art or trade he possessed. 'Art,' says Pythagoras, 'I profess none; I am a philosopher.'" Leon, in admiration of the newness of the name, enquired what these philosophers were, and wherein they differed from other men." On this, says Bentley, "What a difference is here between the two tyrants! The one knows not what philosopher means: the other seems to account it as threadbare a word as the name of wise men of Greece; and that, too, before he had ever spoken with Pythagoras. We cannot tell which conversation was first. If Phalaris was the first, the Epistles must be a cheat. But, allowing Leon's to be the first, yet it could not be long after the other; and it is very hard to believe that the fame of so small a matter could so soon reach Phalaris's ear in his castle, through his guard of blue-coats, and the loud bellowing of his bull." In a note on the word blue-coats,† Bentley says, "This is not said at random; for I find the Agrigentines forbade their citizens to wear blue clothes, because blue was Phalaris's livery."

Boyle's answer is characteristic at once of his breeding as a man of quality, and his pursuits as a scholar: for he takes a scholarlike illustration, and he uses it like a courtier. Queen Elizabeth, it seems, in addressing one of the universities, introduced, upon her own authority, the word Feminitis. Now, could that learned body have paid her a more delicate compliment, asks Boyle, than by using the royal word in its answer? Bentley rejects this as a piece of unworthy adulation; not that Bentley was always above flattering; but his mind was too coarse and plain to enter into the spirit of such romantic and Castilian homage: his good sense was strong, his imaginative gallantry weak. However, we agree with him that, previously to any personal conversation with Pythagoras, the true Phalaris could not possibly have used this new designation "as familiarly as if it had been the language of his nurse," but "would have ushered it in with some kind of introduction."

In the following section comes on to be argued, the great question of

* In saying that Pythagoras introduced the term philosopher, we must be understood to mean, (and Bentley, we presume, meant,) that he first gave currency to that particular determination of the word "philosopher," by which, under the modest εὐφημισμός of an amateur or dilettante in wisdom, was understood an investigator of first causes, upon a particular scheme; else, in the general and unlimited sense of the word, merely as a lover of wisdom, and nothing masked under that title, there can be no doubt that Pythagoras did not introduce the word. The case is the same as that of the modern illuminati; as a general and unrestricted term, it is, of course, applicable to all men—each in his degree—who can make any pretensions to intellectual culture. But, in the particular sense of Adam Weishaupt, and many other mystical enthusiasts of modern Germany, that term designated a secret society, whose supposed objects and purposes have been stated by Robinson and the Abbé Baruel with a degree of circumstantiality which must have been rather surprising to the gentlemen themselves.

† The meaning of Bentley's joke, as well as odd coincidence in the Agrigentine regulation, are now obsolete. It must be remembered, therefore, that all the menial retainers of English noblemen, from a very early period of our history—and, from this passage, it seems that the practice still subsisted in Bentley's time—received at stated intervals an ample blue coat. This was the generic distinction of their order; the special one was the badge or cognizance appropriated to the particular family under which they took service; and from the periodical deliveries of these characteristic articles of servile costume, came our word livery.

the age of Tragedy. The occasion is this: In the 63d Epistle, Phalaris "is in great wrath with one Aristolochus, a tragic poet, that nobody ever heard of, for writing tragedies against him." Bentley amuses himself a little with the expression of "writing tragedies against a man;" and with the name of Aristolochus, whom he pronounces a fairy poet, for having kept himself invisible to all the world since his own day; though Boyle facetiously retorts, that, judging by the length of his name, he must have been a giant, rather than a fairy. But the strength of Bentley's objection is announced in this sentence:—"I must take the boldness to tell Phalaris, who am out of his reach, that he lays a false crime to the poet's charge; for there was no such thing nor word as tragedy when he tyrannized at Agrigentum." Upon this arose the dispute concerning the earliest date of tragedy.

In treating this interesting question, Bentley first addresses himself to the proof that Thespis, and not Epigenes or Phrynichus, was the true and original inventor of tragedy; and that no relics of any one Thespian drama survived in the age of Aristotle; consequently, that those fragments which imposed upon Clemens Alexandrinus and others, were forgeries; and he points out even the particular person most liable to the suspicion of the forgery, viz. Heraclides Ponticus, a scholar of Aristotle's. The fact of the forgery is settled indeed upon other evidence; for these four monstrous words, κινεζζε, χθυστης, φλιμεν, δερο, occur in the iambics attributed to Thespis. Now these words are confessedly framed as artificial contrivances for including the entire twenty-four letters of the Greek alphabet. But Bentley makes it tolerably evident that no more than eighteen, certainly not twenty-four, existed in the age of Thespis. The lines, then, are spurious; and the imaginary evidences for the fact of Thespis having written any thing, are got rid of. And as to any supplementary argument from the Alcestis, supposed to be ascribed to him by the Arundel Marbles, that is overthrown—1. By the received tradition that Thespis admitted no female characters into his plays: à fortiori, then, that he could not have treated a subject, the whole passion of which turned upon a female character; but, 2. More effectually by the triumphant proof which Bentley gives, that the Arundelian Alcestis was a pure fiction of Selden's, arising out of imperfect examination. Next, however, let it be conceded that Thespis did write, will that be of any service to Boyle? This introduces the question of the precise era of Thespis. Now, on the Oxford Marble, most unfortunately the letters which assign this are obliterated by time and weather. But Bentley suggests an obvious remedy for the misfortune, which gives a certain approximation. The name of Thespis stands between two great events, viz. the defeat of Cræsus by Cyrus, immediately preceding, and the accession of Darius, immediately following. The first of these is placed by all great chronologists in the 1st year of the 59th Olympiad; the last, in the 2d year of the 65th Olympiad. Between these dates, then, it was (a latitude of 25 years) that Thespis founded the tragic drama. And this being so, it follows, obviously, that Phalaris, who perished in the 3d year of the 57th Olympiad, could not have afforded a subject to tragedy during his lifetime. Boyle most idly imagines an error in the marble chronicle, through an omission of the sculptor. Certainly the σφαλματα operarum are well known to literary men of our times, but hardly where the proof-sheets happen to be marble; and after all, Bentley shews him that he would take no benefit by this omission. Three collateral disquisitions on Phrynichus, the successor of Thespis, on Solon, and on the origin of the word tragedy, are treated elaborately, and with entire success; but they depend too much on a vast variety of details to admit of compression.

In the Twelfth Section, Bentley examines the dialect. "Had all other ways failed us," says he, "of detecting this impostor, yet his very speech had betrayed him: for his language is Attic; but he had forgotten that the scene of these Epistles was not Athens, but Sicily, where the Doric tongue was generally spoken and written. Pray, how came that idiom to be the court-language at Agrigentum?" Athens, the μισοτύραννος, or tyrant-hating, by old prerogative, was not likely to be a favourite with the greatest of tyrants. And above all, we must consider this—that in the age of Phalaris, before literature had given to the Attic dialect that supremacy which it had afterwards, there was no one reason for valuing this exotic dialect, (as it was to Phalaris,) or giving it any sort of preference to the native dialect of Sicily.

But it is objected that Phalaris was born at Astypalæa, an island where, in early times, there existed an Attic colony. Now, in answer to this—waiving the question of fact, would he, who for twenty years had been a tax-gatherer in Sicily, have not learned the Doric? Studying popularity, would he have reminded the natives, by every word he uttered, that he was a foreigner? But perhaps he was not born at Astypalæa: there is a strong presumption that he was born in Sicily: and even if at Astypalæa, there is “direct evidence that it was a Dorian colony, not an Athenian; for it was planted by the Megarians.”

But other eminent Sicilians, it may be said, quitted the Doric for the Attic in their writings. True: but that was in solemn compositional addresses to the world, epic poems and histories—not in familiar letters, “mostly directed to the next towns, or to some of his own domestics, about private affairs, or even the expenses of his family, and never designed for the public view.”

“Yet,” retorts Boyle, “we have a letter of Dion of Syracuse to Dionysius the Tyrant, and a piece of Dionysius’s, both preserved among Plato’s Epistles, and written in such a dialect as if both prince and philosopher (to use the Doctor’s phrase) had gone to school at Athens.”

Here, rejoins Bentley, he is “very smart upon me; but he lashes himself; for the philosopher really did go to school at Athens, and lived with Plato and Speusippus:” and as to the prince, though he “did not go to Athens, yet Athens, as I may say, went to him; for not Plato only, but several other philosophers, were entertained by him at his court in Syracuse.”

But again, says Boyle, thinking to produce a memorable and unobjectionable case, because taken from Scripture, Epimenides the Cretan did not write in the Cretic dialect; for, in the line cited from him by St Paul,—

Κρήτις ἀνὶ ψευδαί, κατὰ Σπρίαν, γαστήρις ἀργαί,

the word ἀν would in the Cretic dialect have been ἀυ. Even from this position, so difficult as it might seem at this time of day to dispute, Bentley’s unrelenting scourge immediately forces him: he produces a Cretic epistle and a Cretic inscription, (of absolute authority, being on marble,) both of which present the form ἀν. But, even had it been otherwise, we must remember, that from a poem to a familiar epistle, non valet consequentia; the latter could not abandon the dialect native to the writer, without impeaching its credit. And so fatal is Bentley’s good luck, here as everywhere, that he produces a case where a letter of this very Epimenides, which still survives, was denounced as spurious by an ancient critic, (Demetrius the Magnesians,) for no other reason than because it was not Cretic in its dialect, but Attic.

With his customary bad fortune, Boyle next produces Alcæus and Sappho, as persons “who were born in places where the Ionic was spoken, and yet wrote their lyric poems in Æolic or Doric.” For this assertion he really had some colourable authority, since both Ælian and Suidas expressly rank Lesbos among the Ionian cities. Yet, because Meursius, and before him, Brodæus, and after both, Bentley himself, had all independently noticed the word Lesbos as an error for Lebedos, Bentley replies in the following gentle terms:—“I protest I am ashamed even to refute such miserable trash, though Mr Boyle was not ashamed to write it. What part is it that I must teach him? That Alcæus and Sappho were natives of Lesbos? But it is incredible he should be ignorant of that. Or, that the language of Lesbos was Æolic? Yes, there his learning was at a loss; he believed it was Ionic.” It is then demonstrated, by a heap of authorities, not only that Lesbos was an Æolian city, but that, (as Strabo says,) in a manner, it was the metropolis of Æolian cities.

Well, but Agathyrside, at least, quitted his Samian or Doric dialect for Ionic. Answer: There was no such person; nor did the island of Samos speak Doric, but Ionic Greek.

Andronicus of Rhodes, then, in his still surviving Commentary on Aristotle's Ethics. The Commentary does indeed survive; but that the author was a Rhodian, is a mere conceit of a modern, and a very unlearned person.* This fact had been already stated by Daniel Heinsius, the original editor of Andronicus.

Well, at any rate, Dionysius of Halicarnassus: that case is past disputing. Why, yes; he was of Doric birth undoubtedly, and undoubtedly he wrote in the Attic dialect. But then, in the first place, he lived amongst those who had nothing to do with the Doric—which was one reason for abjuring his native dialect; and secondly, which is the material difference between him and Phalaris, he wrote in the age of Augustus Cæsar—when the Attic dialect had been established for four centuries as the privileged language of Grecian literature.

“But the most remarkable instance of all,” says Boyle, “is that of Zaleucus, King of the Locrians, a Doric colony; the preface to whose laws is preserved, and has plainly nothing of the Doric dialect in it.” Sad fate of this strongest of all instances! His inexorable antagonist sets to work, and, by arguments drawn from place, time, and language, makes it pretty nearly a dead certainty that the pretended laws of Zaleucus were as pure a fabrication as the Letters of Phalaris. Afterwards he makes the same scrutiny, and with the same result, of the laws attributed to Charondas; and in the end, he throws out a conjecture that both these forgeries were the work of some sophist not even a native Greek; a conjecture which, by the way, has since been extended by Valckenaer to the Pseudo-Phalaris

[N.B. Any future editor of Bentley's critical works ought to notice the arguments of Warburton, who, in the Divine Legation, endeavours to support the two lawgivers against Bentley.]

The use of the Attic dialect, therefore, in an age when as yet no conceivable motive had arisen for preferring that to any other dialect, the earliest morning not having dawned of those splendours which afterwards made Athens the glory of the earth, is of itself a perfect detection of the imposture. But let this be waived. Conceive that mere caprice, in a wilful tyrant like Phalaris, led him to adopt the Attic dialect: stet pro ratione voluntas. Still, even in such a case, he must have used the Attic of his own day. Caprice might go abroad, or it might go back in point of time; but caprice could not prophetically anticipate, as Phalaris does, the diction of an age long posterior to his own. Upon this subject Bentley expresses himself in a more philosophic tone than he usually adopts. “Every living language,” says he, “like the perspiring bodies of living creatures, is in perpetual motion and alteration. Some words go off, and become obsolete; others are taken in, and by degrees grow into common use; or the same word is inverted to a new sense and notion; which, in tract of time, makes as observable a change in the air and features of a language, as age makes in the lines and mien of a face.” Boyle, however, admitting this as a general law, chooses to suppose that the Greek language presented an eminent exception to it; inasmuch that writings, separated by an interval of two thousand years, were, in his judgment, nearer to each other in point of phraseology, than English works separated by only two centuries. And as the reason of this fancied stability, he assigns the extended empire of the Greeks. Bentley disputes both the fact and the reason. As to the fact, he says that the resemblance between the old and modern Greek literature was purely mimetic. Why else, he asks, arose the vast multitude of scholiasts? Their aid was necessary to explain phrases which had become obsolete. As to extensive empire, no better cause can be assigned why languages are not stationary. In the Roman language, for example, more changes took place during the single century between the Duilian column (i. e. the first naval victory of the Romans) and the comedies of Terence, than during the four centuries preceding. And why? Because in that century the Roman eagles first flew beyond the limits of Italy. Again, with respect to the Athenian dialect, we find, from Dionysius of Halicarnassus, that already by the time of the great orators, the peculiar Attic of Plato and Thucydides had become antiquated, although these last stood in the same relation of time to Demosthenes, that Dryden did to Pope. Now this is sufficiently explained by the composition of the Athenian population in the 110th Olympiad, as afterwards recorded by Athenæus. At that time there were 21,000 citizens, 10,000 naturalized foreigners, and 400,000 slaves. Under this proportion of nineteen foreigners* to one native, well might the dialect suffer rapid alterations.

† Valckenaer's argument is good for as far as it goes: pity that so exquisite a Grecian should not have detected many more flaws of the same quality! But in this respect the Letters of Phalaris seem to enjoy that sort of unaccountable security which hitherto has shielded the forgeries of Chatterton. No man, with the slightest ear for metre, or the poorest tact for the characteristic marks of modern and ancient style of poetic feeling, but must at once acknowledge the extravagance of referring these poems to the age of Henry IV. Yet, with the exception of an allusion to the technical usages of horse-racing, and one other, we do not remember that any specific anachronisms, either as to words or things, have been yet pointed out in Chatterton.

Thus far Bentley maintained his usual superiority. But in the particular examples which he adduced, he was both unexpectedly penurious and not always accurate. The word θυγατρίδες, daughters, used in the Hebrew manner for young women, was indisputably a neologism impossible to the true Phalaris. So also of παιδων ἱεῖρας used for παιδικῶν. With respect to the phrase παῖδων ἱεῖρας, used for lovers of children, which Bentley contends must have been equivalent in the elder ages to the infamous word παιδικῶν, it has been since supposed that he was refuted by Markland, and v. 1088 of the Supplices of Euripides; but on the whole, we are of opinion that Bentley was right. It was the prerogative of the Tragic Drama, as of poetry in general, to exalt and ennoble: Thus, for instance, "filled her with thee a goddess fair," in Milton's L'Allegro, would in plain prose become almost an obscene expression; but, exalted and sustained by the surrounding images, it is no more than allowably voluptuous. In the absolute prose of Phalaris, we think with Bentley that the phrase could not have borne an innocent meaning. Thus far Bentley was right, or not demonstrably wrong; but in the two next instances he errs undeniably; and the triumph of Boyle, for the first time and the last, cannot be gainsaid. Bentley imagined that παραδίδωμι, in the unusual sense of giving beforehand, (instead of betraying,) had no countenance from the elder writers; and he also denounced the word διωκεῖν, when applied to the pursuing an object of desire, believing that it was applicable only to the case of an enemy pursuing one who fled. Here we see the danger, in critical niceties, of trusting to any single memory, though the best in the world. And we can well believe Bentley when he charges his oversight upon the hurry of the "press staying for more copy." Having erred, however, the best course is to confess frankly and unreservedly; and this Bentley does. But in one point he draws from his very error an advantageous inference: his Oxford enemies had affected to regard him as a mere index-hunter; and Alsop had insolently described him as "virum in volvendis Lexicis satis diligentem." Now, says Bentley, it was just because I was not what they would represent me just because I too much neglected to search Lexicons and Indexes, and too entirely relied on my own reading and unassisted memory, that this one sole error in my first hasty dissertation remained, like the heel of Achilles, to shew a touch of human infirmity, in what else might have claimed the immaculateness of a divine origin.

Upon a final examination of the Letters, Bentley detected three other words, which manifestly belonged to a later and a philosophic era—viz. πρόβου, used not in the sense of fore-sight, but of Divine Providence; ἐπιστολή, which at first meant a letter or an element of words, used for element in the natural philosopher's sense; and κοσμος for the world. But the truth is, that this line of argument threw Bentley upon the hard task of proving negatives. It might be easy, as occasions offered, to shew that such a word was used by a particular age; one positive example sufficed for that: but difficult indeed to shew that it was not. The whole is a matter of practice and feeling; and, without any specific instances of modern idiom, which yet might perhaps still be collected by a very vigilant critic, no man of good taste, competently prepared, will hesitate to condemn the Letters as an imposture, upon the general warrant of the style and quality of the thoughts; these are everywhere redolent of a state of society highly artificial and polished, and argue an era of literature matured, or even waning, as to the division of its several departments, and the pretensions of its professors.

The argument which succeeds in the Fourteenth and Nineteenth Sections, is equally ludicrous and convincing. Throughout the Letters, Phalaris sports a most royal munificence, and gives away talents with as much ease as if they had been sixpences. Now, the jest of the matter is, that Sicilian talents were really not much more. The Attic forger of the Letters, naturally thinking of the Attic talent, (worth about L.180,) forgot, or had never learned, that the Sicilian talent was literally two thousand times less in value. Thus Phalaris complains of a hostile invasion, as having robbed him of seven talents; which, if they could be supposed Attic talents, make L.1260 sterling; but, being Sicilian talents, no more than 12s. 7d. Again, he gives to a lady, as her marriage portion, five talents, meaning, of course, Attic talents (i. e. L.900); but what the true Phalaris must have understood by that sum was—nine shillings! And in other places he mentions δραχμαὶ, coins which were not Sicilian. Boyle endeavoured to resist these exposures, but without any success; and the long dissertation on Sicilian money which his obstinacy drew from Bentley, remains a monument of the most useful learning, as it corrects the errors of Gronovius, and other first-rate authorities, upon this very complex topic.

Meantime, the talent everywhere meant to be understood was the Athenian; and upon that footing, the presents made by Phalaris are even more absurd by their excess, than upon the Sicilian valuation of the talent by their defect. Either way, the Pseudo-Phalaris is found offending against the possibilities of the time and of the place. One instance places the absurdity in a striking light, both as respects the giver and the receiver. Gold was at that time very scarce in Greece, so that the Spartans could not, in every part of that country, collect enough to gild the face of a single statue; and they finally bought it in Asia of Croesus. Nay, long afterwards, Philip of Macedon, being possessed of one golden cup, weighing no more than half a pound Troy, could not sleep, if it were not placed under his pillow. But, perhaps, Sicily had what Greece wanted? So far from it, that, above 70 years after Phalaris, Hiero, King of Syracuse, could not obtain gold enough for a single tripod and a Victoria, until after a long search, and a mission to Corinth; and even then his success was an accident. So much for the powers of the giver. Now for the receiver. A physician in those days was not paid very liberally; and even in a later age, the following are the rates which the philosopher Crates assigns as a representative scale for the practice of rich men:—"To a cook, L.30; to a physician, 8d.; to a toad-eater, L.900; to a moral adviser—smoke; to a courtesan, L.180; to a philosopher, 4d." But this was satire. True: yet, seriously, not long after the death of Phalaris, we have an account of the fees paid to Democedes, the most eminent physician of that day. His salary for a whole year from the people of Ægina was L.180. The following year he was hired by the Athenians for L.800; and the year after that by a prince, richer than Phalaris, for L.360 : so that he never got so much as a guinea a-day. Yet, in the face of these facts, Phalaris gives to his physician, Polycletus, the following presents for a single cure :—four goblets of refined gold, two silver bowls of unrivalled workmanship, ten couple of large Thericlaean cups, twenty young boys for his slaves, fifteen hundred pounds in ready money, besides a pension for life, equal to the highest salaries of his generals or admirals ; all which, says Bentley, though shocking to common sense, when supposed to come from Phalaris, a petty prince of a petty district in Sicily, “ is credible enough, if we consider that a sophist was the paymaster ;” who, as the actors in the Greek comedy paid all debts with lupins, pays his with words.

As his final argument, Bentley objects that the very invention of letter-writing was due to Atossa the Persian Empress, younger than Phalaris by one or two generations. This is asserted upon the authority of Tactian, and of a much more learned writer, Clement of Alexandria. But, be that as it may, every person who considers the general characteristics of those times, must be satisfied that, if the epistolary form of composition existed at all, it was merely as a rare agent in sudden and difficult emergencies—rarer, perhaps, by a great deal, than the use of telegraphic dispatches at present. As a species of literary composition, it could not possibly arise until its use in matters of business had familiarized it to all the world. Letters of grace and sentiment would be a remote afterthought upon letters of necessity and practical negotiation. Bentley is too brief, however, on this head, and does not even glance at some collateral topics, such as the Lacedæmonian Caduceus and its history, which would have furnished a very interesting excursus. His reason for placing this section last is evident. The story of Mucianus, a Roman of consular rank, who had been duped by a pretended letter of Sarpedon's, (that same Sarpedon, si Diis placeat, who is killed in the Iliad by Patroclus,) furnishes him with a parting admonition, personally appropriate to his antagonist—that something more even than the title of Honourable “ cannot always secure a man from cheats and impostures.”

In the Sixteenth Section, which might as properly have stood last, Bentley moves the startling question, (able of itself to decide the controversy,) “ in what secret cave” the letters had been hidden, “ so that nobody ever heard of them for a thousand years?” He suggests that some trusty servant of the Tyrant must have buried them underground ; “ and it was well he did so ; for if the Agrigentines had met with them, (who burned both him and his relations and his friends,) they had certainly gone to pot.” (The foreign translator of the two Phalaris Dissertations (whose work, by the way, was revised by the illustrious Valckenaer) is puzzled by this phrase of “ going to pot,” and he translates it conjecturally in the following ludicrous terms : “ Si enim eas invenissent Agrigentini, sine dubio tergendis natibus inservissent.”] Boyle, either himself in a mist, or designing to mystify his readers, cites the cases, as if parallel cases, of Paterculus and Phædrus, the first of whom is not quoted by any author now extant till Priscian's time—500 years later than his own era—and not again until 900 years after Priscian : as to Phædrus, supposed to belong to the Augustan era, he is first mentioned by Avienus, 400 years after this epoch, and never once again, until his works were brought to light by Pithou late in the sixteenth century. These cases Boyle cites as countenancing that of Phalaris. But Bentley will not suffer the argument to be so darkened : the thousand years which succeeded to Priscian and Avienus were years of barbarity ; there was little literature, and little interest in literature, through that long night in Western Europe. This sufficiently accounts for the obscurity in which the two Latin authors slumbered. But the thousand years which succeeded to Phalaris, Solon, and Pythagoras, were precisely the most enlightened period of that extent, and, in fact, the only period of one thousand successive years, in the records of our planet, that has uninterruptedly enjoyed the light of literature. So that the difference between the case of Phalaris, and those which are alleged as parallel by Boyle, is exactly this : that the Pseudo-Phalaris was first heard of in “ the very dusk and twilight before the long night of ignorance;" whereas Phædrus, Lactantius, &c. suffered the more natural effect of being eclipsed by that night. The darkness which extinguished the genuine classics, first drew Phalaris into notice. Besides, that in the cases brought forward to countenance that of Phalaris, the utmost that can be inferred is no more than a negative argument, those writers are simply not quoted; but from that no argument can be drawn, concluding for their non-existence. Whereas, in the case of Phalaris, we find various authors—Pindar, for instance, Plato, Aristotle, Timæus, Polybius, and others, down even to Lucian—talking of the man in terms which are quite inconsistent with the statements of these letters. And we may add, with regard to other distinguished authors, as Cicero in particular, that on many occasions, their very silence, under circumstances which suggested the strongest temptation to quote from these letters, had they been aware of their existence, is of itself a sufficient proof that no such records of the Sicilian tyrant had ever reached them by report.

Finally, the matter of the letters, to which Bentley dedicates a separate section of his work, is decisive of the whole question to any man of judgment who has reviewed them without prejudice or passion. Strange it is at this day to recollect the opposite verdicts on this point of the controversy, and the qualifications of those from whom they proceeded. Sir William Temple, an aged statesman, and practised in public business, intimate with courts, a man of great political sagacity, a high-bred gentleman, and of brilliant accomplishments, singles out these letters not merely as excellent in their kind, but as one argument amongst others for the unapproachable supremacy in all intellectual pretensions of the ancients; on the other hand, Bentley, a young scholastic clergyman of recluse habits, comparatively low in rank, and of humble breeding, pronounces the letters to be utterly despicable, and unworthy of a prince. On such a question, and between such judges, who would hesitate to abide by the award of the sage old diplomatist? Yet a single explanation discredits his judgment: he was angry and prejudiced. And the actual result is—that every reader of sense heartily accedes to Bentley's sentence—"You feel, by the emptiness and deadness of them, that you converse with some dreaming pedant with his elbow on his desk; not with an active, ambitious tyrant, with his hand on his sword, commanding a million of subjects."

It remains that we should say a few words on Bentley's character, and the general amount of his claims. This part of his task, Dr Monk, for a reason quite unintelligible to us, has declined; and Dr Parr has attempted it with his usual sonorous tympany of words, but with no vestiges of distinct meaning, or of appropriate commendation. We do not design, on this occasion, to supply their omissions by a solemn and minute adjudication of Bentley's quantum meruit in every part of his pretensions; that will be a proper undertaking, and one from which we shall not shrink, in connexion with some general review of the leading scholars since the restoration of letters, English and Continental. At present, we shall confine ourselves to a brief and unpretending suggestion of some few principal considerations, which should guide our estimate of Bentley's services to literature.

Bentley was a man of strong "motherwit," and of masculine good sense. These were his primary advantages; and he had them in excess, if excess belongs to gifts of that quality. They are gifts which have not often illuminated the labours of the great classical scholar; who, though necessarily a man of talent, has rarely been a man of powerful understanding. In this there is no contradiction: it is possible to combine great talents with a poor understanding; and such a combination is, indeed, exceedingly common. The Scaligers, perhaps, were men of commanding sense. Isaac Cusaubon, who has been much praised for his sense, (and of late more than ever by Messrs Southey and Savage Landor,) was little above mediocrity in that particular. His notices of men and human life are, for the most part, poor and lifeless commonplaces. Salmasius, a greater scholar, was even meaner as a thinker. To take an illustration or two from our own times, Valckenær and Porson—the two best Grecians, perhaps, since Bentley—were both poor creatures in general ability and sense. Porson's jeu d'esprit, in the newspapers of his day, were all childish and dull beyond description: and, accordingly, his whig friends have been reduced to the sad necessity of lying and stealing on his behalf, by claiming, (and even publishing,) as Porson's, a copy of verses, (The Devil's Sunday Thoughts;) of which they are well assured he did not write a line. Parr, again, a good Latin scholar, though no Grecian, for general power of thought and sense, was confessedly the merest driveller of his age. But Bentley was not merely respectable in this particular: he reached the level of Dr Johnson, and was not far short of the powers which would have made him a philosopher.

The next great qualifications of Bentley were, ingenuity, and (in the original sense of that term) sagacity. In these he excelled all the children of men; and as a verbal critic will probably never be rivalled. On this point we remember an objection to Bentley, stated forcibly by Mr Coleridge; and it seemed, at the time, unanswerable; but a little reflection will disarm it. Mr Coleridge had been noticing the coarseness and obtuseness of Bentley's poetic sensibilities, as indicated by his wild and unfeeling corruptions of the text in Paradise Lost. Now, here, where our knowledge is perfectly equal to the task, we can all feel the deficiencies of Bentley: and Mr Coleridge argued, that a Grecian or Roman of taste, if restored to life, would, perhaps, have an equally keen sense of the ludicrous, in most of the emendations introduced by Bentley into the text of the ancient classics: a sense which, in these instances, is blunted or extinguished to us by our unfamiliar command over the two languages. But this plausible objection we have already answered in another place. The truth is, that the ancient poets are much more than the Christian poets within the province of unimaginative good sense. Much might be said, and many forcible illustrations given, to shew the distinction between the two cases; and that from a poet of the Miltonic order, there is no inference to a poet such as Lucan, whose connexions, transitions, and all the process of whose thinking, go on by links of the most intelligible and definite ingenuity; still less any inference to a Greek lexicographer like Suidas, or Hesychius, whose thoughts and notices proceed in the humblest category of mere common sense. Neither is it true, that, with regard to Milton, Bentley has always failed. Many of his suggestions are sound. And, where they are not, this does not always argue bluntness of feeling; but, perhaps, mere defect of knowledge. Thus, for example, he has chosen, as we remember, to correct the passage, into sacred top; for he argued, that the top of a mountain, exposed to the whole gaze of a surrounding country, must of all places be the least private or secret. But, had he happened to be familiar with mountains, though no higher than those of England, he would have understood that no secrecy is so complete, and so undisturbed by sound or gaze from below, as that of a mountain top such as Helvellyn, Great Gavel, or Blencathara. Here, therefore, he spoke from no defect of feeling, but from pure defect of knowledge. And, after all, many of his better suggestions on the text of Milton will give an English reader an adequate notion of the extraordinary ingenuity with which he corrected the ancient classics.

"That on the secret top

A third qualification of Bentley, for one province of criticism at least, was the remarkable accuracy of his ear. Not that he had a peculiarly fine sense for the rhythmus of verse, —else the divine structure of the Miltonic blank verse would have preserved numerous fine passages from his "slashing" proscription. But the independent beauty of sounds, and the harsh effect of a jingle of syllables, no critic ever felt more keenly than he; and hence, on many occasions, he either derived originally, or afterwards supported, his corrections.

This fineness of ear perhaps first drew his attention to Greek metre, which he cultivated with success, and in that department may be almost said to have broken the ground.

The Digamma, and its functions, remain also trophies of his exquisite sagacity in hunting backward, upon the dimmest traces, into the aboriginal condition of things. The evidences of this knowledge, however, which Heyne used and published to the world, are simply his early and crude notes on the margin of his Homer. But the systematic treatise, which he afterwards developed upon this foundation, was unknown to Heyne, and it is still unknown to the world. This fact, which is fully explained in Mr Sandford's late excellent edition of Thiersch's Greek Grammar (p. 312-13), has been entirely overlooked by Dr Monk.

The same quality of sagacity, or the power of investigating backward, (in the original sense of that metaphor,) through the corruptions of 2000 years, the primary form of the reading which lay buried beneath them, a faculty which in Bentley was in such excess, that it led him to regard every MS. as a sort of figurative Palimpsest, in which the early text had been overlaid by successive layers of alien matter, was the fruitful source both of the faults and the merits of his wonderful editions. We listen with some impatience to Dr Monk, when he falls in with the common rant on this subject, as though Bentley had injured a reader by his new readings. Those whose taste is really fine enough to be offended by them, (and we confess, that in a poet of such infinite delicacy as Horace, we ourselves are offended by the obtrusion of the new lections into the text,) are at liberty to leave them. If but here and there they improve the text, (and how little is that to say of them!) lucro ponatur. Besides, the received text, which Bentley displaced, was often as arbitrary as his own. Of this we have a pleasant example in the Greek Testament: that text which it was held sacrilege in Bentley to disturb, was in fact the text of Mr Stephens the printer, (possibly of a clever compositor,) who had thus unintentionally become a sort of conscience to the Protestant churches. It was no more, therefore, than a fair jest in Bentley, upon occasion of his own promised revision of the text,—“Gentlemen, in me behold your Pope.”

Dr Monk regrets that Bentley forsok Greek studies so often for Latin; so do we; but not upon Dr Monk's reason. It is not that Bentley was inferior, as a Latin scholar, to himself as a Grecian; it is, that Grecians, as good as he, are much rarer than Latinists of the same rank.

Something must be said of Bentley's style. His Latinity was assailed with petty malignity, in two set books, by Ker and Johnson. However, we see no justice in Dr Monk's way of disparaging their criticisms, as characteristic of schoolmasters. Slips are slips; faults are faults. Nor do we see how any distinction can be available between schoolmasters' Latin and the Latin of sublimer persons in silk aprons. The true distinction which would avail Bentley we take to be this. In writing Latin there are two distinct merits of style; the first lies in the mere choice of the separate words; the second, in the whole structure and mould of the sentence. The former is within the reach of a boy armed with a suitable dictionary, which distinguishes the gold and silver words, and obolizes the base Brummagem copper coinage. The other is the slow result of infinite practice and original tact. Few people ever attain it; few ever could attain it. Now, Bentley's defects were in the first accomplishment; and a stroke of the pen would everywhere have purified his lexis. But his great excellence was in the latter,—where faults, like faults in the first digestion, are incapable of remedy. No correction, short of total extirpation, will reach that case: blotting will not avail: “una litura potest.” His defect therefore is in a trifle; his success in the rarest of attainments. Bentley is one of those who think in Latin, and not among the poor frosty translators into Latin under an overruling tyranny of English idiom. The phrase puritas sermonis, used for puritas of style, illustrates Bentley's class of blemishes. We notice it, because Ker, Dr Monk, and Dr Parr, have all concurred in condemning it. Castitas might be substituted for puritas; as to sermonis, (pace virorum tantorum;) it admits of apology.

Bentley's English style was less meritorious: but it was sinewy, native, idiomatic, though coarse and homely. He took no pains with it:

where the words fell, there they lay. He would not stop to modulate a timeless sentence; and, like most great classical scholars of that day, he seemed to suppose that no modern language was capable of a better or worse. How much more nobly did the Roman scholars behave—Cicero, Varro, &c.—who, under every oppression of Greek models, still laboured to cultivate and adorn their own mother tongue! And even the example of Addison, whom Bentley so much admired, might have taught him another lesson; for though this great writer, unacquainted with the real powers of the English language,* had flippantly pronounced it a “brick” edifice, by comparison with the marble temples of the ancients, yet he did not the less take pains to polish and improve it. Brick, even, has its own peculiar capacities of better and worse. Bentley’s lawless pedantries of “putid” and “negoce,” though countenanced by equal filth in L’Estrange and many writers of the day, must, in any age, have been saluted with bursts of laughter; and his formal defence of the latter word was even more insufferably absurd than the barbarism which he justified. On the other hand, the word ignore, which he threw in the teeth of Mr Boyle, had been used by that gentleman’s uncle in many of his works; it is, in fact, Hibernian, which Bentley did not know; and in England is obsolete, except in the use of grand juries.—Being upon this subject, we must take the liberty of telling Dr Monk, that his own expressions of “overhaul,” for investigate, and “attackable,” are in the lowest style of colloquial slang. The expression of a “duty” being “due,” which is somewhere to be found in his book, is even worse.

As a theologian, Bentley stood in the same circumstances as the late Bishop of Llandaff. Both were irregularly built for that service; both drew off the eyes of the ill-natured, and compensated their deficiencies by general ability; both availed themselves of a fortunate opportunity for doing a popular service to Christianity, which set their names above the more fully accomplished divines of their day; both, carried, by a coup-de-main, the King’s professorship of divinity at Cambridge, which is the richest in the world; and, finally, both retreated from its duties.

In conclusion, we shall venture to pronounce Dr Bentley the greatest ~~man~~ amongst all scholars. In the complexion of his character, and the style of his powers, he resembled the elder Scaliger, having the same hardihood, energy, and elevation of mind. But Bentley had the advantage of earlier polish, and benefited by the advances of his age. We should pronounce him, also, the greatest of scholars, were it not that we remember Salmasius. Dr Parr was in the habit of comparing the Phalaris dissertation with that of Salmasius De Lingua Hellenistica. For our own parts, we have always compared it with the same writer’s Plinian Exercitationes. Both are among the miracles of human talent; but with this difference, that the Salmasian work is crowded with errors; whilst that of Bentley, in its final state, is absolutely without spot or blemish.

* It is a fact that Addison has never cited Shakspeare but once; even that was a passage which he had carried away from the theatre. Sir W. Temple knew of no Lord Bacon: Milton and Jeremy Taylor knew not of each other; and Addison had certainly never read Shakspeare.

ASKING AN OPINION.

"Now that the servants are all gone, the table drawn towards the window, and every thing comfortable about us, take a good bumper to the King, and let me hear the secret you spoke of before dinner."—"Why, really, my dear fellow, I have long wished for an opportunity to disburden myself to some kind and sensible friend—The King, God bless him!—and I know none I can so readily confide in as yourself. You must have seen, I am sure you must have remarked, something new about me of late."—"No, nothing, upon my honour, but the same dingy old coat which you have had, to my certain knowledge, about you these three years."—"Tush, don't interrupt me; I don't mean that. Have you not remarked a change in my manners?"—"Not the least; just as sheepish and ridiculous as ever."—"There now, Simson, you always interrupt me."—"Well, well, go on."

"Well then, you must know I have turned my attention seriously for the last two or three months to a certain point"—"Aha! Matrimony? Who is it, Billy?"—"Now, you promised not to interrupt me. In casting my eyes about"—"Ah, you had always an ugly trick of staring."—"There now again! upon my honour you're too bad—I think I have at last found a person who will suit me in every respect: our joint labours will produce something good, I hope, when we are fairly united, and the issue of our endeavours"—"What in the world are you talking about now? Do you mean your children? Why, a set of squinting little red-haired squalling devils they will be!"—"Children? No; what makes you think of children? The person, I tell you, I have chosen, is admirable in every point of view—respectability, interest, and talent."—"Who is it? Who is this wonderful paragon who is going to become one flesh with Mr Billy Tompkinson?"—"One flesh! Nonsense, man; what can you be talking of?"—"Stay, Billy; I'll describe your choice to you:—Fair hair, almost approaching to Love's proper hue, celestial rosy red; widish mouth—there is nothing equal to the mouth for expression; cock-nose; a delicate obliquity of vision; pointed chin; age, thirty-five; and the name of this Dulcinea is"—"Mr William Blackwood, 45, George's Street, Edinburgh; see, there's his address—I am just going to send off the letter. The fact is, my dear Simson, I have turned author; I have written a story or novel, or whatever you like to call it, and before sending it down to the North, I should like very much to have some rational and intelligent person's opinion on its merits."—"Thank you; you could not, I am sure, have applied to a more disinterested friend, or one who would be happier to give you any advice that may benefit your work. (Vain puppy! what can tempt such a silly fool as this to commence author?" Aside.)—"I thought so, Simson; and, if you'll give me no interruption, I shall be most happy to read you the first chapter or two."—"I interrupt you? It is a thing I never did in my life; take another glass before you begin, and depend on my not making the slightest noise—unless I should happen to snore"—Aside.—"Well then, here goes."

"It was on the evening of the 15th day of July, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-eight"—"Why, that's just like the beginning of a law paper; but I beg pardon—um."—"It was on the evening of the 15th day of July, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-eight, that a stranger was seen to enter the stable-yard of the Angel Inn, in the ancient town of Bury St Edmunds. The stranger, from the juvenility of his appearance, was evidently young. His hat was set perpendicularly on the top of his head, while his legs were carelessly suspended one on each side of the animal which he bestrode. Buttons of a bright yellow metal relieved the sombre shade of his dark-brown coat; and, after dismounting from his horse, he eyed it affectionately for a considerable length of time, and having ordered the hostler to give it a feed of corn, he proceeded into the house. The room into which he was shewn was a clean, well-furnished apartment, about sixteen feet by twelve. The fire-place was exactly opposite the door, and above the mantel-piece was suspended a black silhouette of a very fat gentleman, with a Roman nose; while, on the mantel-piece itself, was laid an elegant glass case, containing a representation of the Babes in the Wood, in wax. A small round table was placed in the middle of the room, supported on one leg, which divided, about a foot from the ground, into three separate claws. Another table, surmounted by a large paper teatray, was stationed close to the wall; and five rush-bottomed chairs, ranged regularly round the room, completed the furniture of the apartment. The stranger, depositing his hat on the table next him, sat down on one of the chairs we have previously mentioned, and seemed to sink into a reverie of not the most pleasing nature. 'Unhappy that I am!' he at last exclaimed, dashing his hand with energy upon his brow; 'whither can I turn? Nowhere have I a friend; my uncle opposes my inclinations; Mrs Jobson is severe and cruel to my Sophia; and she herself—wretch, wretch that I am, to have inflicted such woe on so gentle, so susceptible a heart!'—"Stop now, Billy; does your hero exclaim all this in the small room you so circumstantially described, sitting alone by himself, without even the waiter to sympathize in his griefs?"—"To be sure he does; waiter? nonsense; stop till you know who he is.—Saying these words, he rested his head on his hand, and betrayed by the frequency of his sighs, the sorrow that oppressed his breast. 'Yet why,' he exclaimed, starting up, 'why give way to dejection? why surrender hope because friends prove unpropitious? So long as my Sophia continues true, never, never, never shall I despair.' He rung the small bell upon the table with great vehemence, and having ordered a beef-steak and pickles to be ready for him at ten o'clock, he rushed with renewed confidence and spirit into the open air. On coming out into the street, he found the scene considerably altered. The grey light of twilight had now faded into night, and the moon was sailing high in heaven, attended by her galaxy of stars. The tower of the ruined monastery, which imparts such an air of grace and dignity to the town of Bury St Edmunds, was now no longer revealed to the eye by the mellowing rays of the declining sun, but rested in a deep shade, save where it was partially illuminated by the moonbeams as they struggled through the foliage of the trees. Still indulging in melancholy thoughts, the stranger directed his steps towards the old bridge, and sighed at the remembrance of ruined magnificence as he passed the Abbey wall. The wind by this time had risen, without his having perceived it. Dense masses of cloud had congregated in the sky, and occasionally obscured the moon for a moment, and then floated past her with their dark edges tipt with her silver light, like a rich shawl of the darkest cachemire wool, fringed, as we sometimes may remark, with bright and glittering colours. He had now approached very near the water, when he thought he heard steps close to him, and waited impatiently for a transient glimpse of moonlight to discover from whom the sounds proceeded. The steps seemed those of a heavy man, and occasionally he thought he detected the clank of spurs. He placed himself as much as possible beneath the shelter of the Abbey wall, and with considerable excitement waited for the gratification of his curiosity. A thin haze now passed over the moon, and revealed a figure on the opposite side of the water, but whether a male or female the light did not yet enable him to discover. Suddenly, however, he heard a violent splash in the river, and instinctively rushed forward. 'For God's sake, stop,' he exclaimed, 'whoever you are, for I solemnly assure you, you have fallen into the water!'—"Yare, yare, hold in your bellowing tackle," replied the object thus addressed; 'do you think I don't know water from land, especially when it's running into my boots.'—"The channel perchance is deep; take care of your steps, for if it takes you over the head, and you cannot swim, you will very probably be drowned.'

"The traveller, however, made no answer to this, and the deepest silence succeeded to the previous disturbance in the water. 'Is it possible?' thought the stranger; 'can the individual be already drowned? At least let me try to save him, if, indeed, it be not already too late.' Urged on by these generous feelings, he rushed into the stream; but, greatly to his surprise, he found that he arrived at the other side, without having waded nearly up to his knee; and what added to his astonishment was, that the person whom he had addressed was nowhere to be seen. He perambulated every part of the street, but could not anywhere find the object of his search; and what increased his disappointment was, that he began to have a strange idea of having somewhere or other heard the traveller's voice before. Bewildered, and in a state of considerable suspense, he was now warned by his appetite, and also by a fit of sneezing, which he considered was probably brought on by having wet his feet in his humane endeavours, that it was time for him to pursue his way back to the inn. He had not proceeded far, when he felt a heavy hand laid on his shoulder, and a voice muttered in his ear, 'Kites are abroad—beware.' He turned round to the speaker, and saw only a closely-muffled figure, but could not distinguish any features. 'Kites?' he said—'Thank God, I care nothing for any kites; they can do no harm to me.'—'The wolf attacks not the shepherd, yet he guards against it for the sake of his flock. Know you of no timid dove whom the kite may wound? Listen.' He applied his lips close to the stranger's ear, and whispered some words which had a surprising effect.—'To-night, say you?' said the stranger. 'Ay, to-night,' he replied; 'ere the grey dawn, you shall see me again. Farewell.' So saying, the mysterious figure disappeared into one of the smaller streets, and left the stranger to pursue his walk alone. His mind was now in a complete chaos. The information which his visitant had given him was of the most perplexing nature. Sometimes he was half inclined to doubt its truth; at others, he determined to forego his beef-steak and pickles, and proceed instantly to ascertain whether it was true or false. Amidst these conflicting feelings he arrived at his room. 'Supper's quite ready, sir,' said the waiter; 'what do you please to drink, sir?'—'Is your ale mild?'—'Yes, very good indeed, sir.'—'Then bring me a quart of ale.'—'Directly, sir.—A note for you, sir.'—'A note for me!—where? when? how did it come?'—'A sailor brought it a few minutes ago—Steak's quite hot, sir.'

"The stranger seized the note with avidity. It had no address, and was written in such a miserable hand, as to render it difficult to make out its meaning. He at last, however, deciphered it, and found it to contain these words:—'If you be he as comes from Bungay, and cares for S. M., you will not fail to be in St Mary's Churchyard at half past 11 to night. Yours, Tom Tyger.' 'To-night, in St Mary's Churchyard,' he muttered, inaudibly. 'The plot thickens round me on every side; first, the stranger who disappeared in so marvellous a manner near the bridge; then the person who addressed me on my way hither, and who seemed to know what I had believed hidden from every human being, except one; and now this letter, pointing so manifestly to my dear Sophia! In fact, I know not what to think.' In this state of uncertainty, he paid his respects to the viands before him, and had nearly succeeded in demolishing every particle of the solids, when the door opened, and a gentleman walked into the room. 'Servant, sir,' said the intruder; 'hopes I don't incommode you; but finding as the house be chokeful, takes the liberty to walk in here.'—'Sir,' said our hero, swallowing the last morsel with a gulp, 'I certainly hoped to be secure from interruption.'—'Don't mention it, I beg, my dear sir,' replied the new comer, taking off his great-coat, and throwing himself on a chair, 'don't say a word of it—I knew—indeed, I told the waiter, I was sure you would be delighted to have a companion.—Is the beer good, sir?' As he said these words, he laid hold of the pewter vessel containing the whole of our hero's quart, and, nodding familiarly, drained it to the very bottom. 'D——n, sir!' cried our hero, in a passion, 'what do you mean by that?'—'By what, my good friend; what makes you so angry?'—'Angry? who the devil can submit to be intruded on by a fellow who flops himself down without ceremony at another gentleman's table, and drinks up every drop of his beer?'

—‘Fellow!’ replied the other; ‘I’d have you for to know, sir, I’m no fellow of your’n. Confound you and your beer too—can’t you order another quart? If it’s too much for you, I shall be very happy to help you to finish it—so ring the bell, and order in a supply.’—‘Who are you, sir?’ roared our hero, in a prodigious rage—‘who are you, sir, who order me to ring bells, and send for more beer, which you would infallibly pour into your own throat?—Sir, I won’t stand it, and if you don’t take care, I’ll throw you neck and heels out of this window into the street.’—‘Now, listen,’ said the other, very composedly—‘In the first place, this window opens on the stable-yard, and not on the street. In the next place, look at my shoulders, and then at your own. In the third place, sit quietly down in your seat, for even wet feet, I see, can scarcely cool your courage.’—‘How do you know my feet are wet, sir?’ said our hero, still irate; ‘are you the person who—’—‘Ha—ha—ha! so your curiosity’s raised at last!—Come, come, let us have in some more beer—shall be good friends by and bye.’—‘Sir, you are one of the most extraordinarily impudent men I ever saw.’—‘You may say that, with your own ugly mouth.’—‘Ugly mouth? what the dev—’—‘There now, you’re in a rage again—always flying your kites—they’ll bring you on your back some day.’ These words were said with the most provoking calmness, and an emphasis was laid on the word ‘kites,’ which strongly arrested our hero’s attention. Resolved to gratify his curiosity, he sat down, and said, with as much softness as he could assume,—‘Sir, your conduct is undoubtedly very strange—you came in when I had just finished my beef-steak’—‘Gads!’ interrupted the intruder, ‘and I’ve kept you all this time from your cheese! Here, waiter! Waiter, bring this gentleman’s cheese,—and, waiter, bring in a couple of plates,—and, waiter, do you hear—fill up the gentleman’s pot with the same sort of beer—for I feel myself uncommonly thirsty again.’ Our hero checked himself as much as possible while his forced guest gave his orders, and resumed—‘You have made yourself quite at home in my apartment—you have persisted in forcing yourself into conversation with me, and in the course of it, you have twice made allusions to affairs which happened to me this night—Now, tell me who you are, and what possible interest you can take in me and my concerns.’—‘Now,’ said the other, ‘you speak like a man. I have certainly made myself at home in your apartment, and enjoyed a very pleasant conversation with you, although it was rather noisy on your part. Who I am, can be nothing to you; and as to being interested in you and your concerns, you and your concerns may go to the devil, for I don’t care a brass farthing for none on ye.—I’ll thank you for a piece of that there cheese.’

As he said this, he seized the cheese, and helped himself in no sparing manner, drawing near to him at the same time the replenished beer jug. Our hero sat eyeing him in a state of boiling impatience, wondering to what pitch of familiarity his strange companion would proceed. In perfect silence, meantime, that worthy gentleman continued his labours; and after having satisfied himself on the Glo’ster, he again, and with the same absorbing effects, applied the liquid to his lips. ‘Hah!’ he said, drawing in his breath, as he placed the now empty receptacle on the table, ‘how very refreshing it is! Don’t you find yourself greatly invigorated with the beer, sir?’—‘Sir, I never met with such treatment! Sir, you’re a robber, an uncivil fellow, a cheat! I declare, on the word of a thirsty man, I have not tasted a drop of beer to-night—thanks to your eternally seizing possession of the jug. What you mean by it, I don’t know; but you or I must leave this room immediately.’—‘Sorry you’re going indeed, sir,’ said the gentleman thus addressed. ‘Couldn’t you stay a few minutes longer? Well, if you must go, it can’t be help’d, I suppose. Don’t forget your bill for the supper, and two quarts of beer.’—‘Villain! rascal!’ cried our hero, seizing his heavy-handed whip. ‘Oho! is that your kindness to your supper companion? Here’s summ’at to match it,’ replied the other, presenting a pistol which he pulled from his breeches pocket. ‘But I see what you wish. I’ll give you a helping hand into St Mary’s Churchyard—

before your time too. Aha! touched ye there—I see. What! won't you give one flourish with your carrion thumper?"—"You utterly amaze me," replied our hero, resuming his seat. "How do you come to know that I wish to go to St Mary's Churchyard? Pray, tell me one thing—is your name Thomas Tyger?"—"No, sir; my name is no such thing. I know the difference, I assure you, 'tween a dog's name and a man's, though I can't say I see much difference 'tween a Bungay man and a fool."—"Your knowledge is amazing. You are a perfect riddle to me; a wonder, a rebus, a conundrum, an enigma!"—"Come—keep a civil tongue in your head, and call no names. I'm no more an enigma nor you are, nor no other trade you mention, but a plain horse-dealer at your service, with as pretty a bit o' blood i' the stable as ever eyes saw. She'll carry your weight to Bungay to-night 'tween twelve and three easy."—"Have you indeed such an animal?"—"Ay, that I have. Be that long-tailed bay pony yours with the star on's face?"—"Yes."—"Well, let's see if we can't make a swap on't. Brown Bess, my filly, comes out o' the Dutch thorough-bred mare Thicketts, by the famous Suffolk horse, Slowfoot. She'll walk ye grand, trot amazin'; and as for her gallop, la! love ye! ye never saw nothin' like it."

"As our hero had no great confidence in the speed of his own horse, and knew that he should probably require to go a great distance in as short a time as possible, he felt strongly inclined to accede to the worthy horse-dealer's proposal of an exchange. For this purpose, after a little preliminary conversation, they adjourned into the stable to settle the terms of the treaty. There we shall leave them for a while, and now proceed to give the reader some new information, and introduce him to some other personages in the following chapter."

"Bravo, bravo, Billy, upon my word! Why, Tompkinson will soon be as great a name as Scott. You draw characters in the most spirited manner. Your conversations are as natural as if they were reported by Gurney; and, in short, I drink this bumper to your health as a very great man."

"Nay now, Simson, do you really think it good; or are you only bamming me?"

"Bamming you! Impossible. But without troubling you to read any more, can you not just give me a slight idea of the issue of the story? Who is the stranger, for instance, who meets with all these adventures in Bury St Edmund's?"

"Why, he's the hero of the book—a Bungay man, in love with Sophia Malton, who is an heiress. Her mother, of course, objects to the marriage, and manœuvres to bestow her on Sir Gregory Grumps, who is rich, and old, and ridiculous. The horse-dealer acts a prominent part in the story. The horse he exchanges with Fitz Reginald Montresor's—that's the hero, you know—turns out to be stolen. At the end of the first volume, Fitz Reginald is tried for the theft; the evidence is unaccountably strong against him, and at last he is condemned to death, and left for execution. The heroine, meantime, uses all her influence to save him—escapes from her mother's house, and makes a pilgrimage on foot to intercede with Lord Tenterden, but without effect. She faints in the street, and is brought by the new police before Sir Richard Birnie."

"But do you give real names?"

"Oh, no. I call Lord Tenterden, Lord Denderten, and Sir Richard Birnie I call Sir Thundering Pompus. She is ordered to the treadmill as a vagrant, when, luckily, just when she is on her way to the house of correction, she is rescued by Sir Gregory Grumps. By him she is taken to a distant relation of her own, living in Grosvenor Square, which enables me to introduce a good deal of high life, Almack's, Vauxhall, the Opera, and the Surrey theatre; and this takes us to the end of the second volume. The third volume begins with a letter from Fitz Reginald, still in prison, but with his punishment changed to transportation for life. In it he bids Sophia farewell, and releases her from her engagements, and he proceeds in due course of time to the settlements at New South Wales. There, however, he luckily recognises an old and intimate friend in the Attorney-General, by whose interest his situation is made comparatively easy. The horse-dealer, in the meantime, goes on in his course of wickedness; and Sophia begins, however reluctantly, to comply with her family's wishes, in accepting Sir Gregory; but, just on the eve of acceding to their solicitations, a note is mysteriously put into her hands, offering, on payment of a considerable sum, to prove the innocence of her lover. This of course distracts her from her design; and she promises all that her secret informer desires. In this business she employs an attorney, who, contrary to the general practice among us novel-writers, is honest. He tracks out the author; discovers the horse-dealer to be the thief, and false witness on Fitz Reginald's trial; the villain at last confesses, and is executed; Sir Gregory is discarded; three or four cousins of Fitz Reginald's die, and enable him to step into his distant relations' titles and estates; and Sophia's mother can now have no objection to such a distinguished son-in-law as Lord Bungay; the good are rewarded, the bad are punished; and the third volume concludes with an affecting parting between the hero, now fully restored to his character, and his friend the Attorney-General in New South Wales, leaving his happiness, on his arrival in England, to the reader's imagination."

"Capital! and very original too. But there are a few things I should like to ask you. In the chapter you read me, you mention a Mrs Jobson; and, in the rest of the story, you always talk of Sophia's mother; now"—

"Why, they are one and the same; but in novels bad mothers are always married to second husbands, in order that the daughter may have a rational excuse for hating her step-father; for that, you know, is always allowed, without any breach of filial piety."

"Then, the hero,—you'll excuse me, you know, if I take the liberty of a friend,—the hero—doesn't he strike you to be a bit of a softish Johny Rawish sort of a fellow?—rather milk-and-watery? eh?"

"Oh, I don't know; I think he's just like other people's heroes; he's handsome, you know, and very I a gentleman; and I don't know what more any man has a right to expect."

"The horse-dealer, too, strikes me to be a little too clever—to act too many characters—to be, in short, made too much of."

"Now, Simson, I think you're getting a little captious; just look at other people's villains; mine is not a bit cleverer than any novel blackguard you'll point out. And as to acting too many characters, why look to Rob Roy, or Fencella, or Gangesse, or"—

"Now, my dear Tompkinson, that is too bad. Why, you whipper-snapper, do you compare your ridiculous, unnatural abortion of a thief and horse-dealer to any of Sir Walter's glorious imaginations? I never thought you so egregiously absurd before."

"O you did not, didn't ye? We shall see about being absurd. Mr Blackwood shall shew you whether I'm absurd or not."

"Why, do you think Mr Blackwood, or any man in his senses, will give you three farthings for such a rigmarole of nonsense?"

"We shall see, Mr Simson; we shall see, sir. I wish you good-night. Our friendship is over, sir; our friendship is over. The sooner you can pay me that trifle I lent you, the better. Good-night, sir."

So! there goes a fool. He'll get cool upon it in the morning; if not, I have lost a very good-natured, easy, silly, kind, accomodating sort of friend. What tempted the block-head to ask my opinion upon his book? If it should be accepted, published, puffed, there will be no bearing the puppy's vanity. Billy Tompkinson the author of a popular novel! The Author of Waverley ought to be pricked half dead with sharp-pointed quills, and duck'd, pro bono publico, in printer's ink. But if Billy gets paid for this—gets a swinging douceur on a second edition, and wallows in wealth from the exercise of his pen?—well, what then? Egad, I'll write a popular novel myself—that's all.

A HORRIBLE INSTANCE OF THE EFFECTS OF CLANSHIP.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

It was during the time of Cromwell's usurpation that the chiefs and chieftainships of the Highlands were most disputed, and held in the highest estimation. The efficiency of the clans had then been fairly proved; and every proprietor was valued according to the number of the vassals that called him lord, and rose at his command; and in proportion with these was his interest with the rulers of the realm.

It was at that time, however, that the following extraordinary circumstance occurred in a great northern family, now decayed; and therefore, for the sake of its numerous descendants and relatives, to whom the story is well known, I must alter the names in a small degree, but shall describe the scene so that it cannot be mistaken.

Castle-Garnet, as we shall call the ancient residence of the chief to whom I allude, stands near to the junction of two notable rivers in the north of Scotland, having tremendous mountains behind it towards the west, and a fine river and estuary towards the east. The castle overhangs the principal branch of the river, which appears here and there, through the ancient trees, foaming and toiling far below. It is a terrible but grand situation, and an emblem of the stormy age in which it was reared. Below it, at a short distance, a wooden bridge crossed the river at its narrowest roughest part; the precipitate banks on each side were at least twenty fathoms deep, so that a more tremendous passage cannot be conceived. This bridge was standing in my own remembrance; and, though in a very dilapidated state, I have crossed by it little more than thirty years ago. It was reared of oak, unhewn as it came from the forest; but some of the planks were of prodigious dimensions. They rested on the rocks at each side, and on a strange sort of scaffolding in the middle, that branched out from one row of beams. It had neither buttress nor balustrade; and yet troops of horse were wont to pass it.

But the ancient glory of Castle-Garnet had sunk to decay during the turbulent reigns of the Stuarts, whose policy it was to break the strength of the too powerful noblemen, chiefs, and barons, by the arms of one another. The ancient and head title of the family had passed away; but a stem of nobility still remained to the present chief in the more modern title of Lord Edirdale. He was, moreover, the sole remaining branch of the house; and, on his demise, the estate and remaining title, as well as the chieftainship of a powerful clan, descended to the man whom of all others he hated in this world—to the man who had deprived him of wealth and of honours; and who, at this very time, was endeavouring to undermine and ruin him.

This being a hard pill to swallow, Edirdale, by the advice of his chieftains and duniwhistles, married Julia, the flower of all the M'Kenzies, while both were yet very young. She was lovely as an angel, kind, virtuous, and compliant—the darling of her husband and his whole clan: but, alas, years came and passed by, and no child appeared to heir the estate of Glen-Garnet and lordship of Edirdale! What was to be done? The clan was all in commotion; and the chieftains ~~and~~ meeting after meeting, in all of which it was unanimously agreed, that it were better that ten of the chief ladies of the clan should perish, than that the whole clan itself should fall under the control of the hated Nagarre.

When the seventh year of the marriage had elapsed, a deputation of the chief men, headed by the veteran laird of Carnach, the next in power to the chief, waited upon Lord Edirdale, and boldly represented to him the absolute necessity of parting with his lady, either by divorce or death. He answered them with fury and disdain; and dared them ever to mention such a thing to him again. But old Carnach told him flatly, that without them he was nothing; and they were determined that not only his lady, but all the chief ladies of the clan should rather perish, than that the clan should become bond slaves to the hateful tyrant Nagarre. Edirdale hearing them assume this high and decisive tone, was obliged to succumb. He said it was a hard case; but if the Governor of the world saw meet that their ancient line should end in him, the decree could not be averted; and to endeavour to do so by a crime of such magnitude, would only bring a ten-fold curse upon them. He said, moreover, that his lady and he were both very young, scarcely yet at the prime of life; and there was every probability that she might yet be the mother of many children. But that, at all events, she was the jewel of his heart, and that he was determined much rather to part with life than part with her.

Carnach shook his dark grey locks, and said the last part of his speech was a very imprudent and cruel answer, and one which they did not deserve. But for that part of it regarding his lady's youth, it bore some show of reason; and on that score alone they would postpone compulsion for three years more to come, and then, for the sake of thousands, who looked up to him as their earthly father and only hope, it behoved him to part with her and take another; for on this the very existence of the clan and the name depended.

Three years present a long vista of existence to any one; and who knows what events may intervene to avert a dreaded catastrophe? Lord Edirdale accepted the conditions; and the cadets of the family returned to their homes in peace. The third year came, being the tenth from the chief's marriage; and still there was no appearance of a family! Julia remained courteous and beautiful as ever; and quite unconscious of any discontent or combination against her. But, alas, her doom was sealed! for the dissatisfaction of the clan now raged like a hurricane. Every voice, both male and female, denounced her removal; and several of the old women had entered into combinations to take her off by poison, for they had tried enchantment, and that would not do. The day arrived; and the chieftains of the clan once more came as a deputation, with old Carnach at their head. The chief knew not what to do: he had given his word to his clan; their part had been fulfilled; his behoved to be so. He had not a word to say! A splendid dinner was spread; such a dinner as never graced the halls of Castle-Garnet; and Lady Julia took her seat at the head of the table, shining in her silken tartan of the clan, and covered with gold and jewels. She was never so lovely, never so gay, never so perfectly bewitching. The young men were struck with admiration; and the old men were often seen to wipe the salt tear from their faded eyes. When she rose from the table and left them, there was not a dry eye in the company, nor had one a word to say; all sat silent, and gazed at one another. The chief seized that moment of feeling and deep impression, to implore his kinsmen for a farther reprieve. He said that he felt that to part with that jewel of his heart, and of all hearts, was out of his power; death and oblivion were nothing to it. Consent to her death he never would; and to divorce and banish her from his side, and from her country, would be to her still a worse death than the other; for that she lived but in his affections; and a great deal more he said of her courtesy, virtue, and beauty. The chieftains wept; but they made no reply; they entered into no stipulations; but parted from their lord as they met with him, in a state of reckless despair, resolved to be ruled by circumstances, and to take their own way.

Shortly after this, the perturbation of Lord Edirdale's mind threw him into a violent fever, which placed the whole clan in the last degree of consternation. They thought not then of shedding their lady's blood; for, in the event of their chief's demise, she was their only rallying point, and as all the cadets of the family now shewed only anxiety about him, he became impressed with the idea, that his Julia's beauty and virtue had subdued all hearts, as well as his own, and that his kinsmen were incapable of doing her any injury. This fond conceit working upon his fancy was the great mean of restoring him to health even after his life had been despaired of, so that, in the course of five months, he was almost quite well.

But strange news arrived from the south, and events were manifestly approaching that would again call out the clan to shew its influence in the balance of the power of the north. What was to be done? Something—any thing but subjection to Nagarre. Prophets, sibyls, and second-sighters were consulted, and a fearful doom read, but never thoroughly comprehended. A deputation once more waited upon the chief; but it was not to crave the dismissal of his lady, but only a solemn pilgrimage to the shrine of St Bothan on Christmas day, for that they had learned from a combination of predictions, that from such a pilgrimage alone, and the offering bequeathed, an heir was to arise to the house of Edirdale and Glen-Garnet, and that from the same predictions, they had ascertained that the chieftainship was never to be held by the cursed Nagarre.

Lord Edirdale was delighted. His beloved, his darling Julia, was now to be his own for ever. He invited all the cadets of the family and all their ladies to assist in the grand procession. But Christmas brought such a storm with it that scarcely a human being could peep out of doors. Though the weather at that season throughout the Highlands is generally of the most boisterous description, this winter exceeded them all. The snow fell to a great depth, and on Christmas Eve such a tempest of wind and rain commenced as the oldest inhabitant of that clime had never witnessed. The country became waist-deep of lopper, or half-melted snow, impassable torrents poured from every steep, and the rivers were flooded to an enormous degree, so that, in place of the whole gentlemen of the clan and their ladies, only four chieftains appeared at the castle, and these at the risk of their lives, all of whom declared that the procession must of necessity take place that very day, for that no other subsequent one to the end of the world would answer. A part of the way was perilous, but the distance to the shrine was short; so Julia, who was prepared for the event, with her usual sweet complaisance, wrapped herself up, and away they went on their gloomy pilgrimage. At their very first outset, they had to cross the river by Drochaid-maide (the Wooden Bridge, I suppose.) Never was such a scene witnessed in Scotland! The river was half-way up the linn, while the frail fabric tottered like a cradle. Lady Julia's resolution failed her—a terror came over her heart; but on seeing the resolute looks of all the rest, she surmounted it, and closing her eyes, she laid fast hold of her husband's arm, and they two led the way. Carnach and Barvoolin were next to them, and Auchinsheen and Nathair-nimhe last—the four nearest kinsmen of the chief—and just when at the crown of the bridge, Carnach and Barvoolin seized Lady Julia, and in one moment plunged her into the abyss below! The act was so sudden, that she had not time to utter a scream—nay, it was supposed, even to open her eyes—but descending like a swan in placid silence, she alighted on the middle of the surface of the fleet torrent. Such was its density and velocity, that iron, wood, or a feather, bore all the same weight there. The lady fell on her back in a half-sitting posture. She did not dip an inch, but went down top-water, swifter than an arrow out of a bow, and still in majestic silence; and at the turn of the rock, they lost sight of her for ever.

The moment that the lady was tossed from the Drochaid-maide, the two chieftains seized on her husband, and bore him back to the castle in their arms. He was raving mad; but he only knew that he had lost his lady, by what means he could not comprehend. At first he cursed Barvoolin, and swore that he saw his hand touching her—"Alas! I was only endeavouring to prevent the dizzy and distracted leap," said he; and before night they had persuaded him that the terror of the scene had produced a momentary madness, and that the lady Julia, in such a fit, had flung herself over.

Men on horseback were dispatched on the instant, some to the meeting of the waters, others towards the estuary, where all the boats were put in requisition; but in that unparalleled flood both of tide and fresh, the body of Lady Julia could not be found. This was a second grievous distress to her lord, but so anxious were the clansmen for his own preservation, that they would not suffer him to assist in the search. He had loved his lady with the deepest and purest affection of which the heart of man is capable; for his pathetic lamentations over her loss often affected the old devotees of clanship to the heart, and they began to repent them of the atrocious deed they had committed—particularly when, after representing to him that he lived and acted not for himself but for his clan, and that it now had pleased the Almighty to take home unto himself his own amiable and lamented lady, they proceeded to argue, that it therefore behoved him to take another wife without delay, in order to preserve the honours of their fathers from the dishonour of extinction, and themselves, their sons and daughters, from becoming the vassals and slaves of another house.

"These are indeed strong and powerful motives, my friends," said he. "I have always acknowledged it with deep regret, that Heaven should so have decreed it. But man has not these things in his power, and though there are some hearts that are so much swayed by self-interest that it becomes the motive of all their actions, and modulates all their feelings, such heart is not mine, and there are certain lengths it can go, and no farther. As soon as it forgets my Julia, I will then take to myself another wife; but when that may be, I have no mode of calculation. How can I woo another bride? I could only woo her as Julia—I could only exchange love or marriage vows and tokens with her as Julia—and when I awoke in the morning, and found that another than Julia had slept in my bosom, I should go distracted, and murder both her and myself. Believe me, my dear and brave kinsmen, when I assure you that the impression of my lost Julia is so deeply engraven on my heart, that it can take no other. Whenever I feel that possible, I will yield to your entreaties, but not till then."

This was a cutting speech to the old proud cadets of the chief, and made them scowl and shake the head with indignation. They had brought innocent blood on their heads, and made matters only worse. While Lady Julia was alive, there was some chance remaining for family heirs,—for, alas, she had been cut off before her twenty-ninth year; but now there was none. They now began to repent them heartily of what they had done.

While matters were in this taking, while the fate of Lady Julia was the sole topic of conversation up stairs at the castle, it was no less so down stairs; but there conviction appeared arrayed in different habiliments. The secrets and combinations of a clan are generally known through all its ramifications, except to the person combined against. It is a curious trait of this patriarchal race, that they only see, hear, feel, and act, in conformity with their chiefs; and in the present instance, Lady Julia, perhaps, was the only individual of the whole clan who did not know of the dissatisfaction that prevailed, and the danger she was in. The menials strongly suspected that their lady's death had been effected by force or stratagem; they were almost convinced of it, but their lord spake otherwise, and thought otherwise, and so did they. But there was one maid, named Ecky M'Kenzie, who had come with her lady from her own district, who was loud and vituperative against the chieftains, and Carnach in particular, as the leader of them; asserting boldly, that he had blinded her lord, and murdered her lady, because he himself was next of kin, and would succeed to be chief. The rest of the servants threatened her, and said she was lying; but they gathered round her, and gaped and stared upon one another, at her asseverations. "I know it all!" she would add; "I know all how that angelic creature has been hated, combined against, and murdered by your vile, servile race; and particularly by that old serpent Carnach, who has all this while acted as huntsman to a pack of bloodhounds. But vengeance will overtake him! There will a witness appear at the castle in a few days, that shall convict him to the satisfaction of the whole world, and I shall yet see him hanged from the castle wall, and lying in a mangied corpse at the foot of it."

These asseverations were so unreserved and violent, that Angus Sean Riaghlear went direct and told his lord every thing that Ecky had said; adding, that unless she was made to hold her tongue, she would bring disgrace on the whole clan. The chief judged for himself in that instance; happy had it been for him had he done so always! but nothing in the world was now of interest to him, save what related to his lost lady. So after dinner, while seven of the subordinate chieftains of the clan were present, he sent for Ecky M'Kenzie up stairs, saying to his friends—"There is a little pestilence of a maid here, who was kinswoman to my late lady, and who is spreading reports so injurious to me and to you, that I must call her to account for it.—Ecky M'Kenzie, come up here—stand before me, and look me in the face. What wicked and malicious reports are these that you have been spreading so broadly, and asserting so confidently before my domestics?"

"I have asserted nothing but the truth, my lord, and nothing that I will not stand to before all your friends, and before the very man whom I have accused."

"Ecky, you cannot assert any thing for truth of which you were not a witness; therefore, think before you speak. Say, then, how or by whose hands my late lady died?"

"By the hands of these two men who now sit on your right and left. In particular, by that old fiend Carnach, who has for years been hatching a plot against my dear lady's life, and who at last executed it in one moment of terror and confusion. Ay, and not unassisted by his truculent nephew, the redoubted Barvoolin. You may scowl! I care not! I know the foundation of your devilish plot. My lord does not. You knew that you would be chosen as the leaders of the clan, and they never would nor could be transferred to the house of Nagarre. Ay, well may you start, and well may the tears drop from your aged and remorseless eyes! You know I have told you the truth, and you are welcome to chew the cud upon it!"

"What is this that I see? Why do you weep, cousin?" said the chief to Carnach.

"It is, my lord, because, that in my researches into futurity, I discovered that the death of my Lady Julia was to bring about my own. I had forgot the prediction, unconscious how the one life could hang upon the other, until this wicked minx's bold and false assertion reminded me of it, and convinced me that she herself would be the cause of it. My lord, shall such falsehood and audacity pass unpunished under your own roof?"

"No, they shall not. But punishment must follow conviction, not antecede it.—Now, Ecky, they are all present who witnessed my lady's death. You did not. Whence, then, have you your information, that you have the audacity to accuse these my kinsmen to their face?"

"I have my information from another country; and my testimony is true, and theirs is false. They know well that I am telling the truth, and that they have blinded your too confiding heart by a farrago of lies."

"Hold, hold!" cried Carnach, springing to his feet, and laying his hand on his sword. "My lord, this is not to be borne. That infatuated girl must die!—must die this very night!"

"No, Carnach!" cried the elf, laughing and shaking her little white fist in his face—"No, Carnach! I must not die to-night, nor will I for your pleasure. I know that your proud and relentless heart will seek my life this night; but I will sleep far beyond the power of thy feeble arm, and have intelligence, too, with her whom that arm put down. And hear and note well what I say: If a witness from another country does not appear at this castle within three days from this date, who will bring full conviction to the consciences, and vengeance on the heads, of these guilty men, I give you liberty to cut me all in pieces, and feed the crows and the eagles with me! No, Carnach, I must not die to-night, for I must live to see you hanged, and lying a mangled corpse at the foot of the castle-wall, next to the river.—Good-night, sir; and remember I won't die to-night, but will live, out of spite to you!"

"What does the baggage mean?" said the guilty compeers, staring at one another. "She will give us liberty to cut her all in pieces, if a witness from another country does not arrive? What does the infernal little witch mean?"

"Her meaning is far beyond my comprehension," said Edirdale—"not so her assertion. Would to God, that I did not suspect it as bearing upon the truth! But it is easy for us to wait for three days, and see the issue of this strange witness's intelligence. After that, we shall bring the minx to judgment."

"She may have escaped beyond our power before that time," said Carnach. "The reptile that would sting should be crushed at once. My advice is, that she be put down this very night, or confined in the dungeon. I myself shall take in hand to be her jailor."

"I stand her security that she shall be forthcoming at the end of three days, dead or alive," said the chief.

There was no more to be said—not a word on that head; but on the girl's asseverations many words passed; and though the guiltiest of the associates pretended to hold the prediction light, it was manifest that it had annoyed them in no ordinary degree—Carnach in particular, whose countenance was quite changed; for, with all his cruelty and pride of clanship, he was the most superstitious of mortals; and the idea of an unearthly witness appearing against him almost put him beside himself. He had no intention of staying out the three days; and, after a sleepless night, which he groaned out beside his nephew Barvoolin, he prepared for his departure next morning. But his chief shamed him out of his resolution, conjuring, and even ordering, him to remain and await the issue of the extraordinary accusation.

That evening, it being the first after Ecky's examination, the chief, perceiving the depression of his kinsmen's spirits, and of old Carnach's in particular, who appeared quite nervous, plied his guests well with wine, which wrought variously on the various characters. Carnach was excited in an extraordinary manner: his looks were wild and unstable; his voice loud and intermittent; and whenever the late lady of the mansion was named, the tears rushed into his eyes. It was presumed that he meant to have made a full confession that night; and, if he had, his kinsmen would have saved him from destruction. But while the glass was running the ninth hour, they were interrupted by the arrival of an extraordinary guest.

It was, as I said, between the eighth and ninth hours of a dark January night. The storm, which raged for many days, had died away, and a still and awful calm succeeded. The sky was overspread with a pall of blackness. It was like a house of death after the last convulsion of nature; and the arrival of any guest at the castle, on such a night, and by such paths, was enough to strike the whole party with consternation. The din of conversation in the chief's dining apartment had reached its acme for the evening, when a gentle rap came to the grand entrance door, at which none but people of the highest quality presumed to enter. Sure there was something equivocal in that rap, for never was there another that made such an impression on the hearts and looks of so many bold and warlike men. The din of approaching ebriety was hushed in a moment. A blank and drumly dismay was imprinted on every countenance; and every eye, afraid of meeting with the gleams of terror from another, was fixed on the door. Light steps were heard approaching by the great staircase; they came close to the back of the door of the apartment, where they lingered for a space, and an awful pause it was for those within! The door was at length opened slowly and hesitatingly by Ecky McKenzie, wrapped in her winding-sheet, and a white napkin about her head, who fixed one deathlike look on Carnach, raising her forefinger at him, and then retired, introducing Lady Julia.

This is no falsehood—no illusion of the brain. It is a fact as well authenticated as any event in the annals of any family in Great Britain. Yes, at that moment Lady Julia entered, in the very robes in which she had been precipitated from the bridge. Her face was pale, and her looks severe—still she was the Lady Julia in every lineament. A shudder, and a smothered expression of horror, issued from the circle. Carnach in one moment rushed to the casement. It opened like a door on hinges. He pulled it open, and threw himself from it. Barvoolin followed his example; and so terror-stricken were the remainder, that not one perceived the desperate exit of the two chieftains, save the apparition itself, which uttered a piercing shriek at the disappearance of each. These yells astounded the amazed kinsmen still the more, laying all their faculties asleep in a torpid numbness. But their souls were soon aroused by new excitations: for the incidents, as they came rushing one on another, were all beyond human comprehension. The apparition fixed its eyes, as if glistening with tears, on one only of those present; then, spreading forth its arms, and throwing its face towards heaven, as if in agony, it exclaimed, "Is there no one here to receive me, or welcome me back to my own house?" The chief assumed the same posture, but had not power to move, till the apparition, flying to him with the swiftness of lightning, clasped him in her arms, laid her head upon his bosom, and wept. "God of my fathers! It is my Julia!—my own Julia, as I live and breathe!" It was the Lady Julia herself.

Sir, does not this require some explanation? It does.

On the side of the river opposite to the castle, and, consequently, in another country, according to the constant phrase in those parts, there lived a bold yeoman, called Mungo M'Craw, miller of Clach-mhuillean (I cannot help the alliteration, it is none of my making). But, in those days, mill-ponds and mill-leads, with their sluices and burnis, (to say nothing of mill-stones and mill-wheels,) were in a very rude and ineffective state. The great Christmas flood levelled Mungo M'Craw's weirs and sluices, as if no such things had existed; and, what was worse, as the dam came off at the acute angle of the river, the flood followed on in that straight-forward direction, threatening instant destruction to the whole mill-town. Mungo, with his son Quinten, his daughter Diana, and his old wife, yeleft Mustress M'Craw, were all busily engaged rearing a rampart of defence with wood, stones, divots, and loads of manure from the dung-hill.

"Ply, ply, you deil's buckies, or we shall all be overwhelmed and swept away from the world, with that roaring ocean of destruction that is coming down from the hills. Fie, Mustress M'Craw, ply your fingers; fill all the sacks of the mill with dung, and plunge them into the breach! Diana, you jade! You are not carrying above ten stone weight of dung at a time. Quinten, you dog, you cur, you great lazy puppy of a cù-èannich, do you not see that we shall all be carried away, unless you ply as never man plied before?"

"Father, is Montrose charged?"

"Malluchid! If I do not break your head for you! What want you with the gun just now?"

"Because here is a swan coming full sail upon us."

"Kem damh fealmar! run and bring Montrose. Him always charged and dry, and let us have a pluff at the swan, come of the mill what may. Life of my soul, if she be not a drowned lady, instead of a swan! Mustress M'Craw, and you young witch, Diana, where be your hearts and your souls now? Och, now, there will be such splashing and squalling, and crying, for women's hearts are all made of oladh-leighis; while I have lost my grand shot, and shall lose my mill, and all my goods and chattels. Alas, dear soul, a warmer couch would have fitted thee better to-day! Come, help me to carry her, you jades; what will howling and wringing your hands do? See, give me hold of all your four arms, and let her face hang down, that the muddy water may pour from her stomach like a mill-spout!"—

"No, no, Mungo, keep my face upward. I am little the worse. My head has never yet been below the water."

"As I shall be sworn before the day of shudgment, it is the great and good lady of the castle! God be with us, my dear and blessed madam! How did you come here?"

"Even as you see, Mungo. But put me in your warm bed, and I will tell you all; for I have had a dreadful voyage to your habitation, although the space of its duration could scarcely be extracted from the column of time. ~~It's scarcely~~ a moment since I lost hold of my husband's arms."

With many exclamations, and prayers, and tears, the lady Julia was put into the miller's bed, and nursed with all the care and affection of which the honest and kind-hearted miller and his family were capable. But her recovery was not so sudden as might have been expected; an undefinable terror oppressed her spirits, which, at first, it appeared impossible to remove, a terror of that which was past. And besides, there was one feeling of horror which was quite unbrookable, a worm that gnawed at her heart, and almost drank up the fountains of existence within her; it was a painful thrilling consciousness that her husband had pushed her over. She had not the heart nor the capability of mentioning this to any one, although it continued more and more to prey on her spirits and health; but she bound all the miller's family to secrecy, and resolved to remain in concealment with them, till the mystery of her intended death was cleared up.

She contrived at length to obtain a private interview with her humble confidant and god-child, Ecky M'Kenzie. The meeting was affecting, and full of the deepest interest; but I may not dwell on subsidiary matters. At that meeting, and by the conversation that occurred between Ecky and the old miller, Lady Julia's eyes were first opened to the horrid combination to take her off, and it brought such ease and comfort to her heart, that she recovered daily. She was now convinced of her husband's innocence, and that all the love he had ever expressed towards her was sincere; and, as she lived but in his affections, all other earthly concerns appeared to her as nothing. And so, to have farther proof against those immediately guilty, the time, manner, and mode of her return to the castle were all settled and arranged by the miller and maid, and the above narrated catastrophe was the result.

On going out with torches, the foremost of which was borne by Ecky M'Kenzie, they found old Car-nach lying at the bottom of the wall next to the river, with his neck broken, and his body otherwise grievously mangled; while Barvoolin was so much crushed and bruised by his fall, that he proved a lamiter for life.

When these two cruel and determined men threw the lady from the top of Drochaid-maide, she went down like a feather on the surface of the dense current, until hid from their sight by the acute angle at the mouth of the limn. From the angle on the other side, the miller's dam was drawn nearly in a straight line with the current, and his sluices having been all demolished, the lady was naturally borne right onward in that direction, straight into the old miller's arms; so that, from the time she quitted her lord's arm, and found herself in those of Mungo M'Craw, the miller of Clache-mhuillian, was not perhaps above the space of half a minute. But the far best of the story is yet to come. Whether it was the sleeping for a fortnight on a hard heather-bed, or the subsisting for that fortnight on black brochen, and brose and butter; or whether the ducking and corresponding fright wrought a happy change on Julia's constitution—which of these causes it was, or if all of them combined, I know not; but of this I am certain, that, within a twelvemonth from the date of her return to the castle, she gave birth to a comely daughter, and subsequently to two sons; and the descendants of that affectionate couple occupy a portion of their once extensive patrimonial possessions to this day.

THE QUENCHING OF THE TORCH.

"Look out for that sea, quarter-master!—Mind your starboard helm!—Ease her, man—ease her."

On it came rolling as high as the foreyard, and tumbled in over the bows, green, clear, and unbroken.

It filled the deep waist of the Torch in an instant, and as I rose half smothered in the midst of a jumble of men, pigs, hencoops, and spare spars,

I had nearly lost an eye by a floating boarding-pike that was lanced at me by the jaugle of the water. As for the boats on the booms, they had all gone to sea separately, and were bobbing at us in a squadron to leeward, the launch acting as commodore, with a crew of a dozen sheep, whose bleating as she rose on the crest of a wave came back upon us, faintly blending with the hoarse roaring of the storm, and seeming to cry, "No more muton for you, my boys!"

At length the lee ports were forced out—the pumps promptly rigged and manned—buckets slung and at work down the hatchways; and although we had narrowly escaped being swamped, and it continued to blow hard, with a heavy sea, the men, confident in the qualities of the ship, worked with glee, shaking their feathers, and quizzing each other. But anon a sudden and appalling change came over the sea and the sky, that made the stoutest amongst us quail and draw his breath thick. The firmament darkened—the horizon seemed to contract—the sea became black as ink—the wind fell to a dead calm—the teeming clouds descended and filled the murky arch of heaven with their whirling masses, until they appeared to touch our mast-heads, but there was neither lightning nor rain, not one glancing flash, not one refreshing drop—the windows of the sky had been sealed up by Him who had said to the storm, "Peace, be still."

During this deathlike pause, infinitely more awful than the heaviest gale, every sound on board, the voices of the men, even the creaking of the bulkheads, was heard with startling distinctness; and the water-logged brig, having no wind to steady her, laboured so heavily in the trough of the sea, that we expected her mast to go overboard every moment.

"Do you see and hear that, sir?" said Lieutenant Treenail to the Captain. We all looked eagerly forth in the direction indicated. There was a white line in fearful contrast with the clouds and the rest of the ocean, gleaming on the extreme verge of the horizon—it grew broader—a low increasing growl was heard—a thick blinding mist came driving up a-stern of us, whose small drops pierced into the skin like sharp hail—"Is it rain?"—"No, no—salt, salt." And now the fierce Spirit of the Hurricane himself, the sea Azrael, in storm and in darkness, came thundering on with stunning violence, tearing off the snowy scalps of the tortured billows, and with tremendous and sheer force, crushing down beneath his chariot wheels their mountainous and howling ridges into one level plain of foaming water. Our chainplates, strong fastenings, and clenched bolts, drew like pliant wires, shrouds and stays were torn away like the summer gossamer, and our masts and spars, crackling before his fury like dry reeds in autumn, were blown clean out of the ship, over her bows, into the sea.

Had we shewn a shred of the strongest sail in the vessel, it would have been blown out of the bolt-rope in an instant; we had, therefore, to get her before the wind, by crossing a spar on the stump of the foremast, with four men at the wheel, one watch at the pumps, and the other clearing the wreck. But our spirits were soon dashed, when the old carpenter, one of the coolest and bravest men in the ship, rose through the fore-hatch, pale as a ghost, with his white hairs streaming straight out in the wind. He did not speak to any of us, but clambered aft, towards the capstan, to which the Captain had lashed himself. "The water is rushing in forward like a mill-stream, sir; we have either started a but, or the wreck of the foremast has gone through her bows, for she is fast settling down by the head."—"Get the boatswain to fother a sail then, man, and try it over the leak, but don't alarm the people, Mr Kelson." The brig was, indeed, rapidly losing her buoyancy, and when the next heavy sea rose a-head of us, she gave a drunken sickening lurch, and pitched right into it, groaning and trembling in every plank, like a guilty and condemned thing in the prospect of impending punishment.

"Stand by, to heave the guns overboard." Too late, too late—Oh God, that cry!—I was stunned and drowning, a chaos of wreck was beneath me, and around me, and above me, and blue agonized ~~gaping~~ faces, and struggling arms, and colourless clutching hands, and despairing yells for help, where help was impossible; when I felt a sharp bite on the neck, and breathed again. My Newfoundland dog, Sneezzer, had snatched at me, and dragged me out of the eddy of the sinking vessel.

For life, for dear life, nearly suffocated amidst the hissing spray, we reached the cutter, the dog and his helpless master.

For three miserable days, I had been exposed, half naked and bare-headed, in an open boat, without water, or food, or shade. The third fierce cloudless West Indian noon was long passed, and once more the dry burning sun sunk in the West, like a red-hot shield of iron. In my horrible extremity, I imprecated the wrath of Heaven on my defenceless head, and shaking my clenched hands against the brazen sky, I called aloud on the Almighty, "Oh, let me never see him rise again!" I glared on the noble dog, as he lay dying at the bottom of the boat; madness seized me, I tore his throat with my teeth, not for food, but that I might drink his hot blood—it flowed, and vampire-like I would have gorged myself, but as he turned his dull, grey, glazing eye on me, the pulses of my heart stopped, and I fell senseless.

When my recollection returned, I was stretched on some fresh plantain leaves, in a low smoky hut, with my faithful dog lying beside me, whining and licking my hands and face. On the rude joists that bound the rafters of the roof together, rested a light canoe with its paddles, and over against me, on the wall, hung some Indian fishing implements, and a long barrelled Spanish gun. Underneath lay a corpse, wrapped in a boat-sail, on which was clumsily written, with charcoal,—“The body of John Deadeye, Esq. late Commander of his Britannic Majesty’s Sloop, Torch.”

There was a fire on the floor, at which Lieutenant Splinter, in his shirt and trowsers, drenched, unshorn, and deathlike, was roasting a joint of meat, whilst a dwarfish Indian, stark naked, sat opposite to him, squatting on his haunches more like a large bull-frog than a man, and fanning the flame with a palm leaf. In the dark corner of the hut half a dozen miserable sheep shrunk huddled together. Through the open door I saw the stars in the deep blue heaven, and the cold beams of the newly risen moon were dancing in a long flickering wake of silver light, on the ever-heaving bosom of the ocean, whilst, the melancholy murmur of the surf breaking on the shore, came booming the gentle night wind. I had been nourished during my delirium; for the fierceness of my sufferings was assuaged, and I was comparatively strong, when I anxiously enquired of the Lieutenant the fate of our shipmates.

“All gone down in the old Torch; and had it not been for the launch and our four-footed friends there, I should not have been here to have told it; but raw mutton, with the wool on, is not a mess to thrive on, Tom. All that the sharks have left of the Captain and five seamen came ashore last night. I have buried the poor fellows on the beach where they lay as well as I could, with an ear-blade for a shovel, and the bronze ornament there (pointing to the Indian) for an assistant.”

Here he looked towards the body; and the honest fellow’s voice shook as he continued.

“But seeing you were alive, I thought if you did recover, it would be gratifying to both of us, after having weathered it so long with him through gale and sunshine, to lay the kind-hearted old man’s head on its everlasting pillow as decently as our forlorn condition permitted.”

As the Lieutenant spoke, Sneezer seemed to think his watch was up, and drew off towards the fire. Clung and famished, the poor brute could no longer resist the temptation, but making a desperate snatch at the joint, bolted through the door with it, hotly pursued by the Bull-frog.

“Drop the leg of mutton, Sneezer,” roared the Lieutenant, “drop the mutton—drop it, sir, drop it, drop it!”—

THE PRESENT CRISIS.

THERE is a tide in the affairs of nations, as well as of individuals, and the present tide is that which sweeps on towards the uncertain shore of revolution. The madness, or conviction, or sentiment, or whatever be its right name, is as general as that of the Crusades; and from the Mediterranean to the Baltic, the people are in a ferment. We are far from looking upon this as a circumstance of unmingled evil; for, independently of the good which will arise in some places, from the changes which the people will enforce, and have the prudence to be satisfied with, and then set about minding their own business again, it is a good thing that the nations of the earth should now and then be shaken up, and the loftier virtues and more powerful feelings of men be put in action. For this cause, Lord Bacon goes so far as to recommend war, as a wholesome exercise for kingdoms; and he was not a man to judge lightly, or without a due regard to an enlarged humanity. Mankind, like water, grows putrid by stagnation. The nature of man is not pure enough for undisturbed repose; it requires tempests and hurricanes to cleanse it thoroughly. The unagitated, unwholesome mass, ere long, heaves with internal corruption and concealed abomination. Nations, like the people before the flood, become "corrupt before God;" but a more merciful dispensation, instead of drowning the world, gives us wars and revolutions; and they operate as a purge, exhausting for the moment, but sanative; and the kingdoms grow strong again, till a recurrence of the disease shall require a repetition of the remedy. All this is not very new perhaps; but it is worth while to dwell a little upon these reflections, in order to dissipate those of a more gloomy nature, which the present angry aspect of the political world is so apt to occasion.

The present crisis is one which no man, who reflects at all, can look upon without very lively interest; for, in no period of modern times, has the settled order of things appeared to be so extensively under the influence of desire for change. If we call that "desire of change," which others may choose to designate as the "glorious out-breaking of a spirit of freedom," we desire to be understood as not wishing in the least to undervalue the cause of rational liberty, or the efforts made in its favour, by those who suffer from the want of it; but we must be excused from indulging in a notion so extravagant, as that which refers all the disturbance abroad, and all the sympathy, or affected sympathy, with it at home, to enlightened and honest views of political liberty. A great part of what has been done, has had its foundation in nothing better than what we must call, for want of another word as suitable to our purpose, mere mobbism. There are well-behaved mobs, and ill-behaved mobs; and there are mobs well-managed, and mobs ill-managed; and, again, there are mobs well-opposed, and mobs ill-opposed. The Paris mob was well-behaved, well-managed, and ill-opposed. The Brussels mob was ill-behaved, ill-managed, and well-opposed. The Brunswick mob was ill—every thing. That they had all good reason to be discontented, and to desire a better administration of abused power, is certain. That they have done some good by the decisive way in which their dissatisfaction was manifested, is probable; but that they did exactly the very thing which was right, and in the best manner, is certainly not true; nor can it be doubted, as we conceive, by any one who is firmly attached to the principles of our constitution, that the undivided and extravagant admiration of these continental proceedings, which has been exhibited here, is neither consistent with reason, nor a due regard to our own tranquillity. It happens fortunately for us, that we have within our country an active public spirit, ever at work, which secures us from the necessity of these sudden and violent ebullitions, that we have alluded to as necessary to the political health of kingdoms under different and less fortunate circumstances. Our Parliamentary debates, if very unargumentative talking may deserve that name, and our newspapers and magazines, notwithstanding the adverse influence of a Whig Attorney-general, are quite sufficient safety-valves, to let off the ill-humour of the people; and our institutions, however slow and expensive in their working, and although clogged with abuses in their details, are yet of certain efficacy to secure us from such perversion of authority as would call for the forcible intermeddling of the common people; or would justify an ostentatious applause of such intermeddling elsewhere. The common people here, as everywhere else, will catch up what appears on the surface, without seeking to go deeper, and if they find the forcible interference of their brethren on the continent the theme of public and inflated panegyric, they will draw their conclusions at once, and without stopping to make nice enquiries as to the circumstances of the case, in which this much-lauded interference took place.

It is not like Englishmen, it is not consistent with common sense, to rush headlong into this public admiration of that about which we know so little, except that from the rapidity of the change, (we refer to the affairs of France,) it is almost impossible that the new system of government, struck off at the first heat, can be permanent. It is not in the nature of things, that rapidity of creation, and the principles of long duration, should co-exist. It is not so in animal or vegetable organization; nor has political organization, which is the work of man, any advantage over the products of nature in this respect. That which is to endure, must be done soberly, and thoughtfully, and deliberately; but that which is done with the rapidity of the shifting of a scene, is likely as soon to give place to another. The French did us the honour very frequently in their late brief proceedings, to refer to our Revolution as a model, as well as an example; it would have been well if they not only recollected what we did, but the way in which it was done. From the 22d of January to the 13th of February, was William kept waiting in silent and sullen expectation at St James's, while the Houses debated, and re-debated and amended, and conferred, and sifted every argument that patience and ingenuity could suggest, upon the momentous matter of forming a new government. At the first view, it may seem to be a frivolous matter of debate in the British House of Peers, whether "abdicated" or "deserted" were the preferable term to apply to the then state of the throne, or whether an abdicated throne was to be considered "vacant;" but it is no light matter to consider the effect of this nice examination, and slow discussion, and the solid and permanent character imparted to arrangements made under such circumstances. A century and a half have nearly passed away, and these arrangements have remained in force, except in so far as the "breaking-in bill" of 1829 may have affected them. Who will venture to prognosticate a title of the duration to the new government of France? But it is the very probability of further change in France, and further revolutions in other continental governments, which makes the present posture of affairs so critical, and renders it expedient that we should look to ourselves, lest the contagion of example, the insidious movements of the designing, and the imprudence of the unwary, shall precipitate us into domestic troubles of a more formidable nature than we have yet had to encounter, and our safety be endangered through the omission of a cautious preventive policy. In the peculiar circumstances of this country, impoverished by a mistaken system of commercial policy, embarrassed by the contraction of the circulating medium, and the consequent increase of the pressure of taxation,—dissatisfied with a cabinet which has but slender reputation for ability, and none at all for political integrity,—and harassed by the distress of an unemployed population, it is easy to see how soon excuses might be found for acts that would be fraught with public mischief, and how much it behoves us rather to look attentively at our own condition, than to trouble ourselves solely in watching the affairs of others. As it is, we are not without tokens that the spirit which is abroad, has in some measure affected us. The result of the late elections has shewn, in some places, how the ancient fashion of the country is losing its strength. We have seen political power and importance discovered from property, and thousands of people fill, with their approving breath, the political sails of those who have no ballast to keep them steady, no cargo of their own on board to make them anxious, above all things, for the vessel's security. An unsafe description of education—a kind of bastard learning, a species of knowledge which gives power, without a guide for the use of that power, towards attaining their own substantial happiness, has got among the people, and altered their character. "Trumpet books of mathematics and physics" have, along with the knowledge they conveyed, filled people with dogmatical conceit, have led to disputatious habits, and have induced them to try moral and political questions by rules and methods wholly inapplicable to them; and every feeling inimical to the established order of society, which their enquiries, under these circumstances, lead them to, is very naturally sharpened and aggravated by the pinching poverty to which far too many of them are subjected.

Whatever success may attend the efforts of the modern "schoolmaster," in the way of promoting discontent, it is as nothing in this country, compared with the influence of an unsatisfied craving after the decent comforts of life. Whoever, therefore, loves the institutions of his country, and sincerely desires that they may survive unhurt the revolutionary contagion that prevails in the political atmosphere of Europe, let him study how the common people may be made more comfortable. Let it be shewn by all those who have property, and have a mind to keep it, that they are not unmindful of the condition of those who have none; and let them rather endeavour to stop with food, than with unimproving argument, the mouths of those who complain, that they are willing to work, but can get no bread. Thanks to the schoolmaster, many of the common people can see very plainly, that the justice and expediency of a lazy, luxurious, good-for-nothing man, monopolizing to his own share the profits of twenty thousand acres of land, cannot be demonstrated with the same certainty, as the fact of all the angles of a triangle being equal to two right angles. Their education has not gone far enough to teach them that they but mislead themselves in seeking for strict demonstration of moral or political propositions, and they will cling with unconquerable pertinacity to the reductio ad absurdum which they consider they have brought the question to, through the aid of "demonstration," and an unsatisfied appetite for dinner. But let the dinner be provided, and the argument loses nearly all its point. Abstinence is said to quicken the reasoning powers, and the observation applies as well to those who reason themselves from defective premises into wrong conclusions, as to others; if it be possible then, let bad reasoning be counteracted by good living. We do not mean to argue that comfortable subsistence is all in all, or that men should barter their liberty for bread; but if it be true, as seems to be almost universally admitted, that a sour and sullen spirit of insubordination is gaining fearful ground among the people, the first thing needful, in order to bring them to a better spirit, and to secure a considerate hearing for whatever may be addressed to them, in the way of good advice, will be to relieve their abject penury, or at the least, to shew an honest and anxious desire to do so.

Parliament will very soon meet, under circumstances of a very peculiar and trying nature; and it will require no slight effort on its part to command the respect and confidence of the people. Never was a British Parliament more narrowly watched than it will be. It is not merely that it is a new Parliament, under a new sovereign, and that the affairs of government generally over the world are in an unusual state of disturbance: but the Parliament has a character to make with the people. The contempt which the people entertained for the last Parliament was freely spoken of within the walls of the Houses. It was felt that Parliament was deficient in sympathy with the people, or, at all events, destitute of the energy and ability necessary to give effect to that sympathy, if it did exist; and the eagerness with which the public look for redeeming proceedings on the part of the new Parliament is unparalleled in its intensity and universality. It is, indeed, come to this: that, with the present temper and in the present circumstances of the people of this country, the very existence of the Parliament as at present constituted, and the permanence of the power interwoven with its present constitution, depends upon a revival of its energy, and a display of such qualities as may satisfy a thinking and examining people that it is worthy to have the management of their affairs. We earnestly hope, therefore, that no attempt will be made, as at the commencement of the last session, to escape from the question of the common people's condition; that Parliament will not hesitate to grapple with the truth, and discuss it manfully and fearlessly; and thus shew itself worthy of the people's confidence. The best way to prevent revolution, is to shew the people that they have nothing to gain by it; and that those whom they permit to govern them, take as good care of them as any others whom they could choose. It is a mistake to suppose that concession is the best mode of imbuing the people with this persuasion. It is natural to detest the power that acts despotically without assigning a reason; but it is as natural to despise the power that concedes without a reason shewn. Members of Parliament are not the mere delegates of the people, but persons chosen to judge for them, and to rule them with wholesome laws. If members shew themselves worthy of the power, as well as capable of the duties, intrusted to them, by manly and independent, as well as earnest and active, endeavours for the welfare of their constituents, the people will find no fault with them for a want of time-subservieny to the clamour of mobs. Much as has been said of the wasting away of respect for Parliament, in consequence of its not having kept pace with the intellectual improvement of the people at large, we are inclined to think that it has lost much more of its influence, and of the sympathy which the people used to feel with it, through an affectation of political science, which, indulging itself in cold generalities and abstract propositions, seems to forget the present necessities of the people, and turn an unwilling, if not a contemptuous ear to their complaints. It is hardly possible to conceive any thing more irritating to those who are smarting under a practical evil, than to be answered when they complain, by an argument, shewing that, on general principles, it is quite right that they should so suffer. There is an assumption of superior philosophy, which costs the philosophers nothing, combined with the coolness that it shews towards another's distress, which it is not in human nature to bear with patience. It is impossible for the sufferer not to feel a desire to bring down his kind adviser to the level of his own distress, that he might then see how his philosophy would console him in hopeless hunger. Besides the danger from irritated feelings, and the violence which they may lead to, there is another, in dealing with these abstract propositions, because, if proceeded with, they may lead to conclusions subversive of the whole order of society. If the security of all property only depended upon the first principles which justify the existence of exclusive property, how long would estates remain as they are? In France we find the workmen making a stand against machinery, and from the state of the population in England, as compared with the demand for labour, it is not at all improbable that this may soon become a very vital question with ourselves. Now, without being in the least disposed to under-rate the immense value of the power derived from machinery, and fully satisfied that to the aid derived from this power are we indebted for the high rank which we hold among the nations of the world, we would yet warn members of Parliament, and others, against supposing that the complaints of those who suffer from the use of machinery are unenlightened and absurd, and worthy only of derision. Those who appear to speak with a learned contempt of such complaints, meet them by treating the objection to machinery as an abstract and unconditional one, and would have us believe, that if in any case it be wrong to substitute machinery for manual labour, it must follow from the same "principle," that it is wrong to substitute forks for fingers. This may seem all very fine and scientific, but the question is not one of mathematics, but touching the interests of society, for which one thing is good to-day, and another to-morrow, according to circumstances. A circle is a circle, whether it be the circle of the earth, or the circle of a sixpence, and whatever may be predicated of a circle, is equally true with respect to the one or the other; but there are no such general and unalterable rules with respect to society, and what is politically useful in one state of a population may be pernicious in another. If instead of going backward in the view of the use of machinery, we carry it forward, and assume that all the work now done by manual labour may be done by machinery, this, according to the absolute principle of its utility, would be a great advantage. But what would then become of all those who live by the remuneration of labour, and who have no property? Would those who have property, and who avail themselves of the cheapness of machinery, share it with the people whose labour was no longer of any value as an equivalent? They would not;—but starvation would grow desperate, the rights of property would be violated, and a social chaos would ensue. The use of machinery, therefore, concurrently with the present system of the right of property, may be carried to such an excess, as would lead to the destruction of the latter. It is a grave and critical question, to consider how near we have come to the point where one of these must yield. If society were in that state, that every advantage obtained by the society was shared by all the individuals who compose it, then indeed, so long as pain and labour are associated with one another, whatever, and how much soever, could be done to abridge the necessity of manual labour, would be an indisputable advantage; but while property continues in the hands of a few, and the mass of the people have nothing but their labour to offer in exchange for so much of it as their daily wants require, it is easy to see how the depression of the value of that labour may be carried so far as to compel them to resort to the law of nature, and violate the regulations of a society whose advantages they have no means of sharing in.

We have ventured to say so much upon this subject, because in the present period, when revolutions and new governments occupy a portion of almost every one's thoughts, the first principle of the social compact must necessarily come into frequent discussion, and the new powers of mankind be taken as an element in such considerations. When we consider how wonderfully the powers of production have been altered and improved, and how generally throughout the world we find suffering following from abundance, and perceive a want of demand equal to the powers of supply, it seems to be almost time that some serious alteration in the system of society should take place, so as to give mankind at large a fairer share of the advantages which our great improvements are capable of affording.

But whatever is done, we trust that in England it will be courageously, and soberly, and discreetly, after the manner of our fathers. Above all things, we hate a melodramatic air in politics; and a "coup d'état" is our special aversion. England cannot stop the progress of events; and if the world is changing, she must change with it; yet still, we venture to predict, maintaining her ancient character for boldness, regulated by calm and reflecting prudence.

THE TOWER OF ERCELDOUNE.

BY DELTA.

Quilum spak Thomas
 O Ersyldoune, that sayd in Derne,
 'Thare suld meit stalwartly, starke, and sterne
 He sayd it in his prophecy;
 But how he wyst it was ferly.

WYNTON'S Cronykul.

THERE is a stillness on the night,
 Glimmers the ghastly moonshine white
 On Learmont woods, and Leader's streams,
 Till Earth looks like a land of dreams;
 Upon me, in this eerie hush,
 A thousand wild emotions rush,
 As gazing spell-bound o'er the scene
 Beside thy haunted walls I lean,
 Grey Erceldoune, and feel the past
 Its charmed mantle o'er me cast;
 Visions and thoughts, unknown by day,
 Bear o'er the fancy wizard sway,
 And all the strange traditions told
 Of him who sojourn'd here of old.

What stirs within thee? 'Tis the owl
 Nursing amid thy chambers foul
 Her impish brood; the nettles rank
 Are seeding on thy wild-flower bank,
 And all around thee speaks the sway
 Of desolation and decay.—
 In outlines dark the shadows fall
 Of each grotesque and crumbling wall,
 Extinguish'd long hath been the strife
 Within thy courts of human life;
 Thou scowlest like a spectre vast
 Of silent generations past;
 And all about thee wears a gloom
 Of something sterner than the tomb.

Backward my spirit to the sway
 Of shadowy Eld is led away,
 When underneath thine ample dome,
 Thomas the Rhymer made his home,
 The wondrous Poet-seer, whose name,
 Still floating on the breath of fame,
 Hath overpast five hundred years,
 And fresh as yesterday appears.—
 Secluded here, in chamber lone,
 Often the light of genius shone
 Upon his pictured page, which told
 Of Tristrem brave, and fair Isolde,
 And how their faith was sorely tried,
 And how they would not move, but died
 Together, and the fatal stroke,
 Which still'd one heart, the other broke.—
 And here, on midnight-couch reclined,
 Harken'd his gifted ear the wind
 Of dark Futurity, as on Through shadowy ages swept the tone,
 A mystic voice, whose murmurs told
 The acts of ages yet unroll'd;
 While Leader sang a low, wild tune,
 And redly set the waning moon,

Amid the west's pavilion grim,
O'er Soltra's mountains vast and dim.

Metinks the vision'd Bard I see
Beneath the mystic Eildon tree ;
His mantle dark, his bosom bare,
His floating eyes, and flowing hair,
Piercing the shadowy depths of time,
And weaving the prophetic rhyme ;
Beings around him that had birth
Neither in heaven, nor yet on earth ;
And at his feet the broken law
Of Nature, through whose night he saw.

The Eildon tree bath pass'd away
By natural process of decay ;
We search around and see it not—
Yet still a grey stone marks the spot
Where erst its boughs, with quivering fear,
O'erarch'd the sprite-attended seer ;
And still the Goblin burn steals round
The purple heath, with lonely sound,
As when its waters still'd their noise
To listen to the silver voice,
Which sang, in wild prophetic strains,
Of Scotland's perils and her pains—
Of dire defeat on Flodden Hill—
Of Pinkyn-Cleuch's blood-crimson'd rill—
Of coming woes, of coming wars—
Of endless battles, broils, and jars ;
Till France's queen should bear a son,
To make two rival nations one ;
And many a wound of many a field
Of blood, in Bruce's blood be heal'd.

Where gain'd the man this wondrous dower
Of song and super-human power ?
Tradition answers—Elfland's Queen
Beheld the boy-bard on the green,
Nursing pure thoughts and feelings high
With poesy's abstracted eye,
Bewitch'd him with her sibyl charms,
Her tempting lips, and wreathing arms,
And lured him from the earth away
Into the light of milder day.
They pass'd through deserts wide and wild,
Whence living things were far exiled ;
Shadows, and clouds, and silence drear,
And shapes and images of fear ;
Until they reach'd the land where run
Rivers of blood, and shines no sun
By day—no moon, no star by night—
But glows a fair, a fadeless light ;
The realm of Faery.—

There he dwelt,
Till seven sweet years had o'er him steal'd,
A long deep rapturous trance, 'mid bowers
O'er-blossom'd with perennial flowers ;
And when, by Learmont's turrets gray,
Which long had mourn'd their lord's delay,
Again 'mid summer's twilight seen,
His velvet shoon were Elfin green,—

The livery of the tiny train,
Who held him, and would have again.

Smil'st thou at this, prosaic age,
Whom seldom other thoughts engage
Than those of miserable self,
The talismans of power and pelf?—
It must be so—but yet to him,
Who wanders 'mid the relics dim
Of ages, whose existence seems
To us, not actual life, but dreams,—
A raptured, an ecstatic trance,—
A gorgeous vision of romance,—
It yields a sadly pleasing joy,
To feel in soul once more a boy ;
To leave the rugged paths of Truth,
For fancies that illumined youth,
And threw enchantment's colours o'er
The forest dim, the ruin hoar ;
The walks, where musing genius stray'd ;
The spot where faith life's forfeit paid ;
The battle field where sleep the slain ;
The pastoral hill, and breezy plain.

Airy delusion this may be,—
But ever such remain for me ;
Still may the earth with beauty glow,
Beneath the storm's illumined bow,—
God's promised sign,—and be my mind
To science, when it deadens, blind.

NOTES.

1. All about thee wears a gloom Of something sterner than the tomb.

The ruins of the Tower of Erceeldoune, once the abode of the famous True Thomas, are still to be seen at a little distance from the village of the same name, which in pronunciation has been corrupted into Earlstoun. It is situated on the Leader, about two miles from where that stream falls into the Tweed. About the ruins themselves there is nothing remarkable, farther than their known antiquity, and the renown shed upon them by the Rhymers.

It was on a beautiful morning in September that the Castle was first pointed out to me; and at a time when I was ignorant of the existence of such a venerable relic. That it awakened a thousand stirring associations, is not to be wondered at.

I am told that it is still regarded with feelings of awe by the peasantry; and to express a doubt to such of its being haunted, would imply the sceptical hardihood of the Sadducee.

Of this, Sir Walter Scott tells a good story.—“The veneration,” he says, “paid to his dwelling-place, even attached itself, in some degree, to a person, who, within the memory of man, chose to set up his residence in the ruins of Learmont's Tower. The name of this man was Murray; a kind of herbalist, who, by dint of some knowledge in simples, the possession of a musical clock, an electrical machine, and a stuffed alligator, added to a supposed communication with Thomas the Rhymers, lived for many years in very good credit as a wizard.”

2. Of Tristrem brave, and fair Isolde.

It is now, perhaps, sufficiently known, that Thomas of Erceeldoune, alias True Thomas, alias the Rhymers, was the author of Sir Tristrem, a romance which obtained almost universal popularity in its own day; and which was paraphrased, or rather imitated, by the minstrels of Normandy and Bretagne. Such, however, before the invention of printing, was the instability of literary popularity, that, at last, only one copy was known to exist. From this, which belongs to the Library of Advocates in Edinburgh, and is the earliest specimen of Scottish poetry extant, the author of Marmion gave the world his edition, filling up the blanks in the narrative, and following out the story in a style of editorial emendation not often to be met with. Indeed, this rifacimento is not one of the least extraordinary achievements of a most extraordinary literary career.

For an account of it, the more hurried reader may consult Ellis's Specimens of Ancient Poetry, Vol. I. where it is treated of with much taste and critical discrimination.

3. Beneath the mystic Eildon tree.

Tradition reports, that from beneath the boughs of this tree, the Rhymer was wont to utter his prophecies; and also, that it was here he was enticed away by the Queen of Fairyland.

True Thomas lay on Huntly bank;
A ferlie he spied wi' his ee;
And there he saw a lady bright
Come riding down by the Eildon Tree.

Her shirt was of the grass green silk,
Her mantle of the velvet fine;
At ilka telt of her horse's mane,
Hang fifty siller bells and nine.

1. And still the Goblin burn steals round The purple heath, with lonely sound.

A small stream in the neighbourhood of the Eildon Tree, (or rather Stone, as its quondam site is now pointed out by a piece of rock,) has received the name of the Bogle Burn, from the spirits which were thought to haunt the spot, in attendance of the prophet.

5. And many a wound of many a fiend Of blood, in Bruce's blood he heal'd.

Among the prophecies ascribed to the Rhymer is the following, evidently relating to the crowns under James VI.

Then to the Beirn I could say,
Where dwellest thou, in what countrie?
Or who shall rule the isle Britain,
From the north to the south sea?
The French wife shall bear the son
Shall rule all Britain to the sea:
Which from the Bruce's blood shall come,
As near as the ninth degree:

That severe and acute examiner of historical truth, the late Lord Hailes, in a Dissertation devoted to the Prophecies of Bede, Merlin, Gildas, and our Bard, makes it distinctly appear, that the lines just quoted are an interpolation, and belong to erlington, another approved soothsayer

6. ———— Elfland's Queen " Behold the boy-bard on the green.

The description of their journey to Fairyland, in the Old Ballad, is exquisitely poetical.

" Oh see ye not yon narrow road,
So thick beset wi' thorns and briars?
That is the path of righteousness,
Though after it but few enquires.

" And see not ye that braid braud road,
That lies across that hily leven?
That is the path of wickedness,
Though some call it the road to heaven.

" And see not ye that bonny road,
That winds about the ferme brae?
That is the road to fair Elfland,
Where thou and I this night maun gae."

* * * * *

O they rode on, and farther on,
And they waded through rivers aboon the knee;
And they saw neither sun nor moon,
But they heard the roaring of the sea.

It was mirk mirk night, there was nae stern light,
And they waded through red blude to the knee;
For a' the blude that's shed on earth,
Rins thro' the springs o' that countrie.

Border Minstrelsy.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

A GREAT era is at hand. Upon every moral calculation, times of trouble and convulsion are advancing upon England. Favoured by many influences, which have been long developing themselves through political journals, they will be times of fearful disorganization for the system under which England has been great and happy. In such circumstances, nations have one sufficient anchor for riding out the storm—the old reverential and religious spirit, operating through education, and through household discipline. For England, that is lost. In the great body of the people, we have lived to see the idolatry of the human understanding complete: and if Great Britain should really and finally rise above the perils which menace her, that issue will defeat the lessons of universal moral prudence; for, according to any extensive means which are available in her case, she must do so through agencies in capital hostility to all those which secured her triumph in the long struggle of the 17th century; she must uphold civil order by principles of confusion, and social distinctions by the services of jacobinical levellers.

We cannot say that this prospect will be new to multitudes, or that it has opened upon ourselves abruptly. There has been a pretty general conviction, amongst thoughtful men, for the last fifteen or twenty years, that England was ripening for a great crisis: and, doubtless, some harmony there must have been in the elementary grounds upon which every speculation of that nature has moved. But the differences are yet so many, according to the original position of each political observer—and so many prejudices are likely to mingle with every man's anticipation of events in the highest degree interesting to his passions, that we shall guard ourselves from misconception, by marking out our own view of the particular causes which are concurring to revolutionary effects, and (as frankly as we can do without personality) the quarters in which they are most active.

The evils which threaten us—speaking of evils which can justify fear to a mighty empire—it is almost superfluous to say, are evils from within. A nation, as great as England, is not liable to dangers from abroad, unless as they happen to co-operate with domestic dangers, infirmities in the very constitution of society, or treason. The late French Revolution, therefore, as an original exciting cause, could not be formidable to England under any course which it might be expected to travel. Were the first revolutionary taint propagated from this contagion, and supposing that no previous morbid action of political influences in our own system had prepared the great body of English society to receive the French example with its entire effect, there could be little reason for looking to France with awe. Precisely that situation was the one we occupied at the earlier revolution of France. Any injury she could have done us by that revolution, it is now evident to every body, that France must have effected in those days as a tempter and an original suggester of evil; but, for co-operating elements of revolt prepared to her hands, it is certain, that, in England, she did not, and could not, find any at all, so far back as thirty-five and forty years ago. The trials for high treason prove it under Mr Pitt's administration. But, above all this, it is proved, by the universal disreputability (it is not too strong a word if we said infamy) which attached, through all England, at that time, to the name and character of Jacobin. Let us recall the condition, as to rank and connexions, of those in London, and in Edinburgh, &c., who were tried about 1793 and 1794, for conspiracy or treason;—let us revert simply to the universality of the toast of "Church and King," as the shibboleth adopted for ascertaining honest citizens,—and we shall be satisfied that the nation at that time was not divided. Jacobinism had then no real party amongst us. It is saying too little by much to describe it as in a minority. The simple truth was, that, on one side, with the government of the country, were arrayed all the property and respectability of the land; on the other, in utter disconnexion with each other, stood a few bankrupt malecontents, and old professional sowers of sedition. Let us look back for one moment upon the picture at this period presented by England, when every suspicion of revolutionary principles drew down the summary vengeance of mobs; when Dr Priestley, and other apostles of insurrection, were compelled to become panic-struck fugitives from the country; and disaffection to the state was heard only muttering from the obscurest corners; and then let us pass to the scene at that time and long afterwards exhibited in parts of the continent, in Sicily, and in every part of Italy, where the expression of public feeling was not stifled by an iron police. An Englishman of distinguished talent, who passed immediately from the one scene to the other, and heard, in every coffeehouse through Italy, hatred and contempt the most undisguised, universally fulminated against the government by respectable citizens, has recorded, in connexion with this fact, his astonishment that Mr Pitt could so profoundly have mistaken the signs of an extensive disaffection to the government, as the general complexion of his measures and his speeches in Parliament are evidences that he did. The panic of so great a man is inexplicable. In Austria, we can understand the policy of those rigorous, and even harsh measures which were adopted by the imperial cabinet. For, though not a murmur was heard, there was also no expression of cordial sympathy with the government from any extensive body of the people. The separation in feeling between the nobility and the untitled people, of property, was intense—gloomy—impassable; and it was well known, that if the iron compression of the state police were relaxed, a smothered flame of revolutionary frenzy was everywhere ready to burst forth. But in England, the whole property and authentic weight of the country had anticipated the government; jacobinism was put down, and made infamous, without the necessity of one movement on the part of our governors. In reality, the democracy of the land had lost even its reasonable influence, and was depressed to a point which, if it could be supposed permanent, would have been dangerous to the balance of the constitution; and perhaps, in some degree, to that undue depression, is to be ascribed the fury of recoil in the democratic spirit, under the excitement of Mr Hunt and other demagogues, in after years. There is one celebrated city in Great Britain where Whig politics have generally, until the last twelve years or so, been not so much the ascendant as the exclusive creed. In that city we will not say how the case may have been; but everywhere else, the man who lay under the suspicion of being a democrat, was received in all good company (supposing the very rare case that such a person had introductions of that class) with the same gloomy and shy demeanour which in England has been usually reserved for avowed infidels in religion. In 1794, the great Whig organs had already fallen into utter disrepute. In and out of Parliament, they had lost so entirely their power of leading, as a counterbalancing party known to the constitution,—so irretrievably had they forfeited the confidence of their countrymen,—and so sensibly was this carried home to their feelings by the votes in Parliament, and by the acts of respectable public meetings, where the very name of Fox had become but another word for every thing revolutionary and anti-national—that in fact, it is to pure mortification on the part of Mr Fox, at this state of humiliating insignificance or political extinction, that we must ascribe his secession from the House of Commons.*

In those days, therefore, the vi-

* At this day the personal passions of those times are nearly extinct. The "great Commoner" has been laid in the grave for three-and-twenty years. And we cannot be supposed to speak from any feelings of partisanship, when we say, that Mr Fox's public conduct for the five years from 1792 to 1797, after every allowance for difference of political principles, admits of no justification. It was indiscreet and intemperate in the spirit of a boy's intemperance. And, indeed, there is reason to think that Mr Fox, whose reading had been very limited, (and, in particular, by way of gour of Mr Pitt, which he himself law," was at least as much beyond described as "a vigour beyond the the occasion. Highly as we admire showing how little truth there often is in old inveterate popular notions, he neither had read more than a few pages of Demosthenes, nor did he particularly profess to admire that orator; there is reason, we say, to think that Mr Fox had taken a bias from one or two novels, and the Venice Preserved of Otway, which gave him through life an unstatesmanlike admiration for what he conceived to be generous indiscretions; his own account of the Duke of Monmouth corroborates this; and it is certain that a little conspiracy or treason was within the benefit of that liberal allowance. This we know from the quality of his Irish connexions. But putting out of consideration every thing which has been since made known to us by the publication of private letters, &c., there was enough surely in the public and avowed acts of Mr Fox, to authorize the treatment which he received both from the king and from his offended country. When posterity shall hear of so temperate a prince as George III. deliberately striking his pen with his own hand through the name of a privy councillor so distinguished for his talents, for his connexions, and his position in society, as Charles James Fox, a man who had even served him as a minister of the crown, without further question they will be satisfied that this privy councillor must have done something unusually wrong. Mr Fox's conduct at public dinners, in fact, the toasts and sentiments which he gave or authorized, the connexions and the political sympathies which he avowed, were worthy of a bloody French Septemberizer. It is singular that this most good-natured and amiable man in private life has publicly done his best to connect himself with the most sanguinary politicians of his day; and equally singular, that this leader of the democracy of England was, in his private pretensions and tastes, the most intolerant aristocrat. This latter feature was natural: the recent elevation of his family from a stock comparatively so modern as Sir Stephen Fox, whose somewhat equivocal history, and the several steps of his aggrandizement, were so perfectly within the retrospect of scandal, kept the family in an irritable condition of feeling, which a century or so may be required to heal. In all cases Mr Fox seemed to forget, that the man who occupies the great and dignified station of leader to the Whigs of Great Britain, (a station which, in any national sense, has not been filled since Mr Fox's death—unless Lord Grey may be thought his successor,) is not at liberty to act upon private impulses, as a less conspicuous member of the party would be. He is deeply responsible to the great political body who acknowledge him for their head. A private member of the Church of England would be free to attend a meeting for any religious scheme that was not prima fronte hostile by its very purpose to his own church; he may go to such a meeting as a means of investigating its true bearings; but a dignitary of that church has no such large freedom of agency. His very presence is a sanction that tells far and wide, and travels where no explanation can ever accompany it. This was deeply felt by the Whigs of that time; doubtless they must individually have felt much pain in separating from Mr Fox; but they could not, as patriots, allow that his violent acts should represent the ancient Whig party, to whom, jointly with the Tories, was confided the guardianship of the British constitution: to suffer such conduct to go down to posterity as the representative acts of the party, was a libel on their own conduct in 1689. Hence came the memorable schism of the Whig club. The fall defence of that schism may be seen in Mr Burke's fifty-four articles of impeachment against C. J. Fox, &c. And certain it is, that no true Whig, who valued his principles above his private connexions, after that time adhered to Mr Fox; those who did so, held that relation to the genuine Whigs, which the Tories of the English Revolution held to the Jacobites; there was the same opposition of principles to personal attachments. Indeed, after that solemn condemnation of Mr Fox by his own party, it was felt that, as a public man, he could never recover his place in the national esteem, until the course of time should have so changed the position of all parties, that their old moral relations, and the judgments founded upon them, should have become obsolete. In fact, the vast succession of events, which at length swallowed up the republic of France, thoroughly cancelled the position of all parties. Mr Fox's past sentiments thus became of no more practical or applicable importance, than those of his college exercises. Such had been the sweeping nature of the changes, that he, like all politicians, found themselves in a new generation. And the death of Mr Pitt of necessity opened that door to Mr Fox's party, which, during his life, would assuredly have been shut for ever. Meantime, inoperative as Mr Fox's opinions were made by accident, and the temper of the nation with him in many parts of his policy—highly as we admire even this vigour, applied to a more suitable object, we must own, that the assumptions upon which he acted seem first to have been realised in our own days. All the dangers which Mr Pitt imagined are now present. That revolution, against which he armed a general crusade of Europe, had already ceased to be dreadful at the time when the “panic of property” first reached the cabinet of England. The death of a malefactor inflicted upon an innocent king, and his calumniated wife, first gave any sensible shock to some states of Europe. Yet in that stage of its manifold transmigrations, the portentous revolution of France had almost ceased to be an object of political fear, because it had altogether ceased to be an object of imperfect confidence, or of uneasy and mysterious suspicion. Long before that time, indeed, grounds of certainty had been furnished, which dissipated every doubt upon the ultimate tendencies of the new-born democracy of France. Once ceasing to court and to fraternize—once dropping her blandishments and her masks, in her martial and menacing attitude, the youthful giantess lost more than half her terrors. As a friend, there was a mystery of fear about her, as well as a mystery of iniquity; (for the guilty secrets of that revolution have no more closed the burden of their confessions, than the secrets, yet guiltier perhaps, of this present revolution have begun it :) as an enemy, though dreadful, she might be grappled with.

Far more dangerous, every way more full of change and fear, because more insidiously smiling upon all around her, is the Revolutionary France of August and September, 1830, than that of January, 1793; and the time will soon arrive, when the fine apostrophe of the Poet, who looked back from the elevation of 1815, upon the awful sweep of that earlier birth, through six-and-twenty years of blood and tears, will be found more ruefully appropriate to the colossal democracy which, as yet, wears the name of royalty:—

“Who rises on the banks of Seine,
And binds her temple with the civic wreath?

What joy to read the promise of her mien!
How sweet to rest her wide-spread wings beneath!

She stands on tiptoe, conscious she is fair,
And calls a look of love into her face!
And spreads her arms— as if the general air Alone could satisfy her wide embrace.

—Melt, principalities, before her melt!
Her love ye hail’d—her wrath have felt!
But she through many a change of form hath gone;

And stands amidst you now, an armed creature,

Whose panoply is not a thing put on,
But the live scales of a portentous nature;
That, having wrought its way from birth to birth,

Stalks round—abhor’d by Heaven—a terror to the earth!”

which he dealt, it is yet certain that these, more than any other expressions of the republican frenzy, deceived Mr Pitt, and were the occasion of his harshest measures for restraining the press, and the freedom of public assembly. Mr Pitt had little time or opportunity for making himself acquainted with the true condition of the public mind; and it was natural that he should suppose a revolutionary taint very widely diffused, which could have reached Mr Fox. Yet, had it not been for the support of the Dukes of Norfolk and Bedford, Mr Fox would have been left nearly without aristocratic alliances. However, to this conduct of Mr Fox, and its misinterpretation by Mr Pitt, it is pretty certain that we owe the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, and all the other parts of that harsh system of coercion.

It is singular that the personal friends of Mr Fox should have caught from him the very same spirit of boyish indiscretion, and should have gone so far as to provoke the very same species of punishment. The dismissal of the present Duke of Bedford, as Lord Lieutenant for his native county, and of Lord Fitzwilliam from the same office, in the West Riding of York, seem, at first sight, as violent measures in the Ministry as the expulsion of Mr Fox from the Privy Council. We do not wish to stir unpleasant remembrances without necessity. Yet, certainly, the offence of these Peers was a most wanton outrage in persons of any rank. The Duke has since written a defence of himself, which will be found in Dr Parr’s works. But it is one which has little chance of changing any body’s opinion who is acquainted with the circumstances.

It has been destined by Providence, it seems, for mysterious purposes, that the French democracy of both periods should find willing and even zealous accomplices, in those who were summoned by every instinct of fear and prudence, to stand forward at once in the first ranks of its embattled enemies. Infatuation seems to have possessed the Cabinets of Europe in both instances. But in 1789, it was the infatuation of hope; in 1830, it is the worst of all infatuations—the infatuation of fear. Of all parties, at this time, the aristocracy of England seems to be the only one which has done its duty, or acted with any sense of dignity. Feeling, before even they could fully have comprehended, the secret hostility to themselves in this new-born abortion of France, which, in its prosperity, involves by fatal links the destruction of their own order, the British Peerage, and all their connexions, have honourably stood aloof from the wretched scene of mob gratulations. If they are to fall, they will fall as becomes them. It seems, that they at least are determined to make themselves no parties to the conspiracies which are now organizing in Paris, against every species of civil dignity in the system of Europe. Meantime, for the poor degraded Government of England—what words shall be found ample enough to express the judicial blindness, and the self-abasement, with which it has precipitated itself into the fraternal hug of the Parisian canaille, who summon to their levy, ambassadors from the councils of every potentate they are able to abuse with their flatteries and impostures, as to that great figurative banquet in the Apocalypse, upon the flesh of kings and their captains. Too happy if they can acquit themselves of any participation in the schemes of Polignac and Peyronnet, singly solicitous for the approbation of the scoundrel press, the English Ministers rush, at the bidding of the mobs at home, to fraternize with the French mobs, inside or outside (the difference is small) of the Tuileries. The acts of Polignac, so far as they seem at present, and before the trial of that minister, to indicate treachery, may certainly, with some plausibility, furnish a ground for suspecting an accomplice in the correspondent of Dr Curtis; but, inasmuch as they also indicate a good deal of energy, the present Cabinet of Great Britain must surely stand acquitted of all original share in suggesting them.*

If it were found necessary, or if it were judged advisable, to recognise the existing government of France, where could be the call for this furious haste? Was it dignified—was it even decorous, according to the very limited decorum of the mobs who now rule at Paris, that this recognition should take place with as little enquiry into the past, and as careless a disregard of the future, as could possibly accompany the acknowledgment of a commercial consul at one of the outports? No questions asked, no negotiation so much as talked of, upon this tremendous change of dynasty; some information arrives in London—nobody knows how, or when, or whence—possibly from some pretty marchaude des modes to the Duke of Wellington, in the rear of some assortment of fa-

* In saying this, we take it not upon the authority of the London newspapers, which stick at no falsehoods, but on the fact of the newspapers having received no public contradiction, that Gen. Baudrand's presentation to the King was followed by an acknowledgment of the present government of France. Else the mere reception of Gen. Baudrand proved nothing of what the newspapers pretended. He might have been received as an individual, or as representing a provisional government of necessity, or again as representing a provisional government of authority; for it must be remembered, that the Duke of Orleans was appointed provisional governor (Lieutenant-General) of France by Charles X. The same newspapers circulated as true the pretended circular of the Prussian Cabinet to the military commandants of frontier fortresses, forged at Maestricht; and every journal in Great Britain swallowed it. And on the late Russian order arriving for the exclusion of the tricolour flag from the ports of Russia, and for the recall of Russian subjects from Paris,—the same London journals have had the audacity to protest that these measures meant encouragement to the new government!

shions for the month, that for summer wear they have a new assortment of princes and ministers at his Grace's service in Paris. What! is it so certain, then, that the late French Ministry have no case to establish, which may modify the views of Europe upon what has past? Have they by possibility no story in reserve, on their side, against those who are now in the ascendant? The truth is now already beginning to creep out; and, whether the late French Cabinet can produce or not such evidence as will materially affect the present impressions of the world, manifest it is to any man of sense, by the mere preparation and perfect organization of all the measures for resisting at the precise moment when they were wanted, that a most extensive conspiracy had been formed in Paris—and doubtless was entirely within the knowledge of Polignac and his brother ministers. That the select mob, who were appointed to the approaching service, were instructed as to all the circumstances of their conduct; and in particular that they were bribed by ulterior views, which have since been unfolding themselves, to their abstinence from plunder, in so far as their abstinence was real, general principles of human nature will not permit us to doubt. A worthy, who is kept at Paris as a correspondent by one of the London newspapers, says, (we give his words from memory,) "If you speak to a coalheaver of Wapping about the Ministers, and the Cabinet, he understands nothing of what you mean; but in Paris it is otherwise. You are not to judge of the poor people in Paris by the mobs of London." So it seems: the sanguinary character of the mobs of Paris, even the female mobs, is known of old: witness the ever-memorable atrocities and fiendish outrages of the bloody poissardes, perpetrated in 1789, and the following years, under the very eyes of that august lady over whom history weeps! To their bloodthirstiness, it seems that we can now add, upon the authority of their London-newspaper friend, the not unkindred quality of coxcombry. We can well believe it: this is but the old union of the tiger and the monkey, for which, as representing the elements of their character, we have the warrant of the most celebrated amongst their countrymen. Many facts have been already recorded with regard to the poor faithful and intrepid Swiss guards, and even with regard to French officers and soldiers, which make it tolerably clear, that the old ferocity and cruelty of the Parisian mobs have been abundantly exemplified on the late occasion; many more will continue to come forth, when they are no longer repelled by the consciousness that the public sympathies both in England and in France run with too headlong a current in the opposite direction. Truth will assuredly make its way at last; and we have no sort of doubt that a perfect uniformity in the character of French mobs, ancient and modern, will be stamped, as the foremost impression, upon every account of the late transactions, written with simplicity and circumstantiality, and without party bias or democratic gasconading. Bloody and cruel the French mobs have always been: their London friend answers for their presumption and conceit; and, if they are not greatly belied by all British strangers, who have had much personal intercourse with members of their body, they are, in a degree beyond all other mobs in Europe, ignorant and mercenary. The praises of disinterestedness, in the extent to which they have been so lavishly put forward in their behalf, and partially even supported by the romantic anecdotes circulated in the newspapers, supposing that their falsehood were not already betrayed by the theatric varnish of the circumstances, may be resolutely contradicted by the mere blank realities of human frailty and human necessity. Disinterestedness, under circumstances of such extreme temptation, and in persons who perfectly understood that they were to reap no fame—no individual gratitude or momentary approbation for their acts, is not reconcilable, upon any extensive scale, with human nature in its present condition of infirmity. Sublime acts of self-devotion have arisen but rarely, at long intervals, in a course of many centuries. The cases of that kind are easily numbered—more of them belong to religion than to patriotism; and there is no reason to think that any influence but religion has ever sustained such an effort, where there was not a body of admiring and recording witnesses. How monstrous then to call upon us for an act of credulity so sweeping as this assumption, not of one Athenian Codrus, or one Roman Curtius, but of ten thousand Parisian Codri and Curtii from the dark recesses of St Antoine! Less than forty years ago, from that frightful quarter of Paris, came forth those myriads of murderous levellers, who wallowed in the blood of illustrious victims. One generation has passed, and it is audaciously pretended by the London newspapers that, from those very same abodes of squalid wretchedness, the very same gloomy dens of guilt, ignorance, and abject pauperism, martyrs by thousands, and self-devoting heroes, upon the high Roman plan, more numerous than the leaves which strew the forest grounds of Vall'Ombrosa, have issued upon the simple excitement of apprehensive patriotism; and, with a stern renunciation of personal views, laying down the trowel, the hammer, and the mattock, have taken up the sword, without so much as asking for the wages of their lost time. Oh! fortunate city! oh! privileged age! in which the very sansculottiers are raised to heights so sublime above those mercenary temptations which, in other times, neither liberal education, nor even the restraints of religion, have been found sufficient to regulate!

But the good sense of reflecting men recoils from such extravagant fictions with disgust, as soon as the hurry of the first excitement has subsided. The newspapers take advantage of our first enthusiasm to impose fables upon us, to which the understanding could not have submitted in moments of coolness; and once fastened upon the public ear, they are not afterwards investigated.* It is past all doubt, that the Parisian mob of July was bought and sold. No reasonable man hears of 10,000 labourers leaving their families to starve, in order to risk their lives for the Press and the Electoral Colleges—objects so remote, and in so aerial a relation to their wants, and the possible sufferings of their class, but he must perceive that some previous negotiation had passed between them and the agents of the great party behind the scenes; that party which had been for some time secretly embarked upon a contest ad internecionem with the Polignac Ministry. The principals, as always happens in such cases, withdrew from sight; the obscure agents have now disappeared; their dupes are left to mourn over the fraud so artfully practised, by which they only have failed to profit; and their indignation has since found a vent in those tumultuary meetings, which have given the new government so much uneasiness. Had these people the command of a newspaper, we should hear disclosures which will not reach the public through a body of editors, who are in one moiety sold to the present government by bribes such as Europe has not heard of before, and in the

* Most singular it is to remark the daily proofs of conspiracy amongst the newspapers, benefiting by their happy immunity from criticism, ("Folios of four pages, which not even critics criticise,") to forward any purposes which they have much at heart. Thus, as early as Sept. 11 and 12, a time when the London journals (excepting such as are mere copyists, without avenues of any kind to official information,) well knew that no communications had been received from Vienna, they were busily forging recognitions of the new French régime by the Austrian Cabinet. The articles by which this statement was made, were placed in a conspicuous situation; the articles by which it was indirectly retracted, were slipped into obscure extracts from Paris journals. Again, all the papers (almost without an exception) asserted, in the same spirit of systematic deception, that Charles X. had insisted on being received as King, and that our Government had given orders that he should be received only as a private gentleman. Both were falsehoods, as the newspapers well knew who coined them, for the purpose of bringing over the wavering to their own views, by the pretended authority of Government. In this instance, however, Government did not think proper to submit to the lying misrepresentation; and a contradiction was given in the Courier. But, apart from that, what a palpable want of harmony between this tale of the newspapers and another (a true one), circulated at the same time—viz. that Charles X. had abdicated in favour of his grandson!

other are pledged to the very interests against which the people fought. In either direction, therefore, at present their complaints are stifled, and their revelations are intercepted. Besides, it is obvious that a man in the situation of M. Lafitte can easily retire behind a general disavowal of all the unknown or obscure agents, who, whether authorized or not, made use of his weighty name in conducting their bargain with the people. It is equally obvious that poor labourers, whom mere hunger and cold recall to their daily toils, can have little time and less skill for unravelling an elaborate juggle, in which those who played the leading parts are now backed by the whole power of the state. M. Lafitte and his friends, we dare say, treat this affair privately within their own clique, as the majority of politicians amongst ourselves treat the question of the impressment of sailors: all acknowledge it to be a sad sporting with personal rights, but view it as a case in which there is so great an overbalance of public good, that a patriot (it is supposed) has no alternative but to allow of it with a sigh, and to turn away his eyes from the actual operation of so painful an outrage. Ten thousand people, they will argue, have been cajoled and defrauded, in order that thirty millions might achieve their liberties. But in whatever way they apologize for the case, and let who will be chiefly responsible as the original movers and managers of the fraud—that this fraud was perpetrated, is evident, not only on the considerations we have urged, from the very face of the whole affair, and the coincidence of an armed mob, trained and prepared for every contingency, with the very crisis of the demand; but also from a collateral reflection which belongs pretty nearly to the same period. Not many weeks before this display of popular zeal on the democratic side, a large body of poor women, and one of the lowest of the trades of Paris,—in fact the very classes from which the heroes and the martyrs of liberty have emanated,—on presenting some customary offering of flowers, and an address to the royal family, called upon the king in significant terms, to make himself master in his own house. The political insinuation couched under this homely counsel was well understood by all Paris. Now, it is true that these people have since made a laudable effort to exonerate themselves from the reproach with which this recollection has loaded them, being naturally anxious to evade the public hostility in a cause which is no longer able to defend its supporters. But, we argue upon it thus,—not only is it established, that in 1830 one considerable division of the populace, standing under no circumstances of distinction from the other divisions of their body, did confessedly avow a direct and open sympathy with the most despotic interpretation of the king's rights; but, inasmuch as they drew upon themselves no ill-will, at the time, from their brethren of other trades, as no allusion was ever made to this sentiment until recent events had placed it in a new view,—and until some one, perhaps, of the many agents of the newspaper-press had recalled it to the public remembrance; can it be doubted, that this address pretty accurately represented the general state of political feeling amongst that order of the Parisians? Had the particular trade concerned in this address, been aware of any emphatic difference between their own views in politics, and those of their brethren, generally, they would, probably, have abstained from any allusion to a subject so little connected with their own interests. Or, suppose them to have been under any delusion in this respect, all the other trades, at least, were under no delusion as to their own principles; and they would speedily have apprized these heretics, by most unwelcome evidences of the general displeasure, that their admonition to the king was likely to be as injurious to themselves as it was upon any view of the case uncalled for and gratuitous. We do not see in what way this argument can be eluded: had the temper and political enthusiasm ascribed at present to the lower orders of Paris been genuine—had they been in any sense the true forces upon which the late insurrection moved, then they could not have been of sudden and recent growth; being so profound and radical—being adequate to sustain so perilous a service, they must have been of ancient growth; consequently they must have been fully matured in their developement on so very recent an occasion as that of the address in question, and would, therefore, inevitably have exploded in some instant expression of indignation applied to the principal actors in that business. As no such explosion is on record, as no traces, in fact, exist of any murmurs or ill-will on that or similar manifestations of anti-democratic sentiments—we are at liberty to suppose that the populace of Paris was clear of all animosity or jealousy which pointed in that direction: a supposition which is in the fullest sense irreconcilable with the principles and the patriotic fervour now ascribed to them by the triumphant party, as the sole solution of the political phenomena.

Perhaps there are many secrets of this day both in English and French politics, more especially in French, which never will be revealed in their whole extent for centuries to come. Memoirs in England and in France, are still appearing at intervals, of an era nearly two centuries back, which sometimes make exposures of those days that might cause the dry bones to stir in the very graves of many once formidable statesmen. The whole machinery of the late tremendous insurrection at Paris, may perhaps never be known. Yet it is very probable that the impeached ministers, unless they see cause to sell their secret exposures for the price likely to be offered by the new government, may throw much light upon the past, in the course of their own defence; and the chance of any suppression on their part, in collusion with the triumphant faction, is rendered less probable by the obvious difficulty under which so weak a government must find itself to fulfil any engagement it might undertake with the ex-ministers, for saving their lives and their estates. Bribes short of these, it may be supposed, would hardly purchase silence in a single instance. Thus the government will be placed in a trying situation: anger, revenge, mortification, (and despair, if they should find sanguinary counsels prevalent amongst the populace,) may lead the prisoners to threaten the fullest disclosures. These the government, there can be no doubt, would cheerfully purchase at any price of concession to men who are in no respect personally odious to themselves. Yet to promise a pardon will be impossible; that must remain entirely with the people. And to wink at their escape from prison would be too hazardous an experiment on the present temper of the Parisians, and one which might probably enough recoil on the present government itself. It is not for people in their senses to step between a tiger and his prey.

However, with or without the circumstantial disclosures of Polignac and Peyronnet, the key is already in our hands to the main outline of the late revolution; and the truth which it proclaims is acknowledged by the discerning, and will soon be generally diffused. The revolution is the effort of a conspiracy. An organized faction had entered on a race with the government—the government, well acquainted with its plans, its movements, and the crisis which it was preparing, resolved to precipitate that crisis, and to bring on the struggle, before the whole resources of their enemy were developed. Unhappily the king and his advisers were tempted to violate the laws. Being as yet in possession of the powers of the state, they found, in the extremity of the danger, and in the utter contempt of law which governed the counsels of their antagonists, a justifying argument for wielding those powers in the way suited to grapple with the urgency of the case, without wasting a thought upon the scruples of constitutional purists. The question (it might be argued by a partisan of the royal cause) was one of state casuistry. “All nations, those who have been the most jealous of unlimited and irresponsible power, the Romans, even, and the English, have contemplated the possible occurrence of emergencies, and have provided for emergencies, in which not only the powers of the magistrature were to be extended (an alteration only of de-gree), but the very constitution, with all its privileges for the benefit of the subject, was to be suspended (an alteration of spirit and kind). The Romans had their dictatorship, lodging the most plenary discretion in one man, likely to bring many prejudices, possibly many personal enmities, to his office, and who exercised his power without any subsequent accountableness. The English suspend their right of Habeas Corpus, the very aegis of their liberties; in a case of necessity, subject the country to martial law; and put an end to the right of meeting to express grievances, or for any purpose whatsoever: all which are acts absolutely destructive of liberty, and surrender the whole power of the state to one sole minister, who is thus enabled to remove all his opponents at pleasure, and to throw them for an indefinite period into dungeons, without ever bringing them to trial, or shewing any cause whatever for their original detention. These tremendous powers have repeatedly been conceded, and upon no very severe examination of the circumstances under which they were claimed, to ministers, in some instances, of haughty and imperious temper. It is true, that they were created in a legal way. But it must be remembered, that, in France, upon the late occasion, that legislative body, who must have been resorted to by the King for the creation of a legal shape to any extraordinary powers or dictatorship, were themselves amongst the foremost of the conspirators. Powers, which were to be exercised chiefly against themselves, it was hopeless that they would grant. Consequently, if the powers of a dictatorship were necessary to save France from revolution, as apparently they were, it is clear enough that the circumstances of the case allowed of no other mode of creating them, than that which was adopted by the French government."

Such would be the apology of a French advocate in a court of justice for the Ex-ministers. The arguments of a judicial advocate are necessarily in one extreme, and do not represent the absolute truth. But it is fair to allege them as a balance to the other extreme on the popular side, which is all we have yet heard. An English advocate for Polignac might shape his apology thus (still supposing him to speak as a law pleader):—

"The question admits of an easy solution. Has the legislature of a country a suspending and a dispensing power, for extraordinary conditions of danger, over the laws and general privileges of the constitution? According to all analogy and precedent of the most scrupulous and zealous states, in every land it has. Then, secondly, supposing that the legislative body are not sitting, may the same rights of suspension and dispensation be wielded vicariously by the King's council? Are Orders in Council, (ordonnances), provisionally and ad interim, of equal force and authority with acts of Parliament? Doubtless they are: we of this country, in some memorable instances, have had our policy, both domestic and foreign, created by Orders in Council; so that, with regard to us, the French Ministry will have an argumentum ad hominem. But these Orders of Council were afterwards obliged to seek their warrant and confirmation in Parliament? Certainly they were; and that course would according to all reasonable presumption, have been pursued by the French Cabinet with regard to their Orders in Council; they also would have been submitted to the French legislative body. But, then, that body was previously to have undergone a thorough change in its constitution? True; the dispensing power was directed in France, as it had been in England, to the peccant or threatening parts of the popular functions. Different circumstances find different necessities. In England, the danger had been from without the walls of Parliament; in France, it came from within. But there is no reason why the composition of the representative senate, or the franchise of their constituents, should not as properly become the subject of the dispensing power—those being, in France, the forces which neutralized the royal authority, and were hurrying all things into a revolution—as that, in England, the general liberty of the subject should be circumscribed, and (to speak frankly) be held for the time on the tenure of a minister's pleasure. The King of England, in the solemnity of his coronation, swears to observe all the laws of the realm, and to maintain the privileges of his people. Yet the very foremost of these privileges is one which George III., conscientious as he was, and even superstitiously scrupulous (if that is possible) in what related to the obligation of oaths, dispensed with more than once. Still of the many persons who have attacked his policy, not one has charged him with violating his oaths. The truth is, that the very possibility of a dispensing power implies the right of a full discharge and absolution from all the moral obligations which had enforced the rights or immunities dispensed with. Here, then, lies the error of those who view the Orders in Council of Charles X. as infractions of his oath. They conceive, and that is the general supposition, for no better reason than that the true view has not happened to have been suggested by any body, that the King of France was dissatisfied with the constitution as it existed in the charter, and, by his ordinances, meditated its destruction. That was not the case. Charles X. was well pleased with the constitution; wished and sought to preserve it; whilst others—above all, the legislative body and the public press—were confederated for its destruction. These enemies of the charter had already made it impossible for the king's government to proceed. No ministry that the king could appoint—no matter who they were—so long as they would not abet the plan of reducing their master into unresisting vassalage to the will of the Jacobin faction, would have commanded the votes of the House. That was settled. It had been resolved, that the king, and the king's office, which, according to its place and functions in the charter, was a powerful impediment to their objects, should be attacked through the necessities of the public service. Reduced to insignificance in this practical way, he would afterwards have been easily compelled to create these nullities by law, which he had practically exemplified. By such steps, the barriers, safeguards, and balances of the constitution, were to have been removed in succession. The king, however, and his council were longer-headed people than their enemies had assumed. They saw to the end of the scheme: and they met it by a counter-plot. But how? Not, as has been imagined, by a warrant for the destruction of the charter, but for its suspension. The ordonnances of July 26 were mere acts of the dispensing power pro hac vice: and if they were not speedily laid aside after they had redressed the main evil just then impending—the virtual abolition of the constitution—the fault would have rested (as originally it had arisen) with the faction of Jacobins. One evil only there was in the king's measures—and that was in their execution. The army of Algiers should have been in Paris. It is a standing rule in politics, and the imprudence is not greater than the cruelty of neglecting it, that an unpopular step once resolved on should be carried through with an overwhelming force. To make demonstrations of strength that are barely sufficient—tempts opposition, and in a manner challenges the bloodshed that ensues."

So much might be said by a resolute advocate, taking the extreme line of defence, for Charles X. and his party. And there is a kind of duty to listen even to an extreme apology, where so much is heard in the other extreme. For ourselves, and to return to our own course of argument, as to the other side, as we have said, they are a band of conspirators; and, for the present, of triumphant conspirators. Is then the new Orleans king a ringleader of conspirators? Not so. We believe him to have been clear of participation in the machinations of the faction who have adopted him; and as much the passive victim of their momentary and prudential favour, as Charles X. was of their abiding wrath. But in that character he is the more dangerous to us. He is just the same royal phantom, the same pageant king that Louis XVI. was left by the constitution of 1789.

A condition of things cannot be imagined for France more certain to uphold the succession of change and trouble. Faction will propagate faction; conspiracy will supplant conspiracy; and Jacobinism, having, even more fully than at the era of 1789, crushed with its brutal hoof the throne and the aristocracy, will fall into intestine divisions; the Reign of Terror will again succeed under all its sad varieties of crime; and that will again travel onward to the inevitable consummation of a military despotism.

Here let us pause for one instant, to weigh the conduct of our political journals; of that, in particular, upon which, in these awful times, the burden of the Anti-Jacobin service devolved. We live in an age of apostasies. The times are rank with political baseness. Yet no one instance of party treachery, which our times have witnessed, has so much confounded all expectations as this; excepting the treachery of Sir Robert Peel, none has raised so much indignation. In journals that have been bankrupt in character for twenty years, that adore the mob, and, affecting to lead, do in fact follow, with their tortuous wriggle, the endless caprices of the Times, no man wonders at any thing, unless it were the casual expression of a just sentiment without an admission fee. But in a grave and honourable newspaper, avowedly set up to maintain the ancient Standards in church and state, sudden, violent, reckless perfidy, scandalizes and alarms us all. Faugh! what a spectacle! A solemn journalist, with wig and spectacles, sprinkling his columns with Hebrew, and professing unusual reverence for the sanctities of religion, (which, as much as his ability, had won him our regard,) at first hearing of the mob revolution in Paris—an event which, upon his principles, should have driven him to sackcloth and ashes—throws up his heels like a young colt of a year old or rising two, whinnies, curvets, caprioles and gambols in every expression of ridiculous joy. He should know that his friends are aghast at his folly. Fie! raving journalist! Is it opium, or mandragora—calenture is it of the dog-days, or changes of the moon, that in one hour can thus have shaken so firm a brain? We hear it said everywhere—"No: it is none of these; it is hatred of the Duke of Wellington. He is to be connected at any price with Polignac: and that connexion must be improved into a crime. But a crime it could not be, unless the Paris revolution were the birth of a glorious era for France." Is that, then, the key to this hideous scene, in which a writer of ability and honour exhibits himself, capering away in bacchanalian frenzy amongst the godless crew who are revelling by anticipation over the prostrate thrones of Europe; and not a few are clamouring for regicide? To hate the Duke of Wellington in his character of politician is not amiss: but is it impossible to hate at a less price than that of sacred principles? We suspect that with that cause has concurred another. In a moment of weakness, and of green enthusiasm at the first arrival of the French news, the writer forgot himself, or mistook the bearings of the case: an expression of approbation escaped him: he fancied that all the world was now to be unanimous. Two or three days convinced him of his error. Wise magistrates refused to call meetings; the aristocracy stood aloof. Had his journal been a weekly one, he would have taken a different course. But a daily writer has little time for reflection. He was committed. To the editor of a newspaper, if he professes at all to guide in politics, there is little opening for repentance—ruin would follow the confession of an error. And thus the indiscretion of a moment pledges a man for ever. In this instance it increases the grotesqueness of the exhibition—that, whilst consistency obliges him to maintain his tone of frosty rapture at each allusion to the new order of things in Paris, a grin of rage is yet discoverable on his features at the rash haste which has betrayed him to such a cause, and a withering scowl upon the rabble of London ruffians, young and old, in whose worshipful society it has placed him. Sad necessity of violated duty, and of a single false step! Sir Robert Peel, it is generally believed, would give his first-born son that a lethargy had held him from the public service for the last eighteen months. This journalist would perhaps pay the same price to restore himself to that station of unsullied authority with the public which he occupied in the last week of July. The remorse of a man of honour and ability, when he will suffer us to suspect his remorse, commands our pity and respect.

For the present, however, he argues, and he does what obstinacy can to fight up against the seuse of his real situation. He contends for the late Revolution, (admitting at the same time, that his friends do not agree with him,) on the ground that it is in the analogy of the British Revolution in 1688-9, and not of the former French Revolution in 1788-9. What his arguments were on this head, so little had they the air of having satisfied himself—so entirely did they wear the shape of showy refinements for a college thesis, or a special pleading, that we have already forgot them. The opposition between our Revolution and the late French one, is large and obvious in a degree which makes it necessary to spend but few words in marking the capital distinctions. The radix (so to speak) of all which can characterise any revolution of state, lies in the kind of provocations offered on the one side—the amount and quality of the aggressions upon national rights—and on the other, in the mode of the resistance: by what organs, how combined, in what alliance with each several order of the state. First, for the provocation: in the case of James II. it was no solitary act, but a long succession of acts through a space of five years. The Quo Warrantos, which placed all corporations at the king's mercy—the sweeping Irish confiscations and proscriptions—the attack upon the English bishops—the violent and lawless expulsion of citizens from their freeholds—the obtrusion, vi et armis, of papist fellows and tutors upon a Protestant university—not one of all these enormities was held sufficient by Whigs, as liberal as Bishop Burnet,⁴ to justify an armed resistance to the sovereign. It was the collective series of acts which in their view raised the true justification, as arguing on the part of the crown a settled plot for suppressing the religious worship of the land, fenced equally by conscience and by law, for establishing the popish superstition in its most idolatrous and intolerant form—for violating all the titles to private property—for annihilating civil rights—for abolishing Parliament—and, finally, for destroying the fundamental laws and constitution of the land. And that this plot was no casual or sudden thought, which might be abandoned upon proper remonstrances, is evident from this: that it was many times with-awn and dissembled under threatening or unfavourable circumstances, and as often resumed upon fresh encouragement arising. Now, what is there corresponding to all this in the conduct of Charles X.? His orders in council were, at any rate, a single act of a single day, not a series. There might be a long series of acts which expressed evil intentions to the constitution; on that we give no opinion; but it is not alleged that more than one carried these intentions into execution, so as signally to violate the charter. And it is a possible view of the case that this act was merely provisional; an act to meet a desperate conspiracy; not an act destroying or abolishing the constitution, but an act suspending it, or dispensing with it. However, let this be waived as a question which is yet sub judice; two capital differences are still to be found between the cases of James II. and Charles X. First, the measures of Charles X. were in the nature of a retort. In what degree they were also measures of anticipation and counteraction, is at present less distinctly known. But it is matter of notoriety to all the world, that, at any rate, they are to be considered in the light of a reply, or retaliation, to a long series of insolent, contumacious, and threatening behaviour from the legislative body. These men were resolutely ungrateful, refractory upon system. Their opposition, to the king's government was not upon cause shewn, but unconditional, predetermined, and systematic. Acts of grace could not conciliate them: concessions could not disarm them. They had resolved that the king should not conduct public affairs, but as a tool surrendered into their hands. We speak not of the ulterior conspiracy which they had organized for precipitating this end: we stand upon the public debates of the French Chambers, votes which are known to all Europe, and ⁴ Bishop Burnet's conduct was, however, timid and compromising. Panic gave a bias to his conscience in the language he held to Lord Russel in prison. And afterwards, when the Revolution allowed a larger license to people's thoughts, he could not take the full benefit of that advantage, from the unfortunate necessity under which he lay of harmonizing his latter language with that which he had held on so memorable an occasion.

insolence which is recorded. Now turn to James II.; what single instance of disrespect or hesitating confidence do the annals of those times present? On the contrary,—even reasonable remonstrance was forborne; as if to bribe the king back to his duty. The addresses of his subjects increased in fervour of affection as his Majesty gave them stronger cause for uneasiness. However unpopular his religion might tend to make him, he more than compensated that drawback by his connexion with the naval glory of his age. He was loved as a “blue-jacket king.” Dutiful reverence, affectionate homage, met him in every quarter; and we are told by an eye-witness of those scenes, that it was customary to say, upon any doubts arising of that kind, which the final issue too fatally warranted, “No: we must not doubt: we have the word of a prince, which was never broken.” Secondly, Be it remembered that the measures proclaimed by the ordonnances of July 25 were not adopted, at all events, as a direct end, and as welcome to the king in and for themselves; they were resorted to as a means, and after other less violent methods for attaining the same end, had been tried in vain. Without undertaking, in this place, to characterise the general spirit of Charles X.’s government, it is agreed even by his enemies (in fact it is their way of explaining the meaning of his conduct) that in this last act, by which he so much provoked his subjects, his purpose was simply to apply a remedy to the elections, which had not turned out as he wished. It was done, therefore, as a means for attaining an end which he would have been contented (possibly would have preferred) to attain by the regular course of the elections, had they happened to fall out to his wishes. He did not seek to proclaim his arbitrary power: in reality it is very possible (even his enemies admit) that he would have preferred to obtain the same advantages at a much lower exertion of power. But the illegal violences of James were applied in a very different way: not mediately, as the readiest means to the advantage he had in view, but immediately and directly for themselves, as illustrations of that arbitrary and autocratic power which James courted for its own sake. He was a genuine despot and tyrant; for he was not content to obtain the ends he coveted, unless he might also put it upon record that he obtained them by violence.

So far with respect to the provocation given. But now for the quality of the resistance offered, how mighty was the difference! In England, it commenced and was sustained upon an influence of religion. And many persons have doubted whether the English Revolution ever could have been carried through, had not the conviction been at length matured in the minds of all who had an influential place in society, and in the last year of James’s reign, diffused powerfully by the pulpits of the land, that the alternative for the national choice was—a new king, or a new and idolatrous worship. That dilemma quieted many a scrupulous conscience, that else would have fought for James to the death. In France, on the other hand, at this day, such religion as there is with either party, nobody doubts to be all ranged on the side of the king.* The faction opposed to him are no champions of a purified and reformed faith, but the liberal scoffers at all religion whatsoever, as equally odious to the miserable cant which they profess, under the name of philosophy.

Such was the main supporting force of the British Revolution; one which, alas! could now be relied upon in no part of Europe; in France least of all. The other differences were equally conspicuous: In England, every organ in the social system—every division and order of people having a

* Most readers have been taught to regard Charles X. as a poor victim of superstition. And the noble Dauphiness has been traduced in the same way. A superstitious faith, however, is better than none at all. But suppose, that they live habitually under such a sense of divine power, as the great chastisements of Providence upon their illustrious house, and their own individual calamities, are fitted to maintain in meditative minds;—that would be sufficient in Paris to account for the reputation which has settled upon them.

corporate existence, or known to the constitution—every depository of power, wealth, or territorial influence, co-operated cheerfully to the common deliverance. The House of Commons did not, as their first act, attack the House of Peers in their fundamental privileges and existence; both concurred energetically in the one sole redress which the graciousness of Providence at that time pointed out. Both Houses merged their party dissensions in the general welfare. Whigs and Tories met in the same course of policy. The church had spoken authentically from the very first. The bishops had stood the wrath of the king, and had paid their tribute to the common contribution in the Tower. The lower clergy had refused to read the mandates of the court. The universities had stood prominently forward; Oxford, in particular, took the first step in the revolution, by the stout resistance of one of her colleges. The lords-tenant of counties, sheriffs, and inferior magistrates exerted themselves, each in his proper sphere. Many other public bodies signalized their concurrence in efforts appropriate, by kind and by degree, to their peculiar position. And, finally, even the army, except where Papists had been treacherously introduced into the ranks, testified their patriotism, by falling away from a prince who had not confined himself to a single act of violence, in maintenance of rights furiously and systematically assailed; but had maniacally proclaimed, for the whole course of his reign, that he was ready to sacrifice both life and throne, rather than one iota of his plot for denying that legal liberty to the consciences of his subjects, which, in defiance of all old English law, had been granted to his own.

In France, upon looking for the parallel which the English journalist assures us of, we find every feature of the correspondence failing. But the civil disunion of a great country announces itself, according to circumstances, by two different languages; either by that of open and triumphant discord, or, in cases where it happens that the balance of the several forces is utterly overthrown, by blank negations and expressive silence. The mob is the power which at present lords it far and wide; whenever men are conscious that, upon any offence offered to a popular idol, a tumultuary force will in a few hours collect as rapidly as thunder-clouds in summer, and will visit political offences upon the property and persons of the obnoxious parties, with a power that is beyond even the control of armies,—there it is evident that the mob, though not always visibly dictating, are always present potentially, and by the terror of their influence. Nothing is free at this moment in Paris which is in opposition to the popular will. The little opposition which, in any case, seems to have been offered, is simply to some fraction of the people. Really unpopular sentiments are now uttered at a risk which few have the courage to encounter. In reality, few can stand in a situation which imposes any duty of that magnitude upon them. Hence, between the peril on the one hand, and the absence of any adequate call of duty on the other, we have little at this moment of the real voice of France, and the true sense of her enlightened citizens, as it would be found in their private and confidential correspondence. Yet, whenever accident, or necessity, or local security, gives it a free utterance, we find nothing but distraction through the land. The House of Representatives acted but as the obedient tool of the mob, as a formal organ for registering or countersigning their decrees. The House of Peers did not act at all; but was terrified and offended—angrily protested, and then timidly assented. The ecclesiastical body are in universal disgust and opposition; the bishops have either protested, as at Orleans, or have retired from public service, as at Marseilles. The prefects, (who may be considered as corresponding to our lords-tenant of counties,) and the inferior magistracy, are evidently hostile, in a vast proportion, to the new order of things, as appears by the very extensive dismissals which have been already reported. Finally, the army has not (as in the English Revolution it did) felt any summons of conscience to desert the king; but has adhered to him until he himself, by quitting

France, silently admonished them to comply with the necessities of the times, and the suggestions of a pacific policy. In short, it appears that the Revolution in France is the work of a party, and has begun by trampling on the rights of those who are liable to any suspicion, from their character or their position, of viewing it with hostile eyes. The Revolution of England was the work of the nation; opposed by no party at all then known to the state; and leaving the cause of James utterly without support, except from his personal adherents, who professed no public principles of any kind, or from those nonjuring bigots, who, though condemning the king's conduct, were yet embarrassed by extravagant notions of a divine and indefeasible right in kings, paramount to any considerations of national welfare. In one sole feature have the two revolutions any resemblance, and let that not be overlooked:—James II. was ruined by popish counsels falling in with his own popish bigotry; and in whatever degree it shall hereafter appear that Charles X. was actuated definitively by serious designs in the spirit of the late ordinances, it must be recollected that his delusions are of the same origin: the unlimited influence of the priesthood, which on other grounds is sufficiently suspected, can alone explain a policy (supposing that it shall appear to have been a final one) so exceedingly incompatible with the general temper of the age. It is a known fact, that the Romish priests, still adhering to the literature of a past era, expurgated for their private use—reading no journals that would set them on the level of the times to which they belong, and associating chiefly with their own order, or with any other only in the character of confessors and teachers, are superannuated in their political creed, and the spirit of their political calculations, to an extent which would not be credible on a less exclusive education. Meaning to be the guardians and buttresses of thrones, yet, of necessity for their own preservation, cherishing darkness, and wilfully separating themselves from their age, they have ruined two dynasties the most splendid in the world.

With this single exception for the part played by Popish influence, in all besides, the French Revolution of 1830 has no point of affinity to that of Great Britain. Its true affinities, as we affirmed last month, are to the former Revolution of France herself. All the appearances, up to the present hour, fall in with that view. Take but one instance: The House of Representatives have been quite sufficiently eager in the service of that power which effected this democratic Revolution, and in attacking the aristocracy. Yet so far are this house from meeting the cravings of the popular party, that a violent cabal is now at work to extort from the king their speedy dissolution. Should that succeed, France will then have a new Chamber, returned by a new and extended class of electors, and under the immediate excitement of a revolutionary ferment. The composition of this body, considering the large infusion of democracy which it cannot fail to receive under the new law of election, will aggravate the dangers of France, whenever it shall happen. But, at this particular moment, a change of that character would carry forward that perilous spirit of licentious legislation, upon which all the prudent men of Paris are sensible that it is necessary to hang retarding weights, with an accelerated pace. Coming at this crisis, a new election would ensure the return of a House resembling, in its ferocity and its destroying activities, the old Convention: unfortunately at some period, sooner or later, it must come. Meantime, whatever may be the issue of that question, clubs are forming of the most alarming character, and placards are issued in a temper altogether incendiary. That which is ascribed to a society called the Friends of the People, (published in the London journals of September 17 and 18,) speaks the language of pure Jacobinical fanaticism as powerfully as any thing which appeared between 1790 and 1794.

But, if all these dangers were past or evaded, two will remain, of so formidable a character, that no discretion in the legislative body—no forbearance in the people, or (which is still more improbable) in the organs of the people, can by any possibility redress them or abate them. The King is annihilated, as regards his functions in the constitution; this is the first evil: and the second is, that the army is annihilated as the creature of public authority. We should be glad to know in what point of real power the new King of the French has the advantage over his unhappy predecessor, Louis XVI., in that most slippery of stations—the throne of a republic. In one point, he is clearly below him—Louis did not owe his elevation to the people: then he had to thank only for the limitations of his office. But the present King, being so memorably the creature of one mob, for any right that he can plead, may be laid aside at the pleasure of another. And as to power, separated from right, if, in the present temper of France, he could venture upon an appeal of that kind, without an aristocracy to create a system of influence in his behalf, without an army to enforce his authority, what could he effect? He remains, what no doubt fulfils the utmost intentions of his constituents, a royal shadow—a state phantom, interfering by no chance with the reversionary hopes (as they will gradually evolve) of republicanism—and, for the present, a propitiation to the potentates of Europe, by which some of them at least will be duped. As to the army, it is singular to observe with how much blind exactness every thing has obeyed the precedent of 1789, in the relations of this great body to the state, and also in the internal relations of its own members. We have recently heard of the private soldiers in French regiments cashiering their officers, and electing new ones. In 1790, Mr Burke complained that “the principle of obedience” had been destroyed “in the great essential critical link between the officer and the soldier.” And how? Was it that any change in the military code expressly authorized such perilous novelties? Not exactly so, (though, in fact, some proposition of that nature was at one time favourably entertained by the Constituent Assembly,) but practices like these followed constructively upon the general doctrines of the day. “The soldier,” said Burke, (Reflections on the Revolution, p. 441,) “is told—he is a citizen, and has the rights of man and citizen. The right of a man, he is told, is to be his own governor, and to be ruled only by those to whom he delegates that self-government. It is very natural he should think that he ought, most of all, to have his choice where he is to yield the greatest degree of obedience. He will, therefore, in all probability, systematically do what he does at present occasionally; that is, he will exercise at least a negative in the choice of his officer. At present the officers are known at best to be only permissive, and on their good behaviour. In fact, there have been many instances in which they have been cashiered by their corps.” But were it otherwise—had the internal organisation of the army remained unaffected by the contagion of democracy, still the external relations of the soldier to the state are vitiated. The same great political philosopher, to whom every body must feel their reverence revived in these times, if it were only for the prophetic sagacity with which, so early as in 1790, he pointed out the inevitable termination of this martial anarchy in the rise of “some popular general,” who should make himself “the master of the whole republic,” insisted at that time upon the unusual necessity which had arisen to the civil power for the service of an army in supporting its authority. And why? Because the doctrines then promulgated, certainly not more so than at this moment, had “industriously destroyed all the prejudices and opinions, and, as far as possible, all the instincts, which support government.” In this extinction of moral force, no substitute remained but the physical force of armies. Yet again, by a perverse necessity of their own creation, the governing power of France had corrupted this instrument in those days: and that through a doctrine circulated with much less emphasis than at present. “You must rule,” said Burke, “by an army; and you have infused into that army principles, which, after a time, must disable you in the use you resolve to make of it. The king is to call out troops to act against his people, when the world has been told, and the assertion is still ringing in our ears, that troops ought not to fire on citizens.”

These evils were remedied in the progress of that revolution by foreign war; they could have been remedied by no other. It is a prevailing notion, and in fact it has tended unduly to depreciate the authority of Mr Burke and of Mr Pitt, that the French republic was in fact forced into the development of her strength by the menaces and the assaults of her royal enemies; that the mere necessities of self-defence gradually drew her forward into her tremendous system of aggression. But this, though wearing a show of truth as to the letter, is false substantially. For, not to mention the previous aggression of her revolutionary overtures and solicitations, that diplomacy of sedition and revolt which she maintained in all countries, it is certain that the intrinsic evils in the composition of her army, and its real inefficiency for any of the applications by which the shattered authority of government sought to supply its own weakness, admitted of no cure but by plunging it into active service against a real enemy. A soldier, perfectly inefficient in his proper character, might be fatally efficient as an armed citizen supporting the sedition of the burgher by his own insubordination. The same evil recurring in these times, and from the very same cause, can be met only by the same remedy. War, however, if it is in her own choice to evade it, doubtless France will decline at this moment; because, under the circumstances of her present position, any war would assume a character which would be likely to attract a general alliance of crowned heads; it would be too obviously a struggle between Jacobinism and the thrones of Christendom. France, therefore, will wait, if she is permitted, until the critical era is past over for giving a character to the war so dangerous to her views; she will seek for a quarrel upon other grounds, such as will permit her to pick her enemy. But the state of a belligerent, as soon as she can attain it upon a colour of less ominous pretence, she is in a moral necessity of courting; in that way only will she find it possible to re-baptize her now civic soldiery into their old and indispensable relations to the state.

War, indeed, is now possible upon other grounds, growing, however, immediately from the same; and some of them are such as may almost compel England, however crippled by her financial condition,* to move in that direction according to the poor ability that remains to her. She is bound by treaty to the Netherlands; she paid, and with a profusion wholly uncalled for, the cost of establishing the barrier fortresses. Even the Duke of Wellington, ridiculously as he has neglected our foreign policy, understands their value; for he has received, we believe, a considerable sum for express tours of inspection, to provide against any chance of their being neglected. He cannot look on with indifference, and suffer the present monstrous revolution in Brussels, Liege, Louvain, &c. to take its course. Nor, if he should fail in his duty, will the marriage ties of Russia and Prussia suffer them to be quiescent. Besides, that this revolution, under the most puerile mimicry of that in Paris, is really without a pretext: grievances there were none; and when asked what they wanted at the first outbreak of the tumults, the citizens, thrown suddenly upon a perplexing question, as yet unconsidered and "premature," replied, after a long pause,—"Justice!" as though any special act of oppression could have wanted a special name. The simple truth is, that, being Papists, whilst the seven United Provinces happened to be Protestants, the universal distinction which holds between the reformed churches and the idolatrous church of Rome, is conspicuously illustrated in this case. The Dutch are the and enterprising—the Belgians retrograde; the Dutch enlightened—the Belgians bigoted and ignorant. Hence the impartiality of the Court, which confessedly had no prejudice to the Belgians, and was open to any merit they could bring forward, did but the more conspicuously proclaim the Dutch superiority. Real injustice would secretly have delighted the Belgians, since, in that case, they might have charged upon the hostility of the government what, as things are, too flagrantly expresses the low condition of Belgic intellect: a condition which is entirely due to Poverty.

* A writer in the Dublin Evening Post, though arguing, some weeks back, with considerable ingenuity, for the probability of war, yet forgets himself so far as to say, "It is inferred naturally enough that the Powers of the Continent cannot go to war while the purse-strings of England are closed." But this policy, besides that it is impossible, is superannuated; already in the last great and ever-memorable coalition, the subsidizing system was abandoned.

The many other disturbances in Germany, which last month we pointed out as inevitable—those, for example, in the Prussian city of Aix-la-Chapelle, in the territory of Hesse Cassel, of Hesse Darmstadt, of Brunswick, and, above all, in various cities of Saxony—will excite a fearful sympathy in the Cabinets of Berlin and Vienna. And if, in any of these instances, especially on behalf of Belgium, the vanity of France should for one moment seduce her from her commanding interest of neutrality—such a movement would infallibly determine all the powerful courts of the Continent to active hostilities. The state of Piedmont will immediately call down an overwhelming Austrian force into the North of Italy. And, in that position, a trifle may light up war with France, whose powerful motives to peace may easily give way to the irritability of republicanism, and the vivacity of the national temperament.

For England, if it were otherwise possible by her finances, and acceptable to her Cabinet, war would at this time, we are satisfied, be resolutely negatived by the voice of the people. What is shewy and flattering in the condition of France is obvious to the popular feeling; what is menacing, and points with terrific solemnity to ourselves and the disease in our vitals, is a little in the rear, and withdrawn from the notice of the inconsiderate. Never yet was any nation in the condition of England; her whole constitution of political power, as it exists both in church and state, being the object of profound hatred from all classes below the gentry, and of long—earnest—and systematic hostility from the press. Even against British property in various modes, there exists an organized conspiracy—against the property of the West Indians—against the property of the fundholders, and, finally, against the property of the church. But above all, the great and paramount conspiracy lies against the guardian of all our property and rights—the aristocracy of the land—the accumulation of landed property upon which that order is built, and the primal safeguard both of the property and the order—the law of primogeniture. So long as the aristocracy and the church subsist, so long England will retain her place amongst nations. But if a breach is made in either, upon those principles of wicked and desolating spoliation, which are now listened to both in and out of Parliament, and by a far different class from that which would have lent them any countenance thirty years ago, all is lost; and we are thenceforth at the mercy of a revolutionary spirit, and a frenzy of democracy, more powerful, if once unchained, in this country even than in France. If the indirect influence of the aristocracy upon the House of Commons, by means of the close boroughs, were once destroyed, the one sole equipoise is gone by which at present we make head against the democratic forces of the great commercial districts. Left to themselves, the manufacturing body and half-educated tradesmen would act, all England through, as Yorkshire has lately acted, in one conspicuous instance. Yet, with these tendencies in the people, who are every day rising in that half knowledge which is of no avail, except for evil, it is a melancholy fact, that the weak Cabinets we have lately seen, are more and more co-operating. It is now rumoured, that reforms in Parliament, of a character which, if they do not even greatly strengthen the popular cause, will countenance the worst plans of that kind, are likely to be proposed in the next Session by the ministers themselves. This cannot surprise us: since we know already, by the Catholic Bill, that no sacrifices of the Constitution would be scrupled if they gave one chance more for any personal object. These ministers will not, perhaps, long afflict us. But it is a sad consideration for us all, that with every reason to anticipate a rather long minority, and a female reign, naturally full of faction and change, coinciding also, too probably, with times of general confusion for Europe,—we have no man now before the public, who is pointed out by his rank, and at the same time, by commanding powers, as a minister matched with the times.

All the evils which beset us are aggravated by the closeness of our present connexion with France, and the irreligious character of the age. In the former revolution, there was nothing in this country which lent force to the contagion of its evil, and we were soon separated from its communion by war. At present, war is for us almost impossible, and the temper and principles of the country are dangerously altered. Perhaps England is not more immoral than in 1790: but politically it is brought much nearer to the temper of presumptuous revolution; and the religious principles and the religious heart of the country are sapped, in a degree which renders it probable that we shall be delivered up to a spirit of eminent delusion, until great calamities and national humiliation fit us for being reclaimed. Lord Wilton, at the late Manchester dinner, reasonably complained of the hatred which prevails to the aristocracy. It is through that quarter that the French Revolution will appear to have given us our most searching wound. Previously to that event, (by causes which it would require a separate essay to unfold, but chiefly by the systematic assaults of the metropolitan press,) that order had been continually losing ground; and a body of malignant Jacobinism had been attracted to every aspect under which it connects itself with the public service. And now, when many channels of communication have been opened, and a regular connexion and sympathy proclaimed for the first time with a great country which glories in having destroyed the few and weak influences of her aristocracy that yet survived, there is every chance that a continued irritation will be supplied to our worst political infirmity. We of this journal love liberty with truth and simplicity: and had we seen any prospect of service to that great cause in the French Revolution, we should have been among the first to hail it with gratitude. But in the destruction of those bulwarks which stand between us all and democratic frenzy, we saw no ground for congratulation to any party. In every quarter of the horizon we desery little else than clouds and storm; we see the certainty of troubled times, and infinite confusions; manifold strife and disunion, with little final gain; and a long course of national chastisements and humiliations too probably at hand, both to the French and to ourselves.

It is stated in the note, p. 548 of our last Number, that the "D. de Berri left two children, the eldest a son." We find, however, that this is a mistake, and that the eldest was a daughter—Mademoiselle; the younger was the D. de Bourdeaux, a posthumous child, and of course the youngest.

POLITICAL ANTICIPATIONS.

SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE, a brilliant diplomatist, and practically acquainted with his own age, expressed, upon one occasion, his sense of the importance which belonged to a particular year by a striking figure:—transferring to time an attribute of space, he described that year as the summit of a physical elevation, from which the many currents took their rise that afterwards were likely to swell into mighty rivers, and from which, therefore, the entire prospect of many generations to come could, in some sense, be commanded. We ourselves are in such a year. This, if any ever was, is a year of boundless change and preparation for change, in which every crown has waned, and a shadow of coming evil has settled upon all thrones. At one time we had resolved to keep a journal, registering the different districts of Europe according to the order of succession in which the political storm swept over them, and noticing the most striking forms which it assumed, and the stages through which it travelled. This has now ceased to be possible; attention could not be commanded to the long catalogue of convulsions and insurrectionary movements. The question is no longer—which are the lands that have yielded to the contagion of the times; but where—in what secret corner of Europe, are those which have resisted it? Christendom, from north to south—east and west—is now mastered by the frenzy of revolution: some countries are reaping the perfect harvest of ancient jacobinical training: some have been manured plentifully for approaching opportunities by the emissaries of secret societies, in many instances, in all by immediate sympathy with the prosperous insurrections of neighbouring states: the press, everywhere expanding into a more tremendous organization, and being everywhere governed chiefly by the aspiring and the needy, co-operates with ferocious energy: the prestige of regular armies, under merciful commanders, in conflict with great cities, is finally dissolved: with the forms of Titans, rising up from the earth against the potentates of the civilized world, their ancient weapons are slipping from their faltering grasp: old things are passed away, and the spirit of desolating change is unchained through every Christian land—never more to be sealed up in slumber and repose, until, after infinite havoc, mere exhaustion shall have performed the work of civil prudence, or strong military despotisms shall have again locked up the tumultuous agitations of the capital cities throughout Europe into the silence of universal prisons.

It is not true that men are disposed to exaggerate the importance of their own times. Their tendency is in the other direction, and for the same reason that they undervalue the great men who are contemporary with themselves, and owe nothing to the elevating power of abstraction which belongs to remote distance. We feel, upon many grounds, that we are justified in ascribing to this present year the dignity of an era far more important even than that of 1788. That was but the beginning of woes. A few words of explanation on this point will serve also to set us right on another, which has drawn upon us some reproach. Several critics, who were otherwise friendly to our views, have taxed us with injustice to Mr Pitt, in the strictures we hazarded upon his policy at the epoch of 1793. We had ventured to suppose that perhaps he was too severe in the measures which he took for struggling with jacobinism, and vigorous beyond the occasion. In this we may have been wrong; but let the extent of our objection be fully understood:—Mr Pitt's policy, as the appropriate instrument for dealing with the jacobinical mania, we approve. It is with respect to the time and occasion which called for it that, with the hesitation due to so great a man, we find ourselves compelled to dissent. Viewed simply in and for itself, the power of jacobinism was an awful one during and after the reign of terror in France. But, if we turned our eyes to the temper and preparation of the recipients throughout Europe, it was not awful. There is, indeed, a native jacobinism lurking in all human hearts,—a hatred, in the abstract, to authority seated in weak human administrators, and a wish to see the distinctions of merit, originally created by nature, supplanting those which are created by law and arbitrary institutions. This jacobinism has manifested itself largely on many great occasions of modern history; in the insurrection of Jack Cade and Ball, in the Jacquerie, in the ferocious tumults of the German peasantry at the period of the Reformation, in the English Levellers of the age of Cromwell, &c. &c.; and at no era could it have been appealed to wholly without effect. So far, therefore, the jacobins of 1793 had an inert ally in the heart of poor men of every nation. But at that time it had not been extensively excited or cultivated, nor for any long period; and in very many it was held in a state of neutrality by opposite prejudices of ancient growth, and in some by moral or religious principles. Even where these had no influence, prudential ones supplied their place, by suggesting to each individual, that, without distinguished personal merit, he had little chance of benefiting much by a revolution, and that with such distinctions his chance was a good one for at least an equal success in paths countenanced by the existing state of things. The plants, therefore, were ready; but the soil was not then prepared to receive them. Now, in 1830, all this is changed; Europe is overshadowed, as by some great Hercynian forest, with a rank growth of anti-social desires and disorganizing principles. Forty years have been sufficient to prepare the minds of the poor and illiterate for cheerful co-operation with any mode of civil revolution. The wars which grew out of the first French revolution, have impoverished all Europe. In this country, above all, the legacy which these wars bequeathed to us now presses with such overbearing weight upon the nation, that every man—the meanest, poorest, humblest—is aware, notwithstanding the very small proportion in which the working classes do really contribute to the revenue, that the abolition of the national debt, or even the reduction of the interest upon it by one half, would instantaneously improve his condition by lightening essentially the burden upon those above him. Here then, if there were no other, is a definite temptation to innovating schemes, a bounty upon insurrection, which cannot be gainsaid by the wisest and most moderate among us. And for the ten thousand chimerical boons held out by the jacobinical tempters, if they stand no better final chance of being realised in this year than they did in 1793, yet how widely diffused—as compared with that era—are the plausible and specious grounds upon which the tempters build at present! In short, at the dawn of the first French revolution, whatever activity was put forth in bringing all neighbouring countries within the circle of revolutionary intrigues, it found no other ally than that spirit of discontent which is coeval with the human mind—which has existed under every form of government alike, and will continue for ever to threaten the very best. On the other hand, at present (so infinite is the change!) every individual understanding amongst the most ignorant and excitable classes, the classes who think that they have nothing at all to lose, has been brought under captivity to arguments, specifically adapted to their weakness and guilty wishes, in favour of designs which were previously but too attractive to their minds. In 1793, Jacobinism relied upon man with his natural infirmities: in 1830, it relies upon man trained and disciplined to discern an interest in pursuing their suggestions.

Hence, upon comparing the two epochs, we were disposed to doubt the necessity of a policy so rigorous as Mr Pitt's, in a condition of danger so eminently inferior to the present. The whole is a question of degree: but it is evident at least that, if Mr Pitt's measures of restraint were necessary in his time—à fortiori, and ten thousand times over, they are necessary in ours—the very time when no such measures, no measures in that direction of any degree or quality whatsoever, will be attempted or would be tolerated; when there is neither courage in our rulers to try the experiment, nor temper in the people to endure it. For it is the peculiar characteristic of our age, that the enormous growth of those very principles of disaffection to the state, which so forcibly call for the resumption of Mr Pitt's policy, does of itself almost preclude the most timid imitation of it,—even though William Pitt and Harry Dundas should rise from the dead, and could evoke to their assistance, from the shades of time, that same Parliament who vigorously seconded their efforts; that Parliament who drove Charles Fox, the true Demosthenes of England, simply because he philippized, and either did not or would not see the dangers of the crisis, into the necessity of an abject secession. But, alas! for our Parliaments,—they now assemble with a sort of halter about their necks. They are felt, and they feel themselves, to exist in some measure upon sufferance and good behaviour. They are too much threatened, to venture upon threatening; too much themselves a mark for the experiments of licentious innovation in the one extreme, to hazard experiments of vigour in the other. Then for the Minister who should represent William Pitt, where is he? Is it the old withered pantaloon, who now presides at the Treasury Board? Is that the man who should wield the weapons, or launch the thunderbolts, of Pitt? Is he a likely person to shake the Senate, or put his hook in the nostrils of leviathan? Call him up as he was when fresh and buoyant with exultation from that energetic act of sweeping five thousand vagrant wretches into the waters of the Malpurba,* and it must be confessed that if the one paramount qualification for a minister who would emulate Mr Pitt, were a blood-stained hand and vigour beyond the law, that might be pleaded in those days by him who now leads the councils of England. But those days are gone by for thirty years. Or, if mere treachery to the constitution were a sufficient title for administering our government, that he has to shew of a very recent date. But alas! treachery of that sort could at no time have won any man but Mr O'Connell; and now it will no longer purchase a smooth word from him.

With enemies so mighty to face, with no better leaders to face them, the English cabinet of this day, as compared with that of Mr Pitt, may be valued as children compared with men; and the subalterns of the cabinet are confessedly even more deficient in the qualities for confronting a great crisis—if that is possible—than their miserable leaders. Yet, when we reflect upon the nature of this crisis, and ask ourselves to what it tends, we feel the imperative call which it makes for Mr Pitt's policy; and that, comparatively speaking at least, that policy was premature—being adapted, by its vigour, to a scale of dangers by a thousand times greater than that which did, in fact, produce it. It was adapted to the kind of evil which Mr Pitt contemplated, but not, in our opinion, to the degree. That degree is now developed and matured; it will be met by a system in the order of means natural and appropriate to those “sons of the feeble” who now sit in the seat of Mr Pitt. The simple truth is, that, with the single exception of Prince Metternich, there is not one statesman of this day in Europe, on a level with the times and the emergency of 1830.

Hence arose that opinion of ours upon Mr Pitt, which has provoked the censure of some amongst our friends. Assuredly those are wrong, who suppose us to feel any thing short of the highest admiration for that great man. And, indeed, the very-terms of our strictures, and the regret which we expressed, that his energy had not been reserved to our own times, sufficiently imply that we thought his system the sole adequate engine for measuring forces with jacobinism; although it is true that, taking into consideration the immature development of jacobinism in his day, we were disposed to think his vigour beyond the occasion. In this, we repeat that we are willing to believe ourselves wrong; and doubtless it is true, that if, in Great Britain, the whole population in every rank was untainted and sound, in Ireland it was not so: there, from the very highest, the premier house of the peerage, down to the very lowest, a general disaffection to the English government prevailed. It is possible that we did not sufficiently allow for Mr Pitt's difficulties. But, on the other hand, if in any thing we underrated the political evils of his day, undeniably we do not overrate those of our own. Look at the face of Europe, look at England, and now—when one of the capital mounds which protected us all from the inundation of levelling principles, has given way to popular violence, in the sudden overthrow and virtual abolition of royalty in France—let us calculate what we have to expect from this day forward. How many millions of human hearts, what a long line of princes and nations, have had reasons for rueful sympathy with the first French revolution! But it will easily appear, that we have not exaggerated in pronouncing the present a far more important era; and that to the events of July 1830, will be traced up hereafter the woes and political sufferings of all European nations. This epoch will furnish a date for future times, more memorable than the crusades, the colonization of a new world, the Reformation, or any of those mighty events which have thrown society into new moulds, or given a new impulse and direction to the activity of nations.

* See Sir Arthur Wellesley's own account of this memorable transaction in the third volume of Sir Thomas Monro's Correspondence.

Let us begin our survey by a few hints on points in close connexion with our subject, but likely to be overlooked—on France, in her relations to the rest of Europe; on the peculiar Statistics of modern nations, as affected by commerce and debts; and, finally, on the Press, its actual and its possible extent of influence.

France, speaking of her morally, is more emphatically central to Europe, than ever before any nation has been to other nations not federally connected in the same political system. A celebrated continental philosopher wrote an essay expressly insisting upon the stupendous interest manifested by all Christendom in revolutionary France as a novel phenomenon in the history of man, honourable, and in the highest sense hopeful, and of triumphant promise for the future advancement of the human species. His reason for viewing it in this light was, that to him it proclaimed a disinterested sympathy with man as a moral being, and on purely moral grounds. As to the interpretation of this universal and violent sympathy, we differ with the foreign philosopher. We conceive that it arises out of the general diffusion of the French language, which (however poor for higher purposes) furnishes the greatest possible variety of expressions for those distinctions which are likely to occur in colloquial intercourse; secondly, out of the popular cast of the French prose literature; and thirdly, out of the dramatic interest and showy character of the French history for the three last centuries, diffused by the long series of French private memoirs. Other causes co-operate; and none of them, we believe, so honourable to the feelings of Europe as the philosopher in question imagined. But whatever be the key to this catholic sympathy with France, and her concerns, the fact is undeniable, that such a sympathy does exist, and in the liveliest form; every note of national feeling in France, joyful or sorrowful, is immediately reverberated from the remotest quarters of Europe. Hence arises an advantage of position for the experiments of the modern jacobins and innovators, greater than could be compensated to them by any other benefit whatsoever, in a different land. Even a much greater success elsewhere would operate far less in their favour, and less powerfully forward their final objects. In this respect, it may be laid down as an axiom in politics, familiarly known to all the disorganizers of social institutions as they now exist in Europe, that France bears to the rest of Christendom, a relation corresponding to that of the heart in the animal system; and that every important blow struck, is propagated to the very outposts and extremities of civilisation with incomparably more certainty, velocity, and effect from Paris, than it could be from any other quarter of the globe. England, it is true, is contemplated with more admiration, more awe, more uniform respect. But something in the manner of Englishmen, the reserve, misconstrued into hauteur, the chilling dignity, the uniform jealousy of personal contamination from too familiar intercourse with people whose pretensions are not distinctly appraised; all this has given to the English character an unamiable and repulsive air with those who know us superficially: whilst the insular position of England, and the uncertainty of her connexion with continental politics, depending (as it does) upon the humour of a Minister, or the financial views of a House of Commons, makes it a matter of necessity that England should be less uniformly included in the views of continental schemes of revolution. But the French affability—their courtesy to strangers, and gaiety of demeanour, universally recommend them, where nothing occurs peculiarly to search or probe their principles; whilst the absolute impossibility of detaching France for a single instant from the continental system, concurs, with the other causes we have mentioned, to point the eyes of all Europe with intense interest to every movement of this showy nation. Hence, in a degree unknown to the world at any former period, the political revolutionists of our times have a fulcrum in the very name of Paris, for supporting the machinery of those enormous levers, by which they operate on the rest of the world.

And we repeat, that, by means of this European sympathy with France, all political impressions are propagated, unimpaired and unbroken, in a way which binds the entire continent into one household, and which could not have been achieved by the most perfect mechanic agency of the Press, taken singly. Meantime,

Secondly, this also is necessary as a concurring instrument; and, accordingly, the Press has advanced, and is, by determinate movements, advancing, to the rank of a perfect ally. We go back fondly to the æra of the invention of printing as a capital step in the progress of man, and the harbinger of a new stage in civilisation. It was so; but wherefore? Had it been found impossible, in times long forerunning that great discovery, to carry on extensive intellectual commerce? Far from it: the system of copiers, and the full publication of books for the classes who sought them, were matured even in Pagan Rome before the Christian æra. In what, then, lay the benefit of printing? In this,* that by creating the possibility of a large diffusion of this luxury, it created almost simultaneously a commensurate class of demanders. By extending the means of enjoyment, it extended the wish to enjoy. This, then, was no improvement in kind upon the previous system of copiers, but simply an improvement in degree. Now, unquestionably, in the various inventions, substitutions, and abridgements of labour applied to all the arts connected with the press and the paper manufacture for the last forty years, printing has advanced at least as much upon itself and its own early achievements in the middle of the fifteenth century, as those did upon the system of manual transcription. If books, when manuscripts, ranked with paintings and statues as the luxuries of senators and nobles, but were first diffused amongst needy scholars, and the middle classes generally, by means of printing; it is no less certain, that by improved printing, and concurrent improvements in the arts allied to it, books and journals of every order are now rapidly coming into the hands of the humblest poor. In the American United States, even newspapers are multiplied with an enormous profusion, and at a cost so trifling, that with some improvements applied to the art of compiling such journals, they are likely to supply as much and as useful reading as a poor man's daily labours will allow him to indulge. Why are they not diffused in the same vast extent through Europe? Simply because the state interferes everywhere at present to cut short the circulation by heavy taxation, the object in this being notoriously, not mere revenue, (for there is no direct tax levied upon books,) but the very wise one of applying a sufflumen, or drag, to the ruinous diffusion of political irritation, in carrying speculations so intelligible, and so easily abused, to the firesides of the poor. Every thing, however, announces that a prodigious effort will be made, both in France and England, to abolish all taxes upon the publication of newspapers, and perhaps (as in America) nearly all charges of the post office upon their conveyance. In France, we are satisfied that this will be obtained in no long time—already the stamp duty is abandoned by the government. In England, where sobriety of mind and good sense are more general and more available, the resistance will be longer and more strenuous. But there also, in a few short years, it will give way to the far more zealous combination of bad men for bad purposes. Next, both in France and England, we shall have smaller, coarser, and in that respect also far cheaper newspapers, in size and appearance resembling those of France. Next, we shall have societies for distributing even these at diminished prices; and societies again amongst the poor for passing them rapidly from hand to hand. And as it is often observable that arts which are in a measure subsidiary and ministerial to each other, advance, by mere accident, apparently, in harmonious steps; so here it is worthy of notice, that exactly the subjects of intellectual enjoyment have been carried down amongst the poor, the means of enjoying them have made an independent progress almost pari passu. Immense exertions have been pushed forward by good men and bad men throughout Europe for the last twenty-five years to promote the education of the poor: and at the very moment when books (as we rejoice to know) and newspapers (as we tremble to anticipate) are on the point of being carried plentifully amongst that class, the whole body are in the fullest state of preparation to read and understand them, and to follow out the worst appeals of incendiary demagogues, in the worst spirit, and to the last results. Knowledge, true knowledge, does not grow with the growth of mechanic skill in the arts of reading, writing, and arithmetic. Conceit and discontent are the natural products of such accomplishments, unless where they are accompanied by that discipline of sober thinking, which forms no part of the modern system of tuition for the poor, and assuredly is not the natural associate of poverty. Let no man cling to deceptions. The press, the incendiary press, is on the eve of a great revolution. Books never can accomplish the objects of the revolutionists. The blow must be repeated from day to day, to work any durable change: and the effectual circulation and operation of poisonous and corrupting doctrines must be secured by combining them with the excitement of daily news and daily rumours. One solitary barrier stands between the jacobins and this darling purpose: the whole machinery of their mighty engine is complete—a populace that can read, a press that can print with marvellous cheapness, and a system of public conveyances that can distribute with a speed that would have been pronounced impossible fifteen years ago, and which is at this moment looking forward to indefinite improvements. The exchequer interposes, and locks up these tremendous energies of power on the one hand, and capacity on the other, arrayed, as it were, face to face. How long do we suppose that, in the present temper of the public mind, this will be endured? As things are, a daily paper is a costly article both to those who sell and to those who buy:

* It has been suggested, on occasion of the ancient Roman affiches found against the sides of houses in the buried city at Portici, that perhaps the true obstacle to the further diffusion of this very obvious invention, was the want of any paper sufficiently cheap; and that, therefore, the true discovery which set the art of printing in motion, was that of manufacturing paper from substances easily and cheaply obtained in sufficient abundance.

the capital necessary to establish such a vehicle of sedition, not less (we have been assured) than fifteen thousand pounds, is of itself a security for some prudence and moderation in its politics. The monopoly which results is the original temptation to the capitalist, and his subsequent protection. Hence even those who are the most jacobinical in heart amongst the proprietors of the daily press, whether in London or in Paris, as in other respects they have been obliged to mask their inclinations, in this carry even their sincere inclinations, under the bribe of overruling self-interest, to the anti-democratic cause.

But, though backed by the government, and powerful by the organ through which they act, how feeble will they find themselves in conflict with the forces of jacobinism, when once organized, and understanding their own position! Besides, that the governments, both of France and England, are now pursuing the policy of propitiation and concession; the first from dire necessity, the other from infatuated weakness. In France, therefore, as we have said, the stamp-duty is abandoned for some nominal substitute. In England, should the Duke of Wellington continue in power for two sessions more, he will volunteer the remission of these duties as a peace-offering to the mob. In that case, the same capital will suffice for a daily paper which now suffices for the Sunday papers of London, viz. one or two hundred pounds, and the reputation of having been well and severely kicked for repeated libels and scurrilous calumnies. Upon no better funds than these, various conductors of political journals have rushed into notoriety. And hence the anxiety they shew, which to mere rustics is perplexing, to advertise and certify to the world the thickness of the cudgel by which they have been chastised. Naturally, indeed, when all pecuniary hostages for good behaviour are remitted, and men of desperate fortunes resort to so uncertain a mode of livelihood, they will pursue it in the spirit of pirates and buccaneers. Once thrown open to the spirit of needy rapacious adventure, the press of the provinces, where men are more amenable to the court of public opinion, may still, by possibility, retain some deference to the decencies of life; but the London newspaper press will abandon itself to a ruffianism worse by much, because more ingenious and elaborately varied, than that of Kentucky. Nor will the law of libel at all avail in so great a multitude of offences and offenders. The government will then experimentally learn the solid force of the plea put forward on this subject by Polignac and his brethren; "to what purpose," they argued, "for the king's attorney to select six, perhaps from as many thousands of libels published within a short space of time, and to press the matter forward to a conviction through the circuitous forms of law—infinite loss of time—infinite expense—and the possibility of final defeat and mortification to the crown, when, in the very best result, the libeller's expenses will be reimbursed to him by a public subscription; and when, on that same day which witnesses a decision of a jury against some solitary case, scores of others, emboldened by their very multitude, and the conscious assurance of impunity to the large majority, are swimming through the meshes of the offended law?"* All things tend to this consummation. Paris has read the text, and acted upon it in the face of Europe. A steady and determined outcry will commence at the proper season for this boon.† The Duke of Wellington

* Let it not be said, that by this reference to Polignac, we are insinuating a necessity for his scheme of redressing the evil by further restraints upon the press; we disclaim all such wishes: the present restraints are sufficient; but we are certain, that by a timid and compromising government they will be sacrificed to popular clamour, as soon as ever it is steadily directed, under such a man as O'Connell, to this object.

† This part of our paper was written with no expectation of seeing any practical movement in that direction for some months, by which time we were satisfied that the example of France, and other influences, at present in the background, would begin to operate. But we have since found, that about the very hour when we were

will be easily satisfied that this is all which is wanting to cement the national unanimity. At his bidding, the safe-guards of the press will give way as smoothly as the safe-guards of the Protestant church and the British Constitution; and by that time, the populace will begin to understand wherefore and for what ulterior purposes they have been taught to read.

Thirdly, The Statistics of modern Europe, under the most favourable selection of their bearings, offer many striking aggravations of the coming embarrassments and perils: they would fetter the motions of the greatest statesmen whom the world has yet seen: the Burleighs, the Richelieus, the Colberts, the Somerses, would shrink from the administration of an inheritance so burdened and crippled. Not so the breed of modern political craftsmen, who, without even a diplomatic apprenticeship, or any training to the public service, walk forth from a college or a guard-room, ready-furnished for the mightiest cases of policy which have ever occupied the cabinets of Christendom, and in the most agitating crisis of affairs that has occurred for three centuries. Let us notice a few of these embarrassments as they affect England. First of all, for the National Debt, it is difficult to say in how many ways this will harass and fetter the government. It is no light evil, as respects the just preponderance of England upon the continent, that she is known to be almost emasculated for all purposes of war by her mountainous debt. She may look as fierce as she will, but it is known that she has not the means of fighting. Were it only that she found herself checked in seeking slight occasions of quarrel, there would be little to regret. But a war of defence—a war of mere justice—a war, above all, for the highest purposes of a truly magnanimous policy—for character, and the repulsion of insult or outrage, such a war is no longer open to the means of Great Britain. This fact has doubtless had its due weight with Don Miguel, and is, indeed, the only key, upon any rational principles, to some parts of his conduct. But we notice it with no view to foreign politics; its worst bearing is that which affects the position of the government in respect to the revolutionary party at home. Even the bare knowledge of state difficulties is not left without anxiety in such keeping; but a party, as unprincipled as that of which we speak, possess the means of improving this knowledge to a practical result—ominously perplexing to a weak government, and agitating to the nation. The House of Commons has already listened to suggestions of confiscation and national robbery, as regards the Funded Debt; it cannot be said that they were entertained with favour and welcome: they were rejected, and on the whole were, for that time, disapproved; but they were heard with patience, as once they would not have been, and even with attention; and no temptation to a signal act of wickedness can look for success on a first overture. Any proposal of this tendency admits of many modifications. But, if once the principle shall be admitted, (as, with so feeble a government acting against so strong a body of revolutionary malecontents, in no long course of time very probably it will be admitted,) that perfect faith is not to be maintained with the public creditor—that, to meet a momentary, or even a durable, condition of state necessity, his interest may be diminished, all is lost; character, which is every thing, is gone; and a precedent is established, under which no robbery, as robbery, can be afterwards discountenanced. Considering the behaviour of the ministers on the West India question, though we cannot acquit them of rashness and timidity, (and these manifestations it is, which have invited the many frantic attacks* on the property writing the above paragraph, Mr Owen, and a meeting at Freemasons' Hall, had drawn up petitions to the King and both Houses of Parliament, for the very purposes here anticipated.

* Will it be believed, that in October 1830, at a public meeting in Edinburgh, a distinguished Scottish advocate, wishing to serve the abolitionists, put forward, among many other equal misstatements, the following, which are in contradiction to facts so and the characters of the West India the other hand, concede, that they proprietors,) we must in justice, on have not in this instance, upon the notorious, that one is at a loss to understand how any man of ordinary information in the statistics of the British empire can at this day be unacquainted with them. But suppose that he really is so, what are we to think of his presenting himself as a qualified agitator of the cause, and placing himself in the front of the assailants upon a body of gentlemen whom he so cruelly slanders? This orator spoke of the average period of work, taking the year through, as being "not less than 16 hours out of the 24!" And he added by way of aggravation, that this was "under a burning sun:" which is pretty much like demanding our pity for the fishes because they are eternally wet, and with no means of drying themselves. The ingenious advocate would find, upon application to his black friends, that they would not greatly thank him for any change he could propose in their very excellent climate, unless it were by the addition of a little warmth to their early mornings and nights. He spoke also of "want and distress" as fertile sources of crime amongst the slaves. Want! which under the present system is impossible, and under that which he advocated would be the portion of the whole population, unless driven (as in the happy Haiti) to the field at the point of the bayonet. After these instances of misrepresentation, it can hardly surprise us to find the same eloquent person asserting that "the negro may be separated from the members of his own family;" that every lash of the whip "strips off the skin;" that a second lash "lays bare the flesh to the bone," that 40 stripes (such as, upon his representation, are commonly inflicted on the slaves for trivial faults) are "equal to 500 lashes at a drum-head." By the way, there was no need to resort to the military practice for a standard in this case; for we regret to say, that in the civil punishments of England, the scourge is much employed by the magistrates, and a good deal more (we believe) since the year 1821, than previously to that time. From the same authority (resuming our account of the Edinburgh meeting) we learn that marriage is "not tolerated" by the West Indian proprietors amongst their slaves; and that Sunday is the "only day" conceded to the slave for the cultivation of his own "bit of ground," on which we are assured that he and his family are entirely dependent for support!!—In charity we must conclude, when we hear such things from the lips of a man of honour and unblemished character, either that he has by mistake laid hold of some old fasciculus of Clarkson's and Wilberforce's theatrical memorials belonging to that period when the slave-trade and not slavery was the bone of contention; or else that, as an advocate, however well instructed in the real facts, he conceives the case to lie within an advocate's privilege; and that all misstatements in one extreme are allowable, so long as there is a reasonable probability that they will be met and balanced by corresponding misstatements in the other. This excuse, however, is available only to the professional pleader, and offers no sort of apology for the Christian minister of religious instruction, who in all things is bound to the strict literal truth. Some of these have recently used their public opportunities for disseminating error and pernicious prejudices in so unquipping a way, that honest indignation and just sympathy with the outraged West Indian gentlemen—a body as honourable as any on earth—induce us to be silent. One argument, however, used by the most eminent of these reverend pastors, we shall notice: he recurred to it frequently, and manifestly esteemed it a clincher: indeed he said as much. This argument took the shape of a dilemma:—"You say," said he, addressing himself to the West Indian, "as a reason why no change is necessary, that your slaves are happy—happier than the peasantry of England; and at other times, as a reason why a change would be dangerous, you say that your slaves would prove refractory and unmanageable citizens, if suddenly emancipated. Now both these statements cannot possibly be true; they are inconsistent. Either your slaves are really not happy, and thence arises the prospect of danger which you predict; what you fear is just retaliation: or, on the other hand, your slaves being truly and unaffectedly happy, they are satisfied with you; and your fears are chimerical, perhaps even assumed." Such was the reverend gentleman's dilemma, of which, we presume that neither horn could toss a flea. What! because a poor ignorant race of beings, (intellectually speaking,) perfectly in the condition of children, are represented as being (what in fact they are) comfortable and relieved from all pressure of want or anxiety, will it follow that they recognise and consciously appreciate their own reasons for content? Because they have no real grounds of complaint, will it follow that they have none which are imaginary? Such a state capital point of compensation, be- told the frantic brawlers in this trayed their duty. Sir Robert Peel cause, with as much sternness as he transcends the power of any master and any government. To take an illustration from a case in some points answering to this; who doubts that schoolboys are really much happier in their evenings, and their hours of relaxation, after the restraints and the business of the day, than they could have been after twelve hours of idleness? Yet rare indeed are the boys who would have the good sense to admit this, and the firmness to resist an offer of perpetual holidays. Let it be remembered, that the very measure in debate would create causes for discontent, and turbulent expression of discontent, that, under the present arrangements of West Indian society, cannot exist. No longer entitled to ample provision and medical care, from the purse of a benevolent master, the negro must now look to himself for aliment and comforts of every kind. But with all negro slaves, it is notorious that "Emancipation" has no other meaning than that of a plenary privilege of idleness. Liberty to do nothing is the one sole liberty intelligible to a West Indian slave. A formal Parliamentary creation of freedom would, therefore, be understood as a positive summons to be idle. And they would so use their new-born privilege, as abusing it in the very utmost excess which can be conceived in people with full-grown appetites and infantine intellects. What they would do—is now past speculation: enquire what they have done, and are now doing, in the unhappy island of St Domingo. The same dissolute idleness would take place, followed by the same hideous distress, rapine, bloodshed, anarchy: a West Indian property, already ruinously depreciated by the frenzy of the times, would no longer bear even a nominal price in the market: multitudes of honourable families, many widows, many orphans, would sink down irretrievably to the lowest condition of abject poverty: and, finally, when the ruin was completed, a military force, kept up at a most extravagant cost to this impoverished nation, would drive the melancholy files of emancipated labourers to the scanty reliques of that rural industry, which, in its palmy days, had supported a splendid benefactor amongst a crowd of peasants, healthy and contented, bearing the name of slaves amongst us in Europe, but esteeming themselves servants, and very often treated as indulgently as children. The picture of what would be, we repeat, can never be so undeniably delineated as in the unquestioned records of what has been in Haiti: and the West Indian proprietors ought, by all means, to print and circulate an abstract, with a proper commentary, of an excellent tract we remember to have seen, (called Notes upon Haiti, or some such title,) which gives an awful portrait of the final wretchedness, and fierce military police, which wind up the drama of sudden emancipation. In taking our leave at this point of the subject, we have one hint to offer to the West Indians, upon a new vista which has lately opened upon us in the policy of the Abolitionists. Many of them, with a specious and insidious moderation, are now becoming aware that, since the open and resolute declaration of Ministers, any attempt to carry the question, without something in the shape or the name of compensation, is hopeless—"Yes, yes," they now say, "indemnity ought to be granted; and indemnity shall be granted. We must not do good out of other men's purses." Accordingly, an indemnity has been devised: but of what kind? Listen. Formerly it was said by the West Indians—"Well: if you mean to plunder us without reimbursement of our slaves, at any rate, as mere robbers, you must stop there; a horse-stealer takes away my horse, but he does not insist upon my paying afterwards for the horse's corn and hay; the horse's keep he takes henceforward upon himself. Now, reverting to the slave, having emancipated him, what do you mean to do with him? Who pays for corning him?" This question was a poser to many worthy gentlemen. And, when Sir Robert Peel announced the solemn sentence of compensation, that was another poser. Here was a sweet prospect for those who had so pledged themselves to the cause of emancipation, whilst it was fully understood to be a mere call for a frothy oration entirely at other men's cost, that they could not decently withdraw, even after it seemed to threaten some cost to themselves. First, there was the fee simple of the slave to be bought up (say sixteen years' purchase, computed on his annual net produce); and, secondly, there was his keep for ever. One man, whose name ended in idge or ridge—Brakenridge, or some such name—an Abolitionist, but, as it turned out, an honest worthy fellow for all that, at a public meeting in London, wound up his address in the following way—"God forbid, gentlemen," said he, "that I should ever do so foul an act, as vapour about beneficence that is to cost me nothing, —far less, that I should join in compelling my fellow-citizens to perform an act of is capable of assuming, that compensation was a sine qua non among the preliminaries to every possible measure for the abolition of slavery. He was heard with fury and hatred; so bent are these agitators to build misery for the slave upon ruin to his master.

Questions of this nature are so many nurseries of jacobinical "agitation," (to use the old emphatic Cromwellian term so aptly revived by Mr O'Connell,) all useful in their several ways: some to unsettle men's principles, and to disturb the sacred foundations of property (in which respect even the abolitionists of slavery serve the ends charity beyond the munificence of kings, or the fables of romance, at the price, perhaps, of total ruin to themselves, and with a final reversion of credit, not to them who suffered, but to us who only spoke;—no! again I say, God forbid! Let us be honest before we are liberal; let us pay for what we are all determined to seize. Let the slave be free; but also let his master suffer no wrong. Here is my contribution:”—saying which, the conscientious man laid upon the table a bank-note for L.100. Upon such terms we have no objections ourselves to join the abolitionists: we cannot promise so much, but we will do something for any well-digested plan, which shall prepare emancipation to the slave under restraints, which may save him from being a burthen to himself, and a terror to the community. This mode of liberation, however, at the price of one, five, or ten guineas to each abolitionist, is far from satisfactory, even to those who have consented to compensation. They are now, therefore, agreed upon a scheme which they flatter themselves will meet both demands—that for compensation, and that for keep. They solve the one perplexity by means of the other. The same mode which provides for the keep, in their ideas, provides for the compensation. For, say they, take things as they now are—what is it that a proprietor can make by his slave? Simply the return of his labour, so long as he lives. Very well; then the existing relation between the master and the slave shall not be utterly abolished, it shall be purified and baptized by a new name. He that was a slave, shall now be a day-labourer; instead of food, shelter, clothing, medicine, he shall now have wages, which will regulate themselves as in England. Thus all difficulties are met, all interests consulted; the slave has his "keep," the master his "compensation." How so, gentlemen, how so? Suppose the proprietor to bring his estate into the market, what has become of the price which, on the old arrangements, he would receive for each slave—able-bodied, or not? Where is the λυτρον, the ransom, for his live stock? But again, if he should not sell, but retain the property in his own hands, what is this mysterious and undefined relation which has been substituted for the old one? Is the slave quartered in a new character upon the old estate for ever? Is the meaning of the provision, that the employment of this same slave is compulsory, and matter of indefeasible obligation upon his old master? That would be a novel kind of compensation indeed, and would amount to this—that by way of reimbursing the master for his loss, he should be entitled (and also obliged) to employ a man at fixed wages for labour necessarily not fixed, after all means of enforcing it were abolished. On the other hand, if the meaning is—that with the obligations of the slave, those of the master should be dissolved at the same time, and that all labour should find its just price in an open market, as with ourselves, then under what possible fiction can it be pretended that the master obtains even a shadow of compensation? He has his land; he has his buildings; he has his machinery; about these there never was any question. But he has not his live stock; that has been violently taken from him; for that it is he seeks indemnification; and upon this plan no shadow of indemnification is offered. But observe the final result: the negroes will not work; that is certain. Then comes compulsion, military compulsion, as in Haiti. Who is to pay for this, and for the immense police requisite to keep down an army of starving brigands? This is the question which the new-born compensation-mongers keep in view. Their hope is, that by forcing the slaves (with reversionary duties and rights on each side) upon their old proprietors, under some juggle of ideal compensation, they may afterwards compel the proprietors to pay for the vast armed police, as for a measure of interference called for by themselves; whereas, in the case of the proprietors refusing to accept of any such visionary indemnity, and determinately throwing along with the plunder, the keep and whole management of the plunder upon the plunderers, they exonerate themselves from all responsibility, and the whole burden would devolve upon the government and nation that had sanctioned so unexampled an outrage.

of jacobinism as zealously as any class of disturbers whatever); some to bring men together, and accustom them to act in union and in opposition to the government of the land; others for purposes much less indirect, and having a more instant reference to themselves. Any thing, which opposes the existing government, though trivial for itself, serves the end of general faction and dissent. But the national burdens, as we before said, are on their own account so important, that they furnish an engine of excitement to the rudest disturber of the public peace more formidable than ever has existed in any state ancient or modern. Let it be recollected that, in the present condition of our revenue, supposing it divided into three equal portions, about two are swallowed up in the mere payment of the interest upon our pecuniary obligations. What a trying temptation for those who are nurtured in rapacious hopes by the eternal harangues against colonial property, against church property in England and Ireland, against the accumulations of the aristocracy in both countries, to know that by a word—a breath—a motion of the hand from a reformed Senate, obedient to the nod of the people, in a moment and for ever two-thirds of every man's contributions to the state might be abolished! Commerce, again, and manufacturing industry, subject as they are to eternal palsies, which are falsely viewed as rare contingencies due to some peculiarly unhappy concurrence of circumstances, being in fact essentially connected with the prodigious depth and intricacy of our commercial relations, not only present continual critical excitements to outrage in those parts of the country where our population is the most accumulated, but in various other forms of danger, remind us, that, in this respect, England is travelling on a road as yet thoroughly untried. Other states have been commercial; but never any have carried commerce to so giddy a height; nor has commerce, in any other country, been so perilously connected with a disturbed action upon the natural expansion of population in the lowest ranks. With us the stimulus applied to the population, under the mighty agency of manufactures in England, and very different causes in Ireland, proceeds by the blindest but most gigantic steps. What is called the "depressed state" of a trade, or its particular branches, is pretty nearly the permanent state—broken only by now and then a few weeks' sudden encouragement, succeeded by refluxes of languor for months. Under this system of ebbs and flows, an eternal process is going on, apparently alternate, of depression and excitement, but really and substantially uniform, of superfluous increase. As fast as hands are thrown out of employ in Manchester, or the crowded districts adjacent, that vast beehive discharges its swarms in search of subsistence elsewhere. A few weeks pass, and, either in the same or in some kindred branch of trade, a momentary revival calls for new supplies of labour. Hands are now taken up into employ, in amount corresponding to those recently discharged, but individually not the same. Fresh draughts are made upon the remote villages of Wales and Ireland; a new race of labourers is rapidly created, to be again disgorged upon the nation at large, under some one of the endless stagnations to which English commerce, in its present stupendous maturity, is liable, in a degree unknown to the periods of its earlier growth. The continual changes effected by the discovery or the extensive application of machinery tend to the same result; and we are advancing every year more deeply into the unwieldy, miserable, and, for European policy, perilous condition of a Chinese population. Even the very perfection of many of our arts contributes to formidable political effects. The vast improvement of our means of communication, for instance, of our roads, since the termination of the war, of our steam navigation, and at this moment the new project of our railroads, which in a year or two will traverse every part of our dense population, and will superannuate even our canals—all this co-operates, in an unspeakable degree, with other great tendencies of the times. It is scarcely to be imagined in what degree the organization, in a political sense, of any country, and the excitement of powerful political sympathies and determinate expressions of the pub-lie will, depend upon the velocity and certainty with which interchanges of opinion and feeling are maintained from vast distances.

Very many other features might be noticed in the aspect of civilization at this æra, which will incalculably aid the revolutionary effects likely to unfold themselves through the next ten years. But we content ourselves with the heads we have already noticed; and, bearing them in mind, shall briefly wind up our survey of the menacing circumstances of our position at this moment.

Will there be war? We have affirmed that for England war is impossible. That is our belief. But war is of various degrees: a war of active hostility, with spasms of demoniac and exhausting energy, such as characterised the latter years of the last war, and drew upon us for nearly one hundred and thirty millions sterling in one little period of twelve months,—that will not be thought possible, we suppose, by any speculator whatever. We hear a perpetual outcry about the necessity of economy and the call for retrenchment, a policy which is doubtless agreeable, but does not seem peculiarly, or in any special sense, indispensable, immediately after a succession of reductions which have so sensibly lightened our burdens.—However, though it is evident this outcry grows out of a factious purpose, and not out of any possible oppression of the taxes, by relation with former experience, yet it will readily be allowed by every body, that the temper of the times would not tolerate for an instant that increase of expenditure which would be necessary to give effect to a war conspicuously offensive. It is possible, however, that England may co-operate with the cabinets of the Continent, by arming and maintaining a martial attitude, with a suitable system of restraint and embargo upon the objects of her vigilance. Whatever may be asserted, as daily we see that such things are asserted by violent journals, it is certain that Belgium will no more be allowed to create a republican government, than any of the mediatized States of Germany would be allowed to resume an independent existence. The delicacy and reserve, which have been practised hitherto towards that rebellious country, are due in part perhaps to the necessary delays for concerting and communicating measures amongst the great powers of Europe, and in a very great degree, no doubt, to a spirit of moderation and respect for the difficulties of the new King of the French. There is a reasonable forbearance in hastily precipitating a prince of just intentions, into a collision with the fermenting spirit of republicanism in France. The merest trifle of resistance offered to the popular will, would overthrow a king, whose tenure is purely personal, and in no degree by the powers of his office. We shall not repeat what we have so largely insisted upon in former papers—the shadowy and fleeting evanescence, or rather blank nihility, of the regal office and functions, as nominal powers in the constitution. It is a melancholy consideration for all Europe, as well as France, that more substantial power was not thrown into this organ of the state, if indeed, in the prostrate condition of the French aristocracy, this had been possible. Certainly it must surprise us, that a prince so upright as we are willing to believe the present king, could have allowed himself to accept an office, the titular honours of which had probably little fascination for a mind so soberly inclined as his, under a total denial of all those essential attributes of royalty which are indispensable to the exercise of any salutary influence upon the course of affairs. The decision by the people of Paris for a titular king, rather than for a president of a republic, seems to have been adopted partly as a propitiation to the crowned heads of Europe,—partly, also, as a compliment and expression of gratitude to the Duke of Orleans, as a patriotic prince who had not disguised his liberal sentiments; and in some degree it may be presumed to have been governed by a consideration of the old age, and probably approaching imbecility, of La Fayette, the only person who could have been proposed for the station with any cordial unanimity of public sentiment. Preserving the name, however, of king, the people of Paris seem to have been resolved that the office should be shorn of all the functions which could be perverted; but which happen to be no less essential on the one hand to its utility, than liable on the other to a possible abuse. In this they acted naturally, but unwisely, under too keen a sense of the dangers which they had just escaped. They consulted, as they believed, for their own welfare and security. But it is remarkable, that the very quarter from which these are most threatened, is precisely the king's official imbecility. However, it must be allowed, after all, that this results rather from the circumstances of his creation, than from positive enactments. Meantime, standing on what origin it will, this condition of impotence in the king is most ominous for the happy progress of public affairs; and it is even probable, that, in a prince of so exemplary and conscientious a character, it will lead, at no very distant period, to his resignation of the titular dignity; in which case, France—having gained one of her foremost ends in the creation of a king, viz. that of breaking the first shock of the revolution to neighbouring courts—will assume, with triumphant pleasure, the form and name, as well as the substantial organization, of a republic. Until then, the scruples of moderation and just principles in the king, will betray him continually into painful conflicts with the national will.

France is improved in moral elevation; France is nobler than she was under the soul-withering and truly barbaric government of Napoleon Buonaparte; but let no man persuade himself that the time is yet come, or will come for many a weary decade of years, when France will be generally capable of sacrificing military glory to the humbler and more tranquil policy which watches over the true interests of a people, or will allow their full value to principles of upright dealing and counsels of moderation. Blood must flow in rivers, tears will be shed by generations, before, in that respect, France will attain the level of England. It is true, and we admit, that in England, as elsewhere, too fond an admiration settles upon the trophies and conspicuous leaders (often men of feeble powers) in martial successes. In this respect a childish spirit will perhaps haunt the mind of man, even in the fullest development of its powers. But it is false to say, that in England any general sympathy could ever sustain itself with victories in a cause confessedly unjust. In France it is otherwise. War is there desired by multitudes; and if there were no other exciting cause of a warlike spirit than the general return to power and consideration of Napoleon's agents, military as well as civil, we might anticipate an early explosion of hostile feeling towards the old hereditary enemies of France. But the fact is, that in many respects it is the interest of all parties to court a state of war. The army, shaken in its natural relations to the crown by the trying and severe dilemma of their position, can, by that hustration only, be purified and restored to its allegiance. The crown itself might create opportunities in that way only of reinforcing its languid and shattered prerogative. An aristocracy also, such as it is, the only aristocracy* possible for France, might arise on the basis of martial distinctions amongst the marshals and admirals of France. The legislature, benefiting by this distraction of the public gaze, might strengthen itself against the mob influence. These are just and sound reasons for war; but another, far more extensive and more potent, would be found in the national anxiety to efface the recollections of 1813-14-15 in new days of Marengo, Austerlitz, and Jena.

Under these circumstances, and governed even to frenzy by the influences last noticed, France is seen to call for 72,000 men, and in a week

* The writer of an admirable article in the last Quarterly Review, rehearsing the secret history and rationale as to facts and principles of all the cardinal changes of policy in France since 1814, having happened to speak of an aristocracy as capable of being erected, is arrogantly taken to task by a London newspaper, and admonished that the English aristocracy was of 800 years' growth. Be it so; but for all that, a few simple institutions and legal foundation of privileges might create such a body in one generation for many essential effects, however much it might want the consecrating prestige of antiquity.

or two afterwards, for 108,000 more; and it is now generally affirmed that arms for more than that number are ordered by the French government, in a pressing and hurried manner, at Birmingham. Such are the facts. What is the interpretation of the newspapers? With their usual shameless effrontery, having a party purpose to serve, they roundly assert that all this imports nothing like preparation for war. What is the object, then, of such violent demonstrations of energy? Simply, the same journals assure us, to supply the defalcations in the line, on account of the dismissal of the Swiss mercenaries, and the absence of General Clausel's army at Algiers. It is dangerous to indulge mendacious propensities in the face of arithmetic. The French army may be minus, by the Swiss secession, to the amount of 8000 men; and the Algerine expedition at the utmost deducted 40,000 men—of whom from 12 to 15,000 are ordered home. Consequently, fewer than 35,000 men would fill up the vacancy. Wherefore, then, so enormous, and truly Napoleonic a demand, as that for 180,000 recruits? The truth is, that, by their own forgeries, the London and Parisian journals have darkened and confounded the real state of things, until they have become their own dupes. Last month, we pointed out the monstrous knaveries of the press, in forging ad libitum recognitions of the new French régime, first for one great power, and then another, without any shadow of authority. Seventeen times they have asserted, in particular, that the Russian government had sent its recognition—therein consciously lying sundry (to wit, seventeen) times. The last time of lying was from the 17th of October to the 20th, the present falsehood in this case being hatched by the Constitutionnel paper of Paris. It is very possible, therefore, amidst this cloud of falsehoods, (for it is indeed still doubtful, as respects public evidences, whether any government has sent in an absolute and unconditional recognition of the new system of things at Paris,) that, so far from having recognised King Philippe, the Russian and Austrian cabinets may have menaced King Philippe. At all events, the call for 180,000 men speaks the language of war so peremptorily, that he must be infatuated who can suffer any glozing newspaper to argue him out of the plain evidence of his senses.* War may not certainly, or immediately, follow; but war is certainly lowering over France at this moment, or else we must conclude that her counsels are guided by lunatics. Her sky is overcast; but it is very possible, that, under the vigorous preparations with which she has met the danger, all clouds may disperse for a few months.

Spain, meantime, is now actually becoming the theatre of war, or of that partisan warfare, which is the utmost that will probably ensue. Persia is better known to us at this time than Spain, in her real internal condition of political feeling. We know enough, however, of her incapacity for any vigorous efforts, and for any combined efforts, to doubt exceedingly the possibility of even a temporary success for the insurgents. The world, besides, is too little acquainted with their real purposes and motives, to be at all warranted in heartily wishing them success. Mina and Valdez, if any reliance can be placed upon private letters, have actually entered Spain. In Catalonia, and generally in the east, they may create much trouble to the government. But we have seen no indications of any such extensive dispositions to co-operate with them in the heart of Spain, as can justify our placing them in the light of opponents at all on a level with the government. We repeat, that, in common with the rest of the world, we are much in the dark about this quarter of Europe; but our overruling impression is, that Mina's attempt will be finally baffled and confounded, notwithstanding the assurance we have already had in a leading article of a veracious evening paper (which has not yet contradicted its own statement) that Cadiz itself had fallen into the hands of the domestic insurgents! Seriously however, that relation of too strict an intimacy with the rest of Europe, and too powerful an influence upon her counsels, which we ascribed above to France, is precisely reversed by Spain. She is, in this respect, an imperfectly organized limb of Europe, neither giving nor receiving much influence or sympathy of any kind.

War, on the whole, preponderates in the chances at present. But a Congress of the great powers, which will probably meet in two or three months in Germany, may easily avert it. Who is it, since the death of Lord Londonderry, that can adequately represent Great Britain in such a meeting? Something, we suspect, will happen like what Bishop Burnet reports of our military successes at one time in Flanders; the officers, says he, committed infinite faults; but all were continually redressed and made good by the admirable valour of the English troops. Perhaps the weight of the English name, and the memory of her immortal services in the last war, as they must be the sole, may be the sufficient reliance of England in such a congress; for as to any diplomatic representation, it is shameful to know, that not one is on the public stage who would not be a jest to Metternich, or even to M. Talleyrand.

Difficulties of this kind occupy, however, but little of our venerable Premier's attention. At this moment even the qualities of a new Parliament, which may perhaps require six weeks for their full development, will fail to command a foremost place in his interest. Even a restive House of Commons, plunging and jibbing under every old rule of expert driving, will be a secondary concern. All anxieties, of ancient or modern growth, foreign or domestic, will be swallowed up in the one overwhelming judgment—yes! we may call it a providential judgment—which is now gathering upon this apostate Cabinet from Ireland, the theatre of its apostasy. Oh! righteous retribution!—that even there, where they sinned against the light of their consciences, the heaviest cloud of pain and confusion is gathering to blight their councils. Let us not be thought to exult in the misfortunes of the country, when we say that, according to all appearances, the most memorable period of disorder is now impending over Ireland that has been known for two-and-thirty years. The distress of Ireland, from a total want of poor laws, is, in every case, considerable; even the most prosperous years are marked by scenes that, in other countries, would be thought a scandal to Christianity and civilization. Annually do the selfish amongst the landlords, and the mean in spirit amongst the very noblest of the land, club their beggarly quotas to ship off poor labourers, either to England, for the momentary purpose of scrambling for a pittance wrested from the impoverished peasantry of England and Scotland, or else to Canada, where they are unmercifully turned adrift by thousands at a time, without any preparation for the climate or the state of society, and trepanned from their native country by the foulest misrepresentations. But these and other scenes of distress are upon a trifling scale compared with what is now going on in Ireland, as one immediate consequence of the bill for balancing the Catholic concession, by destroying the forty-shilling freeholders. This part of the tenantry, or cottiers, protected no longer by their political value as voters, are everywhere expelled without mercy—being now looked upon as mere nuisances and vermin. The land swarms with these miserable outcasts; and the coming winter will be the darkest and most portentous for Ireland that she has long known.

Such would be the state of things even without political ferment. But at this moment of tremendous agitation from wide-spread domestic misery, does Mr O'Connell descend, like some incarnation of the evil principle, to vex and plague the wretched land with systematic agitation for the repeal of the Union, the taxation of absentees at the rate of 75 per cent, and other measures of that character. Never was Ireland in a situation to give such dreadful effect to his inflammatory doctrine. The country is overspread by exasperated malecontents; and in cities crowded with such auditors,—Cork, Waterford, Kilkenny, and others,—he has scattered his firebrands with an affected caution to beware of combustibles.—Let not the English senators, who may know Mr O'Connell only as the degraded being to which he sank in the House of Commons, under the scourge of Mr Doherty and others, measure his Irish power by this. The very memory of this English degradation it is, which now stings him into madness; and it is not too much to say, that the general contempt, the roars of laughter, which he provoked by his "vow that was registered in heaven,"—the "blood upon his right hand,"—and all the rest of his theatrical rants, in excuse for his white feather,—these memorable disgraces are the very pledges for his pushing forward his union-agitation to some extreme result. He feels that it is essential for him to do some great thing to reinstate him in the credit which he won by his triumph over the whole English government in the business of emancipation, and which he afterwards lost so easily to an individual in England. Whatever may be thought of Mr O'Connell's motives, considering him as a politic man of the world, measuring forces with a government as profligate as himself, and a thousand times weaker, it is impossible to refuse him some degree of sympathy. In Parliament he is nobody; in Ireland he is inspired, and "hath a demon." The Duke of Northumberland becomes a cipher by his side; the combined government is ridiculous in his presence; he trampled them like mire beneath his feet in his former struggle: if it is possible for Ireland, united as one man, to resist 60,000 British bayonets, he will do so again.

Let us not be misunderstood: we exult not in the perplexities of the country; but we do exult in the perplexities of government, recoiling upon them from their own compromises, whether weak or base. The Duke of Wellington's character is perhaps little understood. It has no foundation of either subtlety or force, as is sometimes imagined, but is essentially commonplace. He is a man of slow and dull feelings: he yawned probably at Waterloo; and he yawns at his formal celebrations of its anniversaries. It is likely that his concession of the Catholic claims originated neither in the excessive blundering which is ascribed to him by some, nor in sheer profligacy and the appetite for vicious actions, as has been supposed by others.—Simply the necessity of keeping himself in motion—a wish to stir the languid circulation in his veins, and the vulgar taste for impressing his own hand upon every movement of the political machinery of his times, may account for the whole of his share in the transaction. This view of the case is countenanced by the many different accounts which his Grace has given of his reasons for that job, doubtless with entire veracity at the moment, notwithstanding the utter irreconcilability of the several statements. In particular, we vouch for the following as one of his various versions of the case. Soon after the bill was first launched upon the astonished Parliament, the Duke of Wellington wrote to two or three among the great territorial aristocrats, explaining his motives, and varnishing the case. One of these favoured friends, whom the minister thought it necessary to propitiate, was the Duke of Rutland: his letter we did not see, but we did see one to another great man, which, in the opening sentence, was declared to be of the same tenor and date as that to his Grace of Rutland. Now in this letter, the noble inditer, disclaiming all the pretences with which he had imposed on Parliament, avowed as his real and substantial reason for granting emancipation—not the hope of conciliation and "all that," by which "the marines" were hocussed—but simply, that without some such boon he "could not trust the army,"* being in so large a proportion Popish.

Probably even the Duke's himself

* If this were the Duke of Wellington's motive, or any part of his motive, for the Catholic bill, then we must again remark the singular fatality, by which all the objects of his bounty, the Irish generally, or Mr O'Connell, or the army, seem to take a pride in showing ingratitude. It so happens that the first mutiny in a Popish regiment for a Popish object, (viz. for leave to insult a Presbyterian town by their music on a Sunday,) has occurred since the Emancipation bill.

never did, nor ever will, know exactly on what motives or whims, where perhaps so many blended, this tremendous breach was made in the constitution. Enough that it was made, and upon grounds that never will receive any consistent vindication. That in particular, which Sir R. Peel alleged, viz. that a great military force would be liberated from the task of watching Ireland by a measure of peace and amity, has never received a momentary countenance from facts, and will this winter be triumphantly refuted. The boon was to have reconciled all parties in Ireland—the lamb was to have lain down with the lion—and after all, in this coming winter, the greatest military force will be accumulated that ever yet has been found necessary in that unhappy island.

NOTE.

Upon the question of French politics, we last month attacked, with great but just indignation, the conduct of a London journal, which has astonished and scandalized all its friends by the grossness of its departure from that standard in politics which it had originally promised to maintain. We said nothing more than we have heard expressed in one shape or other by all men professing those principles which we and that journal equally professed at one time, which we still adhere to, and which that journal (we cannot but again declare our belief) has betrayed. Meantime, the very strength of our indignation expressed for us sufficiently the respect which we granted to the general integrity and ability of the journal, as it could not be imagined that we should have honoured with our indignation any person who was deficient in either. But, to leave no doubt on this point, we expressly spoke of his general services in terms of honour; and this we were the more careful to do, from having remarked that, for so veteran a journalist (under other names), he manifested a sensibility, somewhat marvellous, to the hackneyed compliments of the press on the score of "talent," &c. Resolving, therefore, to shew that our hostility was not personal, but singly applied to his principles, or departure from principles, we took care to be wanting in no point of courtesy, always, of course, with a reservation of the particular subject of our attack, and the allowable warmth of indignation which it provoked.

To this notice of himself, that journalist immediately replied; and, as he assumed, with "good temper" and "good manners;" a praise which there was some ingenuity in claiming, as it was true up to that particular sentence in which the claim was made, but immediately afterwards ceased to be true either for the "temper" or the "manners." On the contrary, he became very personal, and displayed a feminine pettiness of spite, and an affectation of scorn, which betrayed a pitiable want of self-command. To all this, it would be easy indeed to reply in the same terms: nothing so readily learned as the vocabulary of scorn; it is "as easy as lying." But the writer of that and of this paper, if he could so far forget himself as to descend to such unworthy scurrilities, yet would not feel himself at liberty to degrade the distinguished journal, in which he has the honour of writing, by any thing of so ignoble a nature. He willingly, therefore, dismisses the language of the journalist, and addresses himself to what is material in his reply. The journalist asks, what cause it is that he has betrayed? We tell him, in answer, that it is the cause of legitimate thrones, the rights of good governments, and anti-jacobin principles, all over Europe: these are what he has betrayed; and these were violated, not by the refusal to obey the ordinances of Charles X., or by any thing which that party forbore to do, but by what they subsequently did. He asks farther, whether our doctrine is—that the French were passively to submit to the despotic mandates of Charles X.? Our answer is, most determinately, No: but in resistance, there are many modes, and infinite degrees. There is room for much discussion as to the kinds of remonstrance, and expostulation, that might have been tried with the king; and it is a fair question for a casuist, whether all was done that might have been done, before coming to extremities. But we will suppose that ground traversed; and that we have arrived at this concession—that by no course short of a violent revolution could the case have been met; in short, that the revolution, as it is, was the sole redress open to the aggrieved nation;—was it therefore necessary to rejoice, to exult, in this revolution? Suppose a case for resistance made out, such a case is always matter of grief. A bad king, we shall suppose a bad dynasty, if you please, has been expelled. But is it no evil that royalty itself, the very tenure by which kings reign for the benefit of the meanest, is degraded—virtually abrogated? Yet this is but one of many evils. Answering by memory, with no copy of the journal before us, we cannot reply to some captious verbal quibbles. And we must conclude with remarking, that the journalist does not reply to any one of our specific objections, but harangues upon a text of his own framing; a policy which we have observed him to pursue on some other occasions.

A SUNDAY PASTORAL.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

COLIN. Good morning, Keatie—Fie, for shame,
To sleep sae lang ye're sair to blame :
Then at your glass to smile an' smirk,
An' be the hindmost at the kirk !

KATE. Ay, 'tis o'er true—O, wae's my heart !
An' to reprove is weel your part ;
Your neighbours o' their faults to tell,
When ye're sae early there yoursell !

COLIN. Ah, cunning Kate ! I ken your way,
An' darena wrangle w' ye the day ;
For ye're sae tart when ye begin,
Ye lead aye into words o' sin.
An' now, when we hae met thegither,
An' like sae weel to be wi' ither,
Let's chat, without a' taunts or scorning,
O' things befitting Sabbath morning.
I am o'er late, an' sair to blame—
But, O, I've sic a charge at hame !

KATE. Nae doubt, nae doubt ! 'Tis a' o'er true,— Naebody else has aught to do ;
Ilk turn to Colin's hand maun lie,
The lasses a' to court forbye !

COLIN. Now, Kate, I canna stand sic joking,
There's nought on earth is sae provoking ;
When weel ye ken I never parl
Either to kiss, or court, or quarrel,
Or sit me down to mince or mell
Wi' ony lass except yoursell.

KATE. Alas ! poor lad, ye're sair abused then,
An' fausely, wickedly accused then ;
Sic tales are through the country fleeing !—
But then the country's ill for leeing.
It wasna true that Meg M'Gill
Cam greeting to you on the hill ?
I heard sic story, an' the cause o't.
It wasna true ;—I'm sure it was not ?

COLIN. 'Tis hard on twall. Good morning, Kate ;
I hate at preachings to be late ;
Besides, it's sinfu' to get mad
At sic a glib-tongued wicked jade.

KATE. Colin, I'll gang as fast as you
On this fine day, and faster too ;
Besides, I'll chat of what you will,
The Bible, or the Papish bill ;
The statutes of the ancient law,
Or beauties of Queen Bathsheba.
Now, tell me, Colin, on your life,
What think you o' that winsome wife ?

COLIN. Kate, ye're a witch—sae haud your tongue ;
An elf sae wicked, yet sae young,
Was never nursed on mother's knee—
What are Bathsheba's faults to me ?

KATE. O, nought to you ! Wha said they were ?
I only wanted to prefer
Some Scripture argument 'bout sin,
And chanced with woman to begin.

But, Colin, 'tis right strange o' you,
 Yet I hae noted, an' 'tis true,
 Whene'er o' womankind I hint,
 Then up you flee like fire frae flint,—
 Frae whilk it weel might understood be,
 That things are no just as they should be.

COLIN. Sweet Kate! wi' that provokin' tongue
 My heart wi' rage is aften wrung,
 But when I turn me round, an' see
 The wily twinkle o' your ee,
 The cherry cheek an' dimpled chin,
 My heart-strings dirl my breast within.
 Kate, I suspect, that, chance what may,
 We'll hardly reach the kirk the day;
 We wad be blamed by matrons dour,
 Gaun in at sic a daftlike hour,
 An' some auld maids I ken beside Wad cast us looks we coudna bide.
 Let's turn, an' up beneath the heuch
 O' the wild glen o' Gilmanscleuch;
 We'll spend, in nature's green alcove,
 The day in pure delights of love;
 Read on our Bibles, pray bedeen,
 An' maybe steal a kiss between.
 If there's a blink o' heavenly bliss
 On human nature, it is this.

KATE. Weel, Colin, I shall not gainsay,
 A wilfu' man maun hae his way;
 Since ye propose't, an' think nae shame,
 If 'tis a sin, ye'll bear the blame.
 But tell me this—though gay an' braw,
 War ye gaun to the kirk ava?

COLIN. Whisht, Kate! an' speer nae that again,— There's maybe mae to blame than ane;
 There are some things 'tween man and maid
 Mair natural to be thought than said;
 But now, our resting-place is here,
 Come to my side, my comely dear,
 Close to my side, nor ance avert
 The vision dearest to my heart.
 Look round you, Kate; the scene you see
 Is wild as mountain scene can be;
 Here sit we in a hollow swarth,
 Scoop'd from the bosom o' the earth;
 Our palace-wall the shaggy fell;
 Our couch of state the heather-bell;
 The sounding rivulet, combined
 With music of the mountain wind,
 The only anthem which we list;
 Our canopy the yielding mist;
 Yet here, within our desert den,
 Far frae the walks and eyes of men,
 Think o' our heavenly Maker's kindness,
 For a' our sins an' mortal blindness.
 Beyond the bliss o' kingly bowers
 An earthly happiness is ours.

O, Keatie, when this scene I spy,
 Imbedded in thy deep blue eye
 Like a wee vision o' the mind,
 A dream of heaven an' earth combined,
 My ardent soul is all on flame
 With a delight that wants a name—

A flame so holy an' divine,
 An angel's heart might envy mine.
 My own rapt image, too, I see,
 As if I stood 'twixt heaven and thee—
 Forbid it, a' ye powers above!
 An' O, forgie this tear o' love;
 For ne'er was vision so complete
 In window of a soul so sweet.

KATE. Colin, I like nae sic pathetics;
 When chaps get into their poetics,
 They rave on like the winter winds,
 An' mischief whiles comes in their minds:
 Sac, that I still may haud you dear,
 An' keep you sober and sincere,
 Kneel down upon that purple lea,
 An' pray to God for you an' me—
 The path o' grace has a beginning,
 An' praying winna gang wi' sinning;
 'Tis sweet an' comely to express
 Our homage in the wilderness,
 An' train our youthfu' minds away
 Frae courting on the Sabbath day.

Colin, without another word,
 Kneel'd down upon the lonely sward,
 His comely face turn'd to the sky,
 With ardour in his dark blue eye;
 And thus unto his God he pray'd,
 As near as't can in rhyme be said:

COLIN. O thou, who dwell'st beyond yon sun!
 Where the sinful soul can never won;
 Thou God of all beings on earth that dwell,
 The angels of heaven, an' spirits of hell—
 O! wilt thou deign, in thy love divine,
 To list to such a prayer as mine?
 Not for myself do I crave thine ear,
 But for one beside, than life more dear;
 And for her sake I heard shall be,
 For a virgin's soul is dear to thee.

Then thou, who reared'st yon ample sky,
 And planted the Paradise on high,
 When the morning stars together sung,
 And its arch with hymns of angels rung;
 Who placed the sun on his golden throne,
 His God's vicegerent, and His alone;
 Who clothed the moon in her silver veil,
 And the little stars in their diamond mail;
 Who wall'd the ocean's mighty wave,
 O'er coral beds to roll and rave;
 And form'd these mountains, great and small,
 And the soul of man, the last of all—
 O, hear in heaven, most graciously,
 For we had our lives and souls from thee!

O thou, who laid'st thine infant head
 In a manger for thy cradle bed,
 When the spirits of guilt were moved with awe,
 And the angels marvell'd at what they saw—
 The babe of heaven hush'd to his rest
 Upon an earthly virgin's breast,
 Then yield his life upon the tree,
 And lie in the grave for such as me—

O hear us in heaven, thou holy one!
 For in thy merits we trust alone!
 Thou spirit of grace, adored, believed,
 Great messenger all unconceived;
 Thou THREE in ONE, and ONE in THREE,
 Potent, supreme Divinity,
 As one great God we worship thee!
 Then hear our prayers whilst here we live,
 And when thou hearest, Lord forgive!
 We have no earthly thing to crave;
 We are more than happy with what we have:—
 We have youth and health, and love beside,
 And thee for our father and our guide;
 Thy own blue heavens smiling o'er us;
 Religion, hope, and the world before us;
 And all we can do, is to express
 Our gratitude and our thankfulness.
 One blessing would earthly hope fulfil,
 If 'tis accordant with thy will:—
 May we two, kneeling thee before,
 Be join'd as one for evermore!
 And that a prospect may remain
 Of acting earthly scenes again,
 May she be as a fruitful vine—

KATE. Stop, Colln, stop! I canna join!
 Ye may pray for marriage gin ye will,
 To think of that can do nae ill;
 Its sinless joys our God will grant them—
 We'll pray for bairnies when we want them.
 Ye cou'dna ask for aught that's worse,
 Than the heaviest portion o' woman's curse.

COLIN. Ah, my dear Kate! gin ye be spared,
 You'll change your chine on that award.
 If pure affection's from above,
 If "love is heaven, and heaven is love,"
 If loveliness conceived may be,
 Can ye a sight so lovely see,
 As a young comely mother's rest,
 With sweet babe to her bosom press'd;
 Its round and chubby cheek laid low,
 Misshapen on her breast of snow?
 Ah, Kate! if pure, unmingled bliss
 Be found in life's imperfection,
 All love, all fondness is outdone
 By mother's o'er her first-born son:
 That glow is bright, its workings kind,
 Calm, chasten'd, ardent, yet refined.
 I think—O! may I be forgiven—
 That nought can lovelier be in heaven,
 Far less upon the earth below;
 Methinks I see the visions now—

What, Keatie, do ye rue our meeting?
 I think ye're fuffing now, an' greeting?
 KATE. Tuts! what for will ye speak sae queer,
 Of things unmeet for maiden's ear?
 I canna bide that stuff sae sensuous,
 It sounds like something that's licentious:
 Yet these are truths the heart that strike—
 Ye may pray for babies gin ye like.

COLIN. Ha, Keatie! truth will aye bear sway,
 An' nature work in her ain way,

For ye are nature's child complete,
 A mountain rose unsoil'd an' sweet,
 A gem the desert that perfumes,
 A flower that hardly kens it blooms.
 When we grow auld, an' bow'd wi' age,
 We'll make an yearly pilgrimage
 Unto this wild an' lonely scene,
 An' greet o'er days lang past an' gane.
 'Twill mind me of thy guileless heart,
 Of what remains and what thou wert,—
 And I'll think of a day of bliss,
 And maiden made to love an' kiss,
 Wha aince gart me the preaching miss :
 An' waur than that ; when her behest
 A solemn task had on me press'd,
 She flew up wi' a wicked screed,
 An' pat a' praying frae my head.

KATE. Here, with the tear drop in my ee,
 Colin, I beg you'll pardon me.
 I did amiss, 'mang passions rife,
 But could not help it for my life.
 In my reproof, though scarce ye'll trow,
 I was at least sincere as you.
 And now I beg of me you'll take
 This book, an' keep it for my sake ;
 It was my honour'd father's gift
 That day when I our cottage left,
 With bitter grief, and youthfu' dread,
 In the wide world to earn my bread.
 " My bairn," quo' he, " ye're gaun to leave me ;
 I hope through life you'll never grieve me.
 If ever sin your fancy brook,
 Think on the Author of this book—
 Think how he reads the heart within,
 And grieves if you should yield to sin.
 An' think o' your old father too,
 And how his soul yearns over you.
 An' O, my bairn, when I am dead,
 Cling to this blessed book, an' read
 Its holy precepts when you may,
 An' God will give you grace to pray,
 To pray in purity of heart.
 Farewell, my bairn, since we maun part !"

Now, Colin, as my sole director,
 My trusted, generous protector,
 Here do I render up to thee
 The charge of baith my book an' me,
 And ne'er again, by it I swear,
 'Twixt you and heaven to interfere.
 Accept, dear Colin, the propine,
 An' O forgie the heart that's thine !

He took the book, an' first he kiss'd
 The donor, then the volume bless'd,
 An' hid it in his bosom true,
 While on his eyelids stood the dew ;
 Then hand in hand they trode the brae
 That looks o'er Ettrick's wilder'd way,
 An' parted on the mountain green,
 Far happier than a king an' queen.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF SIR FRIZZLE PUMPKIN, K.C.B.

My brethren of the sword have astonished me in nothing so much as in their complete mastery of the pen, and all the graces of composition. Where they picked up their style I cannot in the least make out. The mess-room is seldom redolent of the flowers of rhetoric, and the camp is, if possible, still less adapted to literary pursuits. It used formerly to be a reflection against the army, that very few members of that honourable profession were much addicted to the habit even of reading; but what would Smollett, and other worthies, who have painted us in such disparaging colours, say to us at the present day, when there are few messes which cannot boast of a considerable number of authors—historians, novelists, and memoir-writers, not to mention a confused and indistinguishable multitude of politicians and poets? Every officer now not only can read books, (which is perhaps the greater achievement of the two,) but is expected to write them also. At all events, if this literary mania does not seize us while on active service, any interval of repose is certain to induce it with the utmost virulence. Immediately on retiring into civil life a wonderful change takes place even on the most anti-bookish of one's messmates. The epaulettes expand into reams of foolscap, the sword converts itself into a pen, and the jolly soldier of half a year before, is transmogrified into an author. The world, in consequence, is inundated with military sketches;—ladies' maids and sentimental milliners have wept over the soft recollections of romantic majors;—mercenary apprentices have handled the yard with the swagger of a field-marshal, from the inspiring stories of bloody-minded ensigns; and, in short, the slang of the camp has become as familiar as the words of ordinary conversation. The navy also has started in the same glorious pursuit. The gun-room is the scene of many a heroic description. Captains and lieutenants club to celebrate the honour, virtue, cleanliness, and piety of the British tars. Yard-arms, taffris, tarpaulins, gaffs, and booms, hustle each other through every page; and boys and virgins are elevated and astonished at the elegant phraseology of the cockpit. My wonder all this time has been, in the first place, how they can find stories to tell; and, in the next place, how they can find words to tell them. For myself, I am as good as the best of them at an anecdote after dinner; my words come as pat to the purpose as possible; but the moment I take my pen into my hand—presto—all my power of story-telling is gone. Some word appears twice or thrice in the same sentence, my characters become confused, and the personages, whose wit is sure to create a laugh as I tell the story to my friends at table, are the stupidest fellows I ever met, when I write down their facetious responses in black and white. My opportunities of observation have been as good as those of any officer of my standing, and, as I said before, how the devil it is that they manage to tell long stories of two or three volumes, while I can't muster a single page, I can by no means divine. But though I have hitherto failed in my attempts, I have not been altogether discouraged. Perseverance, they say, will conquer in the end; and some of these days, I doubt not, I shall be able to manufacture a warlike tale as well as my neighbours. Besides the honour and reputation, there are other considerations which, it may easily be imagined, would make a successful novel by no means an unpleasant achievement to a captain on half-pay. Plutus, I am sorry to confess, mingles in all my dreams of fame. I envy Col. C. Thornton less for his inimitable style, and power of description, as the means of raising his reputation, than as the means of raising the wind. With such a pen as his, I should soon be in danger of becoming prouder of my purse than of my glory—my pocket should re-echo "sweet music of a silver sound," where now the jingling of keys "make the void mirthful without change." But why should I indulge in such golden dreams? My confounded fingers grow stiff before I have finished a sentence, and sometimes I give way to despair, and fear I must rest contented as a storyteller, which is very different indeed from a story-writer.

While engaged with these thoughts, for I assure you I have long been tormented with this literary and money-making ambition, I luckily received an invitation to pass a few days in the country with a distinguished military friend. When I name General Sir Frizzle Pumpkin, K.C.B. T.K. &c. your curiosity will of course be excited to know something of the private habits of a hero whose public actions have awakened throughout his long and brilliant career so much admiration. In this I shall only gratify you in a slight degree. It is needless to inform you of his hospitality, his generosity, and his winning, and, indeed, his fascinating manners. These are all already sufficiently known. But while on this visit, I was struck with something in his demeanour different from what I had ever remarked before. The General seemed sometimes ill at ease. His habitual good-nature seemed on some occasions to be inclined to leave him, and I could easily perceive that he was teased and harassed more than he cared to shew, by the compliments which a young nobleman of the party heaped on him. I confess with no sparing or delicate hand. This I ascribed to the natural modesty of a brave man—and I loved my distinguished host the more that I saw he shrank from the applauses his actions had deserved. Our time past very pleasantly in spite of these interruptions, and I began to feel my regret, at leaving so excellent a friend, increased as the day of my departure approached. The rest of the guests had left us, and the day before that on which I had fixed to return to my lodging, the baronet and myself were entirely alone. All the morning I had noticed something mysterious in his manner. He seemed on the eve, every now and then, of making me some communication, but suddenly checked himself, and turned the conversation to some other subject. We dined, and after dinner when the bottle had made two or three rounds, the General told me he had something to relate—he began by inveighing more bitterly than I thought the occasion justified against the courtly and complimentary lord I have mentioned. He then, to my astonishment, said something of his conscience not allowing him to accept such praises, and on my expressing my wonder at his squeamishness, he told me he had long wished for some one to whom to make his confession, and on my faithfully promising to assist him with my counsel and advice, he filled up his glass and began as follows :—

You are aware that I am in possession of what the world generally considers the highest favours of fortune. I have risen to a distinguished rank in my profession, my wealth is more than commensurate with my desires, my friends, I may say without presumption, are zealously attached to me, and all these blessings are enhanced by the enjoyment of uninterrupted good health. In the enumeration of my advantages, it may be necessary also to remind you, that my actions have not been altogether unknown. Reputation, and an honorary addition to my name, are the rewards of my achievements. Crowning “a youth of labour with an age of ease,” with every comfort which can rationally be desired, it might be thought there was nothing wanting to my entire felicity. But alas! there is always something to mar our enjoyments—“some fatal remembrance—some sorrow that throws its bleak shade alike over our joys and our woes,”—and by one overwhelming evil all my blessings are rendered of no avail. When I look around me, and see my fields rich with harvests, my lawns green with verdure, and remember that they were acquired from a generous and grateful country, a pang shoots through my heart, and I feel, with the writhings of humiliation and remorse, that I have not deserved its favours; that I have raised myself by a life of hypocrisy, and in short, that these honours and riches which were heaped upon me as the rewards of my bravery and resolution, have been bestowed—upon a coward—Yes, on one of the most nerveless and pusillanimous of human beings. The praises of the public, the compliments of my friends, the whole paraphernalia of my stars and ribbons, fill me with a loathing of myself. If I had really merited such encomiums, I might have felt gratified by their being so universally accorded; but as it is!—You shall hear :

My youth was the most miserable period of my existence. My unresisting and easily intimidated character, made me the slave of any one who chose to domineer over me. The school at which I was educated was to me a collection of tyrants, rather than playmates, and though I was good-tempered and attentive, and consequently a favourite with the master, I was buffeted and despised by the very youngest of the boys. The name Miss Molly, by which I was known throughout the school, sufficiently shews the estimation in which I was held; and if any trick was to be played, any ghost to be raised, any toes to be tied at night, or any one tossed in a blanket for the amusement of the bedroom, Frizzle Pumpkin was sure to be the victim. Amidst scenes such as these, with any spirit which at first I might have possessed, entirely broken, I arrived at the age of sixteen. Thin as a whipping-post, and remarkably tall for my years, I left the scene of my miseries, and resided for some months at home. Many consultations were held as to my future destination. My father, a good easy man, spoke in favour of the church, but my mother, who was a woman of spirit, and whose father had been an officer of considerable reputation, would hear of no other profession for me but the army. Their difference of opinion produced the result which might naturally have been expected, namely, complete submission on the part of my father; and at last it was decided that their only hope should gain everlasting laurels as a soldier. This resolution took me entirely by surprise. My dreams at night were of nothing but wounds and blood. I thought of the certainty of being cut to pieces by some tremendous Frenchman; resistance never entered into my calculations, and as for glory I never could imagine what was the meaning of the word. In this state of dismal foreboding my time was passed, and although I dreaded the profession to which I was doomed, still I was too much afraid of my mother's domineering temper, to protest against the choice she had made for me. A commission was speedily procured, and my fears as the day of my departure approached, amounted to agony. My uniform itself failed to animate my courage, and my sword would have remained undrawn for ever, so great was my repugnance to cold iron. My mother, however, extricated it from its sheath with an impetuosity that made me tremble, and praised its make and temper with all the warmth of approval. My military troubles oppressed me beyond expression, even before I left my home. The trepidation of my mind on first discharging a pistol, it is impossible to describe; if any one has suffered shipwreck, or been spectator of an earthquake, or been bitten by a dog notoriously mad, he may form some slight idea of my feelings when I touched the trigger. Earth swam around me as I listened for the report, and a thousand lights danced before my closely-shut eyes as my senses seemed to expire in a kind of mental delirium.

All this time I must, however, inform you, my fear rested almost entirely in my mind. My outward man shewed few symptoms of the internal struggle; and I am not aware of having betrayed the intensity of my terrors on any occasion, unless by an additional paleness, and a total incapacity to speak. The day fixed for my joining the depôt at last came on; and my courage was, if possible, diminished by every hour that passed. My father, who evidently participated in my alarms, but did not dare to shew them, talked, with a faltering voice and a tear in his eye, about Westminster Abbey and a peerage, and made convulsive efforts to be facetious, while it was evident his fears for my safety were only repressed by his fears of his spouse's displeasure. However, at length the moment arrived, and, after ascertaining of the driver the steadiness and good-temper of his horses, I stepped into a post-chaise, and soon found myself in the small country-town of —, where the depôt of my regiment was stationed. The introduction to my brother officers it is useless to describe. Most of them were young and inexperienced like myself; but, unlike me, they were all filled, to overflowing, with enthusiasm for the service, and anticipations of future glory. Our time was spent in the usual way that time is spent by military officers in a country town. The post-office was regularly visited after parade; an old billiard-table, with a considerable part of the cloth remaining, was a resource for two or three hours; and lounging from one end of the main street to the other, shewing ourselves and feathers to the best advantage, constituted all the rest of our employment. My fears now began gradually to abate. There was no immediate prospect of our being ordered on foreign service, and the routine of my existence became more agreeable, in the exact proportion that I found it less dangerous than I had expected.

As the town of — is situated on a river, many parties were of course formed for boating, and when the weather grew warm, for bathing also. I have always had a horror of the water; but as I was aware that accidents might occur, however carefully guarded against, I lost no time in providing myself with a sustaining belt. In spite, however, of this precaution—and I was assured it was amply sufficient to support even two men in the water—I most sedulously avoided joining my messmates in any of their excursions. I was considered quiet and shy, but in general, I believe, I was rather liked than otherwise—so my excuses were taken, and I was left to follow my own inclinations in peace. One day, when I was walking quietly by the side of the river, in considerable dread that some cows which were feeding in the meadow might be attracted by my coat, I came on a branch of the stream, forming a large water tank through the field; and over this, which was of considerable width, a plank, laid across, acted as a bridge. As I was carefully stepping along this rickety pathway, I was arrested by the shouts of my regimental friends, who were amusing themselves, as the day was oppressively warm, by bathing in this secluded part of the river. I stopped on the plank, and watched their motions for some time, and I could not help envying them their courage in trusting themselves so carelessly as they did into the very deepest part of the stream. Not for all the wealth of India could I have prevailed on myself (guarded as I was with the sustaining belt, which I constantly wore) to have done the same. There was horror in the very thought; and I was going to continue my walk across the ditch, and retire from so dangerous a vicinity, when I was thrilled by a cry of agony from the water beneath where I stood. I looked down, and in the very mouth of the ditch of which I have spoken, I saw Jack Wharton, the liveliest and kindest-hearted of our set, evidently in the greatest danger. He had crept quietly under the sedges at the side, in order to come upon me by surprise; but unluckily, on arriving almost under the bridge, he was seized with the cramp in both legs. He looked up to me in the greatest despair.—“Save me, save me!” he cried in an agony—“Oh! save me!” and sunk below the water, apparently quite exhausted. A thousand thoughts rushed into my brain—I saw his head and pale brow, after coming up for a moment, go down a second time,—a dimness fell upon my eyes, a faintness came over my spirit, and, in the intensity of my apprehension, I lost my balance, and fell into the hole where my poor friend was struggling. A little recalled to my recollection by the plunge, I grasped convulsively at the nearest object, and, supported by my belt, I made directly for the land. Instinctively I clambered up the bank, still clenching the object I had seized in the water. I just saw it was the arm of poor Wharton, and that I had saved him—when again my terrors overcame me, and I fainted.

When I recovered my senses, I was saluted with shouts of “bravo, bravo!” Slowly I opened my eyes, and found myself surrounded by my friends; Wharton was still chafing my temples, and calling me his deliverer, and pouring forth the most profuse expressions of his gratitude. Though still shuddering at my narrow escape, I expressed in a few words my happiness at having been the instrument of his preservation, but I told him at the same time, with truth, that my exertions had scarcely been voluntary, and that as I was quite unable to swim, it was only overpowering necessity which obliged me to plunge into the river. The fame of this exploit soon spread through the somewhat contracted circle of the town of —; my total ignorance of swimming enhanced the merit of my heroic contempt of danger, and for a week or two I was quite the lion of the parties in the neighbourhood. But my gallantry, as it was termed, had a more enduring memorial than the applauses of the beaux and belles of ——. "The officers, at that time in the depot," presented me with a handsome snuff-box, on which is an inscription, testifying their high opinion of my merit in plunging in, at the imminent risk of my life, to the assistance of a brother officer.—This box I of course still preserve, and although it is nearly thirty years since the adventure took place, I can scarcely now look on that complimentary testimony to my courage without a blush.

Young Wharton after that became the warmest of my friends; but in my intercourse with him, there was always on my side a feeling of embarrassment. My conscience would not allow me to accept the gratitude which he offered, and my pride would not allow me to confess to him the real circumstances of the case. This struggle within myself produced a coldness in my behaviour, and I saw that the boy was mortified and disappointed, that his warm advances were so indifferently received. At length, though it was evident he longed for an opportunity to shew his affection for his preserver, as he still thought and called me, he desisted from cultivating any greater intimacy than had previously subsisted between us. I was now considered among my friends a person whose courage was only equalled by his modesty; and an idea began to be spread that I was so reckless of life, in the pursuit of fame, that under the melancholy and quietness of a Jacques, I concealed the spirit and ambition of a Hotspur.

I shall not trouble you with the further details of our residence at —, nor need I describe to you the terror which fell upon me with threefold force from the hopes I had fondly indulged of security, when a dispatch came down for us to join our regiment, which was just ordered abroad. Our march was conducted without any remarkable occurrence; and in the highest possible order, with the steadiness and regularity of veteran campaigners, our new levies made a most imposing appearance when united for the first time to the main body of the regiment, upon parade. Forces had been collected from all quarters, and concentrated at Portsmouth. Our destination was not as yet known, and my fears were accordingly divided between the sabres of the French and the murderous rifles of the Yankees. We were detained for upwards of a fortnight by contrary winds, and I confess to you that my prayers were most fervent and sincere, that the weathercock might never change its direction. At last, however, a calm succeeded to the tempest which had restrained us so long; the transports were anchored as near to the shore as possible, and on the 17th day of —, in the year —, for I love to be particular in my dates, I bade adieu to the shores of England. The voyage left me ample time for serious reflection. I was conscious of my own utter cowardice; I was aware that on the very first occasion of danger I should disgrace myself; and I need scarcely inform you that my spirits, naturally placid, were by no means elevated by the contemplation of my future prospects. The mirth of my companions grated harshly on my ears. I could scarcely believe that their anxiety to meet the enemy was not feigned,—and yet disagreeable as the passage was, I could never persuade myself to wish for its conclusion. Our destination we now found was —. The enemy were known to have made every preparation for our approach, and even the bravest of my messmates, though they were doubtful for a moment of ultimate success, expressed their anticipations of tremendous loss in forcing our way to land. The night before we expected to come to an anchor, my forebodings of evil would not allow me to rest in my cot; I therefore went on deck, and leant despondingly against the mast. The moon was high in heaven, groups of soldiers were lying on the boards, apparently asleep, and the only moving objects on the scene were the few sailors attending to the necessary operations of the vessel. With a sort of desperate resolution I had determined to rush upon death and put an end to my tormenting fears at once,—I had summoned to my aid all that I had ever heard or read of heroic achievement, and having thus made up my mind for the worst that could befall me, I sunk into a state of calm and almost self-devoting despair. I was interrupted in my reverie by a voice at my side—"Pumpkin!" it said, "what a glorious moon!" I turned round, and saw young Wharton gazing intently upon the bright planet; and in my life I think I never saw so beautiful an expression in any one's face as at that moment in his. Languidly I looked upwards to the same object, and said in a low and subsided whisper, "Yes, very."—"Why, you seem in low spirits, considering the noble prospect we have before us."

Never, you will believe me, could it enter into my calculations, that any one would describe the hateful certainty of going into battle as a noble prospect. I accordingly thought he was expressing his admiration of the scenery.

"Such contemplations," I said, "are by no means calculated to raise the spirits. There is something so awful and sublime in the motions of the mighty host now marshalled in such beautiful array within our view, that the mind sinks under it, and admiration is strongly mingled with awe."

"That may be the case," he replied, "to a philosopher, but I never knew any thing of philosophy, and never shall. All that I know or care for is this—that all our operations are regulated by the commander-in-chief; obedience is all we can give, and if you and I are lucky, we shall perhaps be captains within the week."

This soon recalled me to the horrors of my situation, I painted to myself the contempt with which every one, even the warm-hearted boy who looked to me now with admiration and esteem, would regard me after to-morrow's fight. My dogged resolution, prompted by my despair, almost gave way, and I was undecided whether or not it would be better to ease my conscience by confessing the truth to my friend, and rushing at once upon the disclosure which every hour became more hideous to me by delay. That it was inevitable, I did not doubt. I had no high feeling to support me, and I would gladly have exchanged honour, hopes, and reputation, for safety and oblivion. If I could have instantly got to a distance after the confession, I should not have put it off one moment,—but to be pointed at, jeered, laughed at, ridiculed, spurned, despised,—it was too much,—and I resolved to wait patiently the course of events, and not precipitate my disgrace by a premature discovery.

"We shall have bloody work of it at all events, and a glorious victory, whoever lives to see it. We shall first have to stand the fire of all the batteries in going ashore; and after we land, we shall be attacked by the whole army of the enemy drawn up on the coast,—bullets will be as plentiful as peas in August, and our regiment will have its full share, as we shall most likely be pushed first to land."

"Indeed?" I said, as you may imagine with no diminution of my dislike to honourable service—"that arrangement strikes me to be very unfair. The rest of the troops"—

"Spoken like yourself: you are always so kind and considerate—why, it may be their turn next time, and they should not grumble if we step for once before them, into the field of glory."

"Oh no, I have no doubt they don't envy our situation in the least. For my own part, if I were in their place"—

"You would be in a devil of a passion at being kept behind—But however I expect great things from you to-morrow. I shall be very happy if I can only follow your example. The eyes of the whole regiment are upon you, and all of us expect something quite out of the way."

"They will most probably not be disappointed," I said with a bitter consciousness—"I have no doubt they will see many things to amaze them."

"How? have you fixed on any plan? That you will distinguish yourself, I have no doubt; but if in doing so you require the assistance of another, my sword, my life, which I owe to your intrepidity, is at your service."

My feelings became bitterer and more irritable every instant that our conference lasted. I hated the brave young fellow who thus offered every thing in his power to aid my reputation; for you may be sure your true coward hates no man for any thing so much as for his courage. While I was musing on the difference between our dispositions, he again asked me most earnestly by what means I hoped to render myself distinguished?

Worked into a state of frenzy by this harping on what was to me the most disagreeable subject in the world; hating the army, him, myself, and all the universe, I grasped him by the arm, and said slowly and distinctly—"By exposing myself! Mark my words, and remember what I have told you."

Having made this confession, I let his arm go; and as I slowly turned away to hide my agony and humiliation, instead of his eyes being turned on me with the contempt I deserved, they were fixed with a look of generous enthusiasm.

"For God's sake," he whispered, "do not expose yourself too much—but wherever you are, I shall be at your side. God bless you, good night."

Day came at length, and land was descried at the distance of less than twenty miles. Expectation was raised to the utmost height. Officers were busied in all parts of the vessel gazing intently through their telescopes. For myself, I felt no curiosity. I knew that all places were alike to me, and I remained amidst that busy and inspiring scene, in apathy and silence. Every minute revealed to us more distinctly the features of the shore. An abrupt hill, at a little distance from the sea, thickly studded with trees and brushwood, was crowned by a battery apparently of considerable size. To the right of this a thickly-wooded district stretched out as far as the eye could reach; while on the left a level country was spread to an immense extent, and admirably adapted for the manœuvres of an army. The object of our chiefs, we could easily divine, would be to seize the commanding height, and we could not doubt that so important a station would be defended to the last. Exclamations of joy and delight burst from the gazers as the scene gradually unfolded its beauties. The height was evidently manned by a very strong detachment, while large masses of infantry were distinguishable on the plain. To an unprejudiced eye the coup-d'œil would have been wonderfully striking, while no inconsiderable part of the beauty of the prospect, would have been derived from the transports and ships of war covering the whole sea with a white cloud of canvass. Every heart except my own bounded with animation; but, alas! with me the sensation was only one of increased misery and despondence.

Two frigates were sent forward to demolish the battery, and cover the landing of the troops. How nobly this service was performed, it is needless for me to mention,—the noise of the cannon sunk me into tenfold confusion; the smoke rose in dense wreaths, and under cover of the bombardment, the boats pushed to land. Of my own behaviour, I can give you no account. Listening only to the thunder of the artillery, thinking, I suppose, of nothing, but in a state of complete torpor and bewilderment, I took my station in the boat. We soon found ourselves drawn up on the shore; and a shout, which for a moment drowned the roaring of the guns, shewed the enthusiasm of our men, and the success of our enterprise.

Mechanically I marched along with the others—rushed up the hillock of which I have spoken, and after a melee mingled with many horrid sounds, half-maddened with groans, shrieks, shoutings, and exclamations of every tone and nature, I found myself alone. Awakened a little from my amazement, by this appalling discovery, I looked around me: Our troops had pushed most gallantly up the hill, but just as some of the foremost had crowned it, a large reinforcement of the enemy met them at the top, and by overwhelming numbers, repulsed us with incredible slaughter. How it occurred I have never been able to guess—but alone, on the hostile side of the hillock, cut off from our own forces, the bravest might have been excused for giving himself up for lost. I saw no possibility of escape, unless by concealing myself in the thicket to the right, and I accordingly directed my course to the nearest clump. Suddenly the earth was shaken beneath my feet, and on looking round to the place from which the noise proceeded, I saw a charge of our own cavalry which had deployed round the base of the height, upon a regiment of the enemy's light horse, stationed under its cover. The fate of the attack was not long doubtful. The enemy began to waver, and in a short time a complete rout took place. Horses in great numbers, wild and unmanageable, rushed past me on every side. In momentary expectation of being cleft by some retreating horseman, or trodden to death by the hoofs of his charger, I shrieked and holloed, but luckily the enemy were generally more frightened than myself.

In the despair of the moment, although from my childhood in the utmost terror of trusting myself on horseback, I determined, as the only chance of avoiding being ridden over, to seize some masterless charger, and trust to good fortune for the rest. I luckily soon caught one as it galloped past me, and climbed into the saddle. In an instant the horse continued its flight, and badly as at all times I rode, and half delirious as I was with alarm, I rejoiced to see that its speed would soon get me out of the crowd. Intently anxious to preserve my seat, I clung with desperate energy to the mane, and unfortunately my sword, which I still retained in my hand, was jerked by the tossing of my career against my face, and inflicted this ghastly wound, of which you see the mark upon my brow. My horse with untired speed continued its flight, and was evidently gaining rapidly upon those who had fled before. In particular, I saw I was following exactly in the track of an old officer, evidently of distinction, whose horse gave tokens of fatigue. The blood, I perceived, was trickling from several wounds it had received, and I began to be dreadfully alarmed that its rider, when I should overtake him, would blow out my brains with the pistols at his holsters. In this state I managed to catch hold of the reins, but alas! I found that I had little power in reducing my horse's speed. Just, however, as I got up with the officer I so much dreaded, I succeeded in checking my terrified animal, and assumed something approaching to an upright seat. The officer seeing me at his side, and recognising the English uniform, pulled up his horse at the same time. "The fortune of war is yours," he said,—"I yield myself prisoner." Saying this, he bowed, and presented me his sword. Bewildered with the whole adventure, and scarcely believing the reality of my safety, I bowed in return, and took advantage of the stop to which my horse had come to turn him round in hopes of rejoining our own forces. My prisoner who was wounded and fatigued, rode dejectedly at my side. I confess I was under considerable alarm lest he should retract his surrender, and perhaps turn the tables upon his captor. But luckily he entertained no such idea. Our cavalry had gone on in pursuit of the main body of the fugitives, and we still saw them, though at a great distance, furiously engaged. Of the fate of the battery and forces on the hillock, I was of course ignorant, and was in prodigious alarm lest I should fall into the enemy's hands before rejoining our army on the beach. My fears, however, were vain. On rounding the eminence, still accompanied by my prisoner, we found ourselves in presence of the victorious British force. My face being covered with clotted gore, and being altogether excited by my terrors to a degree of fever, my appearance must have created some surprise among our troops. By good fortune I rode up to the station of my own regiment, where I had been long given up for lost. The joy of my companions was warmly and loudly expressed, and I soon was observed by the General, who happened at that moment to be passing along the line. His acute eye saw immediately how affairs were placed. He called me to him, enquired my name and rank, and complimented me highly on my behaviour. My prisoner, in order I suppose to account for his own surrender, related some wonderful instances of my valour; and his rank being no less than lieutenant-general of the enemy, added no little reputation to my exploit. The issue of this battle, so far as I am concerned, is soon told. I was raised to a captaincy on the spot, and sent home with the dispatches. In the general's account of the engagement, the following passage occurred:—"Allow me also to recommend to your notice Captain Frizzle Pumpkin, the bearer of this dispatch. Throughout the affair his conduct was the admiration of the whole army. Alone and surrounded by the enemy, he dismounted a trooper, sprung on his charger, and succeeded, in the face of his own forces, in capturing and securing Lieutenant-General the Baron De ——. I consider myself indebted to his calm yet daring courage, for raising the spirits of the troops to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and I regret it is not in my power to bestow on him a reward adequate to his transcendent merits."

TO THE MOUNTAIN WINDS.

BY MRS HEMANS.

—How divine
 The liberty, for frail, for mortal man,
 To roam at large among unpeopled glens,
 And mountainous retirements, only trod
 By devious footsteps!—Regions consecrate
 To oldest time!—And, reckless of the storm
 That keeps the raven quiet in his nest,
 Be as a presence or a motion—One
 Among the many there.

WORDSWORTH.

MOUNTAIN winds! oh! whither do ye call me?
 Vainly, vainly would my steps pursue!
 Chains of care to lower earth enthrall me,
 Wherefore thus my weary spirit woo?

Oh! the strife of this divided being!
 Is there peace where ye are borne on high?
 Could we soar to your proud eyries fleeing,
 In our hearts would haunting memories die?

Those wild places are not as a dwelling
 Whence the footsteps of the loved are gone!
 Never from those rocky halls came swelling
 Voice of kindness in familiar tone!

Surely music of oblivion sweepeth
 In the pathway of your wanderings free;
 And the torrent, wildly as it leapeth,
 Sings of no lost home amidst its glee.

There the rushing of the falcon's pinion,
 Is not from some hidden pang to fly;
 All things breathe of power and stern dominion—
 Not of hearts that in vain yearnings die.

Mountain winds! oh! is it, is it only
 Where man's trace hath been, that so we pine?
 Bear me up, to grow in thought less lonely,
 Even at nature's deepest, loneliest shrine!

Wild, and mighty, and mysterious singers!
 At whose tone my heart within me burns;
 Bear me where the last red sunbeam lingers,
 Where the waters have their secret urns!

There to commune with a loftier spirit
 Than the troubling shadows of regret;
 There the wings of freedom to inherit,
 Where the enduring and the wing'd are met.

Hush, proud voices! gentle be your falling!
 Woman's lot thus chainless may not be;
 Hush! the heart your trumpet sounds are calling,
 Darkly still may grow—but never free!

FIRST AND LAST.

No. VII.

THE FIRST AND LAST BIRTHDAY.

"Not to-day, George, but to-morrow week," said Mrs Coventry.

"And why to-morrow week, Sarah?" replied her husband.

"Can't you guess, sir?" rejoined Mrs Coventry, in a tone of assumed rebuke.

"To-morrow week—to-morrow week," he repeated, as if really endeavouring to task his memory—"to-morrow week is"— "The second of June, sir," interrupted Mrs Coventry, in the same tone of playful displeasure.

"Oh! I remember now—aye, to be sure—to-morrow week is the second of June—and the second of June—isn't that the second anniversary of our wedding-day, love?"

"Yes, dear George, and the first birthday of my sweet boy," folding the infant which she held in her arms rapturously to her bosom.

"The first birthday of our first child," said he, with a sly emphasis on the word "first."

"Of our first and only child," murmured Mrs Coventry, with an emphasis equally marked, but far different in expression; while, as she spoke, she clasped it to her with a mournful eagerness, as if she then felt it was a precious, but destined to be a solitary, treasure.

There was this feeling at her heart. She could not account for it; she could not get rid of it; but whenever, in those fond anticipations which are among the brightest visions of early wedded life, they talked of their future family, and of what their domestic plans should be, as their family increased, she always seemed to have a foreboding that this boy would alone be spared to her; that whatever other children she might have, they would only pass through a short existence to the grave. At first, her husband ridiculed the presentiment; it was too strong, however, for ridicule to overthrow, and gradually became too sad for it to approach. It was no less inaccessible to reasoning; for all that affection could obtain, was the tender assurance she would try to think of it as little as possible.

And who were George and Sarah Coventry? The reader shall know all that I know myself respecting them.

George Coventry was found one summer's evening under a hawthorn tree, sewed up in a hand-basket. The person who found him was an eccentric old bachelor, of the name of Price Williams, who was very fond of nightingales; and there was a cop-pice, about a quarter of a mile from his house, which the nightingales loved to frequent. Hither he would betake him about sunset; and seated at the foot of this hawthorn, listen to the ravishing melody of the lone songstress till his maid Jemima came to tell him supper was ready, at the hearing of which, he was never known to tarry another minute for the sweetest descendant that ever rolled, rich and musical, from a nightingale's throat. On the evening in question, he found his seat pre-occupied by the little stranger; and Jemima was infinitely perplexed, as she saw her master returning so soon with a basket in his hand, which at a distance appeared like her own market-basket. But her own market-basket was hanging in its place, behind the kitchen door. It was clear, therefore, the basket belonged to somebody else, though she knew of nobody who had such a kind of basket but Widow Pugh, of Rosebank cottage; and Widow Pugh, as she remarked to herself, "lived in a clean opposite direction to the nightingales."

Meanwhile, the old gentleman stalked on, stately and sedate, with this puzzling basket, which he seemed to carry with much care; a circumstance that naturally increased Jemima's perplexity. He passed into the house through the front door, instead of through the kitchen, as he was commonly wont to do. This was adding fuel to the fire of curiosity that already burned fiercely enough in Jemima's breast. He entered his room. She heard him talking to himself. Presently his bell rung, and Jemima was the most punctual of servants in answering it.

"See whether this is a boy or girl," said he, pointing to the infant, which he had taken out of the basket, and laid upon the table. "If it is a boy," he continued, "we'll nurse it between us; if a girl, it shall go to the parish."

"Lord, sir!" exclaimed Jemima, lifting up her hands in astonishment, "I dare say it is nothing but a by-blow! Where did you get it?"

"I get it!" cried Mr Williams, tapping his box, and taking a pinch of snuff as he spoke,—"Pooh!"

"Well, sir," continued Jemima, looking in the infant's face, "I can't tell whether it is boy or girl, for my part—not I—but I dare say it is one or the other, for it is God's providence that these things when they come, never come out of nature."

"No," said her master, scratching behind his left ear; "they are all in nature, Jemima."

"Poor little thing!" she added, "it is for all the world just like a wax doll in a sweet sleep. I'll be sworn it is a girl, it is so quiet, and looks so innocent."

It happened unfortunately for Jemima's characteristics of her sex, that at this moment Mr Williams unpinned from the bosom of the infant a piece of paper, till then unperceived by him, on which were written these words, in a small but legible hand—"George Coventry—preserve the name, whatever fate betide the bearer of it."

Mr Williams adhered to his declaration, save that he and Jemima did not nurse the boy between them. Enquiries were instituted to discover the parents, but they proved unsuccessful. There were those, indeed, who hinted, that if the old gentleman could find out the mother, they would be bound to name the father—an insinuation which always greatly scandalized Jemima, who was not without a theory of her own, however, to explain cause and effect; for, as little George grew up, she discovered a striking likeness between him and sundry "hussies" of the place, whom, as she said "she could not abide to look upon." Nay, on one occasion, she went so far as to remark to her master, that, "the rogue was getting just such a double chin as the vicar, and was wonderfully like him too, when he had his black pinafore on." But she never ventured to repeat this, after the old gentleman admonished her she was liable to do penance in a white sheet in the parish church, for speaking slander.

When George was in his fifteenth year, his benefactor died, leaving him well provided for; though the legacy was subject to sundry whimsical conditions. Among other things, it was required that "he should make choice of the army or navy, but must embrace one of those services within twelve months after the testator's death;" and, that "the principal of the legacy should be at his entire disposal when he was forty, provided he was then a bachelor, and changed his name from George Coventry, to George Hawthorn Nightingale, in commemoration of the circumstances attending his discovery." In default of any one of these, besides many other strange conditions, the property depending upon them, which amounted to some thousands, was "to be divided between any twelve men his executors might select, having each of them a wooden leg, and being bachelors above the age of fifty."

George entered the army, obtained a majority before he was five-and-twenty, and up to that period contrived to steer clear of all the rocks and shoals placed in his course by the humorous ingenuity of his protector. But then it was he first saw Sarah Cecil, a portionless orphan, whose asylum was under the roof of as gentle a creature as Charity ever called to her divine ministry. The grace and beauty of Miss Cecil's person, great as they were, were poor in comparison with that purity of heart, and simplicity of character, which, while they threw a lustre around her moral nature, heightened the fascination of her charms. Deliberation soon became solemn mummery with Major Coventry. Yet would he take himself very seriously to task, for fitting on chains, every link of which, he knew, must cost him its weight in gold, if once fairly riveted. They were riveted; and he was bound hand and foot, long before he came to the resolution of making a vigorous resistance. In short, when he was only six-and-twenty, he renounced all substantial advantages of fortune as George Hawthorn Nightingale, Esq., at forty—and, by the same act which made him the happiest of men, showered down unexpected felicity upon twelve of his fellow-creatures, living in single blessedness and single leggedness. And so perfect, so all-sufficient was his happiness, that never once had a shadow of regret stolen over his mind at a sacrifice, the very existence of which, from motives of the purest delicacy, he had carefully abstained from mentioning to Mrs Coventry.

And what was the subject of discourse between them, which she desired might be postponed till the morrow week?

A mere trifle—but one of those trifles that identify themselves with some of the dearest feelings of the heart. He had seen a pair of amber bracelets in a jeweller's shop,—the price was moderate; and he wished Mrs Coventry to say whether she liked the pattern, before he bought them. "I need not go to look at them," said she, when the conversation was resumed, "for you know, George, I always prefer your taste to my own; but give them to me to-morrow week, and then they will be sanctified by the recollection of the two happiest days my life has yet known." A gentle pressure of the hand which he held in his, and a smile that told of sinless idolatry, were his only answer.

On the evening of this anticipated morrow—of this day of promised blissful remembrance, Major and Mrs Coventry strolled into the fields which surrounded their pleasant suburban dwelling. George was more than usually thoughtful and silent during the walk,—that is, he was less than usually cheerful and animated; for such was his general flow of spirits, that a very slight abatement of their intensity, produced, from the force of the contrast, the effect of extreme dejection. At first, Mrs Coventry feared he was ill; but that apprehension removed, she strove to rally him out of his pensive mood. Her efforts were partially successful. He laughed; he talked more gaily; but she fancied there was a sadness in his laugh, a forced buoyancy in his conversation. She fancied, too, though she knew not why, there was an earnestness, a tender solicitude, in his manner, like that which the sense of past unkindness, or the secret consciousness that we may soon be denied all power to lavish kindness upon a beloved object, sometimes inspires. From such promptings, come the silent, heart-breaking endearments of the slowly dying. The kiss, the embrace, the unwearied indulgence, are all so many gentle farewells of the soul; so many fond and lingering repetitions of pleasures, each of which may be the last, while each that is, springs from deeper and deeper yearnings of the parting spirit.

As they ascended a small eminence, a range of landscape spread before them, bathed in the liquid and trembling lustre of a setting sun. It was a gorgeous spectacle. "How beautiful!" he exclaimed, pausing to gaze around; "how beautiful!—But who, that knew he was to die to-morrow, could look upon a scene like this, and feel the serene holiness of mind it inspires? Yet there are eyes—aye, and of thousands—now bent on that glorious orb, which shall never see it rise—while some, though spared till then, shall be closed in death ere it sets again!"

There was a mystery in all this, as well as in his general deportment during the remainder of the evening, which attracted the observation, rather than excited the fears, of Mrs Coventry. She believed something had occurred to vex him; what it was, she did not seek to know, because, from the unreserved confidence on all subjects that subsisted between them, she was aware the cause of his present disquiet, whatever it might be, was one which, for reasons she had no desire to scrutinize, he evidently did not then wish to disclose.

On the following morning, he rose somewhat earlier than his accustomed hour, to take his usual walk before breakfast. While waiting for his return, a livery servant rode up to the door, delivered a letter, and putting spurs to his horse, galloped off immediately towards London. The letter was for Mrs Coventry, and in the handwriting of her husband! Its contents confounded her.

"MY BELOVED SARAH,

"Come to me without loss of time. I would spare you the shock—but I shall be happier when I hear from your own lips that you will bear your trial with resignation. Come, the instant you receive this. Lose not a moment, I beseech you."

She neither wept nor raved, as, with bloodless cheek, and a palpitating heart, she read these fearful words. "What can have happened?" breathed in a stifled whisper, was all that fell from her; and she pressed her hand upon her brow, to quell the furious beating of her temples. The next instant, hastily folding up the letter, she prepared to obey its melancholy summons.

A postscript directed her whither she was to go; a post-chaise was soon at the door; and silent, as one bereaved of speech, tearless, as the infant that sleeps its first sleep of life beside its joyful mother, this grief-stricken creature, who had hailed that morning with strangely blended feelings of bridal and maternal pride and happiness, now pursued her sad journey! The distance was but a few miles. In less than half-an-hour she was at the place indicated—a small road-side public-house. There, in a low white-washed room, meanly furnished, dark and dirty, laid on a miserable bed in one corner, she saw—no—the ghastly object before her, so hideously disfigured, she could not believe was the same idolized being who had quitted her side, only a few short hours, high in health, and in the full flush of manly grace and vigour. But that outstretched hand—and the motion of it, for her to approach, and the piteous expression of those eyes, which still spoke a language whose mute eloquence had so often thrilled through her soul, revealed the appalling truth. And then it was, the anguish she had borne so meekly burst forth. She clasped the extended hand—she looked at the mutilated face—she knew her husband—and her agony was expressed in loud lamentations and long weeping.

While she mourned, George Coventry breathed his last. He had—put that morning to fight a duel. Two challengers, not the challenged. Two shots were exchanged; the seconds interfered; but Major Coventry was immovable; he would not acknowledge he had received satisfaction till one or both pistols took effect. In the third fire, the ball of Captain Beverley struck him in the mouth, shattered it frightfully, and taking an oblique direction, passed out behind the left ear. He fell; was conveyed to the nearest public-house; and a surgeon sent for, who immediately pronounced upon the mortal nature of the wound. When he heard this, he signified by motions that he wished for pen, ink, and paper. The first thing he wrote was, "Can I be removed home?" The surgeon assured him that any attempt to move him would hasten his death, by increasing the effusion of blood. He then, with much difficulty, traced the few lines to his wife. They were given to Captain Beverley's servant to convey, and he was ordered by his master to proceed afterwards to town, with all possible speed, and return with an eminent surgeon whom he named.

Here were havoc and desolation! A noble heart, struck at by death—a gentle and a loving one, smote by sorrow, even in the fullness of its joy! Alas! there is no treachery in life so to be feared, as the treachery of life itself. The day that has passed prosperously, let it challenge our gratitude; but for the coming one, wrapped in shadows, welcome it with trembling. Each minute has its allotted dispensation of misery to countless thousands. This we know, and it is all. Who among us is warned of that which brings his own?

It was a sharp aggravation of the sufferings of Mrs Coventry, that her husband's wound disabled him from speaking. To have heard his voice once more—to have been blessed by him—to have received his parting benediction for their child, would, she vainly imagined, have been some mitigation; though, in truth, her incessant recurrence to this thought was only the melancholy indulgence of that strange pleasure which sorrow finds (for sorrow has its voluptuous enjoyments) in cherishing itself, in deepening the sources of its tears, and in refusing to be comforted.

In the evening of this miserable day, as she sat weeping by her now widowed hearth, she drew aside the curtains of the cradle where her infant slept. They had been tastefully ornamented with festoons of white satin ribbon—a portion of that same ribbon which had adorned herself at the altar—thus, in all her thoughts, still mingling those two blissful recollections of her short life of happiness—the bride and the mother. They were recollections still; but blissful ones no more. Every feeling that had made them so, seemed blotted from her heart by that sudden affliction which had destroyed their living source. She bent over the slumbering innocent, and, in a voice that bespoke the depth of her anguish, exclaimed, “Our ONLY child! I ever knew it WOULD be thus!” Then, after a pause, during which she had gazed without a tear, she added, in a lower tone, but breathed with such touching tenderness as might beseem a pitying angel, “Poor soul!—and this is thy FIRST birthday? An orphan, now, in thy very cradle—a thing hereafter for charity’s cold smiles! God be merciful to thee, my sweet boy, when I am gone!”

God was merciful. He strengthened the fainting spirit of the mourner; and she lived to shelter her “only one” from that cold smile of charity, which proud benevolence, or compassion, kindled at the shrine of duty, bestows on the unfortunate. The burden was heavy, but not insupportable; the trial was exceeding tribulation, but not utter despair; for He who sent them, vouchsafed fortitude to bear the one, and breathed hope into the soul to assuage the other.

It was, in truth, a severe blow. THE COTTAGE, with all its endearing recollections as her first connubial home, —with all those attachments which the mind forms even to inanimate objects, when some circumstance or other, still fondly remembered, gives them a place in the heart,—had to be relinquished for an humble lodging in the outskirts of the metropolis. Here Mrs Coventry took up her abode, as poor as virtue, and almost as friendless; for she shunned, rather than sought—not from false pride, but from proud economy—those who, in her better days, had been the guests or acquaintance of her husband. This resolution was early taken, and it was easily kept. There were many who expressed their wonder as to “what had become of poor Mrs Coventry and her child;” but none who devoted half-an-hour to enquiries which would have conducted them to the widow’s dwelling. All were “sorry that so amiable and excellent a creature—so gifted and so fascinating too—should have met with such a sad reverse, and wished they knew how they could serve her;” but they bore their sorrow with edifying resignation, and exhibited an exemplary forbearance in not seeking to gratify their wishes. A few short months saw the end of their wondering, their sorrowing, and their wishing; and if “poor Mrs Coventry and her child” had lived and died during the Saxon Heptarchy, they could scarcely have been less remembered.

Small as was the pittance on which she now had to subsist, she contrived, by such self-denials as are known only to honourable poverty, to put aside a little, every year, as a sacred fund for her child’s future education, when he should be of an age to derive full benefit from instructions, which she well knew would be too costly to be defrayed out of her current income. This plan was commenced long before she could possibly judge whether his natural endowments would repay her provident love. But it seemed to impress upon that love the inspiration of a higher power, when, as he advanced in years, there was an unequivocal developement of mental faculties surpassing her most sanguine expectations.

Charles Coventry was, indeed, no “common boy.” Still less was he one of those very common prodigies, who astonish us while they are ten years old, and because they are ten years old, but grow up every-day men and women; little runaways and stragglers, who get the start of Time at the beginning of their journey, and when overtaken by the steady old gentleman, find themselves left behind all the rest of it. Nature had been prodigal in her gifts. There was much of youthful beauty in his person; and he was gentle in his disposition, save when crossed, as he might think, capriciously or spitefully; and then, the haughtiest rebel to submission which a proud and daring spirit ever made. He had great energy of character; felt on the instant what it was he would like to do, and on the instant determined whether and how he would do it. At school, remarkable rather for certainty than celebrity in his studies, his class-fellows would sometimes take the lead, and keep it for a while, but in the end he was always above them, and never lost an inch of the ground he once gained. His reading was of every thing; a book was a book to him, as any meat is a meal to a hungry man; and before he was twelve years old, he had read, "The Whole Duty of Woman," "Salmon's Chirurgery," "A Brief Treatise of Testaments and Last Wills," "Hobbes's Decameron Physiologicum," and an "Alphabetical Book of Physical Secrets," which were the property, and happened to be the entire library, of the old lady in whose house his mother lodged.

It would feebly express Mrs Coventry's feelings, as she watched the opening character of her son, simply to say, they were a parent's. When all the love of which the heart is capable, is concentrated upon one object—when all those sympathies and affections which embrace husband, kindred, children, friends, are called home, as it were, and made to twine themselves about a single being, it is hardly possible to conceive the degree of their intensity. This was her case. Had the boy been as much beneath the ordinary standard of personal and mental excellence, as he was certainly above it, it is not likely there would have been one jot of abatement in this intensity, for love sees more perfections than the judgment can catalogue. But, challenging admiration, as he did, from strangers; the theme of praise with all; the favourite of every one, what could a proud and happy mother do, but, as she gathered in this tribute, adding it to the store which was already great, let her heart o'erflow with its joyful treasure? And she did so, even to the excess that brings agony; for she grew a worshipper of that which, as "a vapour, appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." She could hardly be said to live, or have her being, in any sense distinct from the life of her darling boy; and the thought of what a shadow it was in which her soul found its sum of earthly contentment, would often make her most sad in her very happiest moments. Her constant prayer to Heaven was, that she might live to see him take root where he was to flourish, when she herself should decay and go down to the grave.

The humble fortune of which Major Coventry was possessed at his death, consisted of bank stock, and his widow empowered a Mr Lionel Cranfield to receive the dividends for her as they fell due. Mr Cranfield was a money-getter; one of those men in whose eyes every thing has a money value, or none at all. Money was his god; nor was it ever the less acceptable, because a little dirty, from the channels through which it flowed. What he would not do to get it, no one had ever discovered; what he would, all who knew him could tell. The sordid taint ran through every action of his life. But what then? He paid his debts, so he was duly accounted an upright man in his own circle. He had a son, who inherited in absolute perfection all his money-value notions of men and things, having been taught from his cradle to comprehend only one description of rewards and punishments in this life, the reward of sixpence if he did well, the punishment of losing it if he did ill. This son, when of a proper age, he established in the same line of business as himself; and, as he had hitherto acted for Mrs Coventry without receiving the usual commission, he thought he might as well transfer the agency to him, calculating that Mrs Coventry could hardly expect a young beginner to forego his profits. He was right; Mrs Coventry cheerfully consented to pay Mr William Cranfield, what she had never wished to withhold from Mr Lionel Cranfield, and the latter thus got rid of a gratuitous trust, while he "put money into the purse" of his son. Little contrivances of this sort he delighted in, where, without broadly trading in dupery, he could practically overreach.

Unfortunately for Mrs Coventry, Mr William Cranfield, besides having all the virtues of his father, had a few vices to boot, of his own special rearing. At the head of these was the love of gambling. Need the result be told? He lost largely. He grasped at whatever was within his reach to cover his losses. An act of forgery gave him possession of every shilling belonging to Mrs Coventry; he absconded in time to escape the gallows, and she was ruined!

The utter destitution to which she was thus suddenly reduced, crushed the feeble remnant of that spirit which had so long buffeted with adversity. In his first terror, Mr Cranfield (who had a sort of animal affection for his offspring) professed his eagerness to indemnify her loss, as it had been sustained in consequence of her compliance with his own wishes. But when he found that his son was beyond danger, that no halter in England was long enough to reach him, and that paying the money would benefit neither him nor himself, he offered her the loan of fifty pounds, with an assurance that he would never "trouble her," though, "for mere form's sake, he would take a bill of sale of her furniture." Necessity must accept, not stipulate, conditions. Mrs Coventry, scarcely knowing what she did, and anxious only to meet present exigencies, thankfully closed with what, in the humility of her indigence, she deemed the almost generous proposal of Mr Cranfield. It was sufficient for her remaining wants in this world! Three weeks after the dreadful shock, she breathed her last.

Mr Cranfield kept his word. He did not "trouble" the wretched sufferer. Nay, the day after her death, he employed a broker to value the furniture; and upon his estimate, gave orders, at his own cost, for a decent funeral. When this was over, he completed the sale; paid himself, (with a month's interest;) paid the undertaker, (with a discount of five per cent;) gave the poor orphan a guinea for pocket-money; and calculated, that the balance would nearly liquidate the last half year's school-bill for his youngest daughter.

Charles Coventry was only fourteen when his mother died. He felt his loss, and lamented it, with more sorrow than is incident to that age; for home and mother were equivalent terms in his mind, and in losing one, he had lost both. All his thoughts, all his affections, all his wants, his pleasures, his hopes, had hitherto moved, within that little circle, and revolved round the being that was its centre. There was a dreary void, a blank, a valued thing, gone for ever, which his young heart felt; which every moment recalled; which in sleep lay heavy upon his spirit in dim dreams; which oppressed him when he awoke; but which no reason he was yet master of could make level to his comprehension. A deep sense of his forlorn state, of his having no human creature whom he could call sister, brother, or kinsman, possessed him; and it rose to a feeling of despair almost, when he entered the rooms which were once his mother's, saw them stripped of their furniture, and looked upon the bare walls, which seemed to bid him depart, for there was his home no more!

But whither should he go? Young as he was, the meal which pity set before him was bitter on his lips. The bed whereon he lay was not the place of rest his own had been. The neighbours were kind, most kind; tears would often come into his eyes at what they did for him; but there was a feeling swelling at his heart which warned him he could not be, and be that which his departed mother's prophetic fears had pictured, a "thing for charity's cold smiles." Even at this early age, a haughty, impetuous spirit of independence was kindling, and silently becoming the monitor of his actions. "Is there no work that a boy can do, to get his bread?" was the question he put one day, half angrily, half proudly, to two or three benevolent persons, whom he heard consulting about the best means of disposing of him.

Mr Cranfield was applied to on his behalf. "I will provide for him, for the present," said he; "send him to me."

Charles was delighted, and went with alacrity. Mr Cranfield was upon the point of engaging with a copying clerk at a guinea and a half per week, when he was spoken to about young Coventry. It immediately occurred to that thrifty philanthropist, he could confer two benefits at once—one upon Charles, and another upon himself. Instead of giving him a guinea and a half per week, he only gave him board and lodging, his cast-off clothes, and five shillings a-month to spend or hoard, as he might choose; save that two out of the five were to be deducted for washing, which would be "done at home," at much less expense to Charles, and at no expense to his master.

In the drudgery, the servile drudgery, of Mr Cranfield, (for such he made it,) the noble-minded youth remained three years. There was nothing his generous master could put him to, however menial or fatiguing, at which he repined; and there was nothing too fatiguing, or too slavish, with which to task him. Indeed, the more labour he gave, the better he was satisfied, for then he knew he earned his food, clothes, and lodging—a reflection precious to his proud nature. "I have a right to them," he would often mentally exclaim; and that sense of right would have given to a mouldy crust and a drop of water, a flavour which not the delicacies of a palace could have had for him, without it. In the midst of all his toil, too, he still found time, while others slept, to lay in a store of various knowledge; devoting his three shillings a-month, not to buying books, which would have poorly fed his eager appetite for them, but to subscribing for their perusal at a large circulating library in the neighbourhood.

It was to be supposed, that a mind like his, as its energies ripened, would find the vassalage of Mr Cranfield's service insufferably irksome; and the more so, because of an increasing contempt for his sordid character. He longed for a wider and a better sphere of action; but in all his aspirations, he traced as its boundary the sturdy principle, that he would have his worth, and no more. "A million should not content me," he would sometimes cry, when meditating on the future, "if something within told me my price was greater; but, by the same rule, less than the least that ever satisfied a human being, shall suffice me, if so it ought to be."

About this time, the second son of Mr Cranfield left school; and as his father considered that he must find him in board and lodging, clothes and washing, it would be an economical arrangement to put him in the place of Charles. The advantages were so obvious, that ~~hesitation~~ was out of the question.

"I shall not want you, Mr Coventry, after next Friday," was all the notification he thought it necessary to give one Monday morning.

"Very well, sir," was Charles's reply, as he continued the writing he was upon, while the curl of his lip spoke more scorn than his tongue could have uttered.

"We'll say nothing about the washing for this month," observed Mr Cranfield, when Friday night came, and he put half-a-crown into his hand.

"It wants a fortnight of the month, sir," replied Charles calmly, as he laid the half crown upon the table. "Take your shilling, and give me my eighteenpence. To that I have a right."

Mr Cranfield was struck with admiration. He took back the half crown, and gave him eighteenpence. "You are an honourable young man," said he, shaking him warmly by the hand. "Your heart is in the right place; you'll be a shining character yet. I trust I know how to appreciate such delicacy of feeling. You have my best wishes for your welfare, go where you may. God bless you, and good night."

With these words the door of Mr Cranfield was closed upon him; and with the eighteenpence in his pocket, a small bundle under his arm, and his "heart in the right place," as the worthy Mr Cranfield observed, did Charles Coventry turn from it to "go where he might."

It was summer time; the weather sultry in the extreme; the moon shining brightly; and without knowing whither he bent his steps, without indeed thinking where he was going, for his mind was a chaos of tumultuous thoughts, he found himself in the midst of fields. He followed the path that lay before him. It brought him into a narrow lane, with lofty trees on each side, which interlaced their branches at the top, forming a verdant canopy too thick for the moon to penetrate. He paused a moment to consider whether he should go to the right or left. He had no motive for choice, but turned mechanically to the right. He soon perceived he was ascending a somewhat steep hill, and when he gained the summit, seated himself on the trunk of a tree to take breath.

And now was the first moment he began to think. All, till now, had been a rapid succession of dreams; one unbroken series of visionary abstractions, which had passed through his mind. He burst into a loud laugh; clapped his hands, and chuckled like an over-joyed child.

"Why this is brave!" he exclaimed: "this is a golden beginning of life's journey—free as the air that blows upon me, and like it, unseen of man; unheeded by him, whence I come, or whither I go. By Jupiter! but this is the way to learn philosophy. Oh! there is no master of them all can teach it half so feelingly as this," taking the eightpence from his pocket, and looking at it as it lay in the palm of his hand. "Let me ask counsel of you, my friends," he continued with a laugh. "Will you buy me a bed to-night? Aye, say ye, if I will go without a dinner to-morrow. But when to-morrow comes, there will still be a to-morrow, and another, and another, to the end of time; while thy ending will be with the to-morrow's sun-down—and then!"

He paused suddenly; he examined closely the money he held—he chinked one piece against the other—and then burst into a louder and longer fit of laughter.

"Does the devil hoodwink his own?" he cried. "Yea, doth he; for only by such a trick could this have happened. I said right when I called it a golden beginning. It is a guinea I look upon; twenty-one shillings and sixpence; and so, twenty times a more precious philosophy than I took it to be. Now, had a man who knew the honest value of a guinea been self-cheated thus, I would retread every step I have taken to do him right; but it would be a sin to steal from so poor a wretch, in virtue, as is he who was my master, the blessings he will purchase from every want of mine which his involuntary bounty shall relieve. So to your hiding place again—and now, God speed me!"

It was very true, that Mr Cranfield had given a guinea instead of a shilling. It is no less true, that when he discovered his mistake, he set the matter right, by withdrawing his subscription for one year from a lying-in charity to which he belonged, for the benefit of having his wife's poor relations delivered at their own houses.

The rhapsody of Charles was no sooner finished, than he sprung from his seat, and pursued his walk. The morbid excitement of his feelings had subsided; his over heated brain no longer teemed with confused thoughts and images; the violence of the paroxysm was passed, into which he had been thrown by the staggering novelty of his situation—a night wanderer, without a home, without a friend; without the means to procure the first; almost without the wish to possess the second. From the moment when Mr Cranfield's Spartan annunciation rung in his astonished ears—"I shall not wait you after next Friday"—he had determined in his own mind, that that "next Friday," should be to him the hegira of his life—his point of departure in the world's voyage:—and though he knew he was to set sail without chart or compass, a sort of reckless fascination, suited to his romantic spirit, seemed to dwell upon his resolve. "I can live where there are men to serve," was his frequent exclamation during the interval; and with this feeling at its climax, he turned his back upon the door of Mr Cranfield.

But there is a difference, which only experience discovers, between romantic intentions, and romantic performances. When we revel in the former, we are like the simple country wench, who reckoned up all the things she would buy with the produce of her pail of milk; and when we begin the latter, we very often give the untoward kick which scatters our anticipated delights in the dust. Our hero was already approximating towards such a catastrophe. Tired, drowsy, with an inconvenient appetite, (all of them mere common propensities of vulgar mortality,) the poetical qualities of his situation were fast losing their hold upon his imagination. There was no picturesque bank of violets upon which he could repose; no woodbine bower, the haunt of Dryads or of fairies, with a crystal stream purling through it, which invited him to seek silvan slumbers in its cool recess; no cottage chimney, sending up its wreaths of pale-blue smoke, (the fragrant vapour of turf or green-wood bough,) between two aged trees,

"Where Corydon and Thyrsis met,
Are at their savoury dinner set,
Of herbs, and other country messes,
Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses."

In short, he was wandering somewhere on the confines of Middlesex and Berkshire, than which the deserts of Arabia are hardly less productive of the romantic in adventure, and he would fain have had his supper and gone to bed, than which there are no two conditions of existence less conducive to the romantic in feeling.

Again he seated himself by the road-side to rest, and sleep came over him. It was broad-day ere he awoke. He found he had not been, as he imagined himself in his soliloquy, on the top of the hill, "unseen of man," or "unheeded" by him. His hat and bundle were gone.

"They would have taken my money too, I warrant, if it had not been for the fear of disturbing me."

There was this fear, and therefore due precaution had been employed to do it without disturbing him. There was neither guinea nor sixpence in his pocket! The then possessor of both, as well as of his hat and bundle, was a Scotch pedlar; no thief by profession; one who would not go out of his way to pick a pocket; but one who had no virtue in his soul strong enough to resist picking up whatever came in his way.

Charles was confounded! The colour fled from his cheek, his lip quivered, and tears of vexation, rather than of grief, stood in his eyes. He who was light-hearted, and not without hope, with a fancied eighteen pence only, as his sum of worldly wealth, felt, for the moment, as if he had lost an inheritance, because now he had not a farthing; so little capable are we of putting their true value upon either the frowns or the smiles of fortune. Despondency, however, was as foreign to his character, as it generally is to his time of life. As a matter of choice, he would rather have had his hat, his wardrobe, and his money; as a matter of necessity, he submitted to the privation with a very good grace, after he had done what older and wiser heads are apt to do in like cases, adopted the prudent resolution of never running the same risk again. But could he have seen himself, he would, at least, have confessed there was now something wild, romantic, and picturesque enough in his appearance. Charles Coventry was tall for his years, perhaps about five feet nine; slim, graceful in his carriage, and his figure a perfect model of symmetry; his hair, raven black, hanging in profuse natural curls over his forehead; his features decidedly handsome; of a manly cast of beauty; and their general expression denoting a haughty firmness of mind, softened only by a bewitching smile, that seemed to play perpetually round his mouth. In his gait he was erect, carrying his head far back, and stepping along with a bounding, elastic tread, as if the earth yielded to its pressure, but returned again, with force, to give it a more vigorous spring.

Such a rover, unbonneted, untended, wandering the highways, like a denizen of their vagrant liberties, could not be expected to pass along and rouse no wonder; and fortunately for him, he roused something more than wonder, in one who saw him. He came to a small village, after a walk of nearly fifteen miles, so faint with hunger, that further he felt he could not go, and sat down upon a large stone, which seemed the fragment of some ancient cross, just at the entrance of it. He had wholly forgotten the singularity of his appearance, till it was recalled to his recollection by observing a group of children gazing at him from behind a barn-door, and by noticing the blacksmith, who had left his forge, and now stood midway between it and the footpath, with a horse-shoe, half red hot, in his pincers; the said horse-shoe therein not at all resembling the blacksmith's curiosity, which was at a white heat, to make out Charles, and his business. Charles beckoned him to approach. He advanced with a lazy, loitering step, as if he wanted a little more time for observation at a distance.

"Is it possible to get employment in this place?" was his first question.

"Yes, possible enough, I take it, for we have plenty of idle poor here, who will rather starve than work."

"I would work that I may not starve," replied Charles.

"Aye," responded the blacksmith, looking at him with a dubious eye, as though he thought he was likely enough to starve, notwithstanding, if he had nothing but his work to trust to for a dinner.

"I have been robbed on the road," continued Charles.

"Indeed! as how?" interrupted the Cyclops.

"While I slept."

"While you slept? Why, that's a bad look-out, young fellow; but you might expect as much, I think, in these parts, if you make the highways your bed; for we find enough to do to keep ourselves from being robbed with our eyes open."

"I am penniless, and in want of food," added Charles; "but," fixing his eyes earnestly on the man, "I seek no charity—whatever hand supplies my necessities shall be repaid by my labour."

"I daresay it's all very true what you say; however, as you are a stranger to me, you'll not take it amiss if I don't interfere."

With these words the blacksmith hastened back to his forge, and began to ply his anvil with redoubled diligence. Charles covered his face with his hands, and felt at that moment more anguish of mind than he had ever known. He remained in this attitude, bitter forebodings crowding fast upon him, until he was roused from it by a soft female voice.

"Young man! If you please, my mistress wants to speak with you."

He looked up. A rosy-cheeked lass, with dove-like eyes, in a mob cap, black stuff-gown, and a white apron, tucked up sideways, stood before him.

"And who is your mistress, pretty one?" said Charles, with that indescribable smile of his, for there was a something in the girl's manners and appearance which operated like a charm—"Who is your mistress, and where does she live?"

"Over the way, if you please, sir. Her name is Mrs Saville."

"I don't know her, my dear," replied Charles.

"I know that, sir," and a sort of awkward blush diffused itself over her countenance, called there as much by the strange meaning of Charles' gaze, as by his flattering epithets of "dear," and "pretty one."

"Are you sure you are right?" he continued.

"Quite sure, sir," she replied; "my mistress said, 'Mary, do you see that poor young man sitting there?—he seems ill—go and tell him I want to speak with him.'—So I have come to tell you."

The innocence and simplicity of this mode of authenticating her embassy left no doubt upon Charles's mind, that Mrs Saville, whoever she might be, did "want to speak with him;" and he followed his conductress to a large, old-fashioned, but substantially built mansion, which stood back twelve or fifteen yards from the public road. He was ushered into a spacious parlour, solidly rather than elegantly furnished, where he found Mrs Saville. She was considerably advanced in years, somewhat below the middle height, with flaxen hair, and a remarkably pale, but delicately transparent complexion. Her air was courteous and refined, and bespoke the gentlewoman of the old school. There was a clear silvery tone in her voice, coupled with a certain emphatic precision in her mode of talking, and a quiet ease in her stately unembarrassed manner, which forcibly reminded Charles of his own beloved mother; nor was this impression weakened by a peculiar character of benignity and goodness which dwelt upon her still interesting countenance.

Benevolence and pity, when they are of the right quality, (equally remote from the parade of doing good, and the impertinence of worthless curiosity,) perform their task with a gentle impatience to hasten relief, by sparing the unfortunate every anxious feeling of suspense. Mrs Saville, in a few kind words, informed Charles of her motive in sending for him. He was touched to the very heart. It seemed, as if the years of his infancy and boyhood had returned; for, never since those years, never since his mother's death, had the voice of man or woman reached his heart. It seemed, too, as if here were a being the heart might trust; one who would not fling upon its breathings the churlish spirit of a selfish world, nor interpret its desires by the cold cunning of sordid calculation; one whom even he, with all his proud scorn of unrequited benefits, could be content to call and feel his benefactor. He related what had befallen him on the road, and how it had hence chanced that he was in his present plight. But this was only half the tale; his expressive features, his natural grace, and the simple eloquence of ingenuous truth, told for him, while, as he partook of refreshments he so much needed, Mrs Saville extracted in detail the "story of his life."

"You have spoken much of your mother," said Mrs Saville; "but nothing of your father."

"I never knew him; he died when I was in my cradle."

"That was a sad mischance."

"My mother felt it so," replied Charles; "for as often as she talked to me of him, it was with a grief as fresh as when he died."

"Then you know the manner of his death?" observed Mrs Saville.

In answer to this question, Charles related all the circumstances of that event, as he had heard them from his mother. Mrs Saville appeared greatly interested with the narrative; for it partook of that deep-toned melancholy with which it was ever invested by her from whose lips alone he had listened to its recital.

"I do think," said she, when he had concluded, "it were a thousand pities you should not have a friend at this critical moment of your life."

"It is a wide world, madam," replied Charles, thoughtfully, "and there are paths enough for all who are in it: sooner or later, I shall find my way into one of them."

"So I doubt not you will," answered Mrs Saville; "but it is because the world is wide, because there are many paths, and because of those many, there be some that are very bad, that they who are entering upon it, and have their path to choose, stand in need of those who have gone before them to direct their steps."

"I have been the child of misfortune hitherto by decree," said Charles; "henceforth, I elect myself the child of fortune by choice, and bind myself upon her wheel, the seeker of all its giddy turns."

His features brightened, and a bold daring flashed from his eyes, as the still fascinating vision of a troubled destiny dimly floated before his fancy.

"I will not seek to turn you from your choice," continued Mrs Saville, with the same unperturbed and mild tone of expostulation she had all along maintained; "I would only ask to be permitted to give myself one of those turns of fortune's wheel, of which you are so enamoured."

Charles was silent.

"Come, young man," added Mrs Saville, "let me have power to persuade you, there is an over-ruling Providence that guides (and to fulfil its own inscrutable purposes) all the seeming chances of this life. Compare our journey through it, from the time when we commence it alone, to a traveller having to cross a broad and rapid river, by the aid of stepping-stones, placed at irregular, and sometimes hazardous, distances. You are that traveller; you have arrived at the margin of this river; you are considering how you shall cross it; let me place your foot on the first of these stepping-stones. How you are to reach the next, and the next, and the next, and whether you are to find them many or few, that so your passage shall be easy or difficult, nor you nor I can tell; but Fortune, your chosen goddess, offers you the first."

This unexpected and irresistible appeal, urged with such singular adroitness and delicacy, urged, too, in tones, and with a persuasive gentleness, that strangely recalled thrilling remembrances of his mother, overpowered the feelings of Charles. A thousand emotions struggled for utterance; but all he could say, or rather attempt to say, was a stammering acknowledgment of gratitude, without accepting or refusing the kindness that excited it.

"Your agitation," continued Mrs Saville, after a short pause, "convinces me I have struck the chord whose vibrations are in unison with my desires. I take your answer from the unerring oracle of awakened feelings which have no words, but express themselves in the trembling language of the eye, or the burning of the flushed cheek. You are my guest to-day. To-morrow, you shall depart upon an errand that I dare promise myself will not disappoint mine or your hopes. Remain here," she added, rising from her chair, "I will return directly." With these words she left the room.

Before Charles could recover from the spell-like trance into which this address had thrown him, Mrs Saville re-entered the apartment, with an open letter in her hand.

"I feel assured," said she, "I am only fulfilling an appointed duty in what I have done, for these things are not the work of chance. This is a letter to my brother. He is an excellent man, and has the power, where he sees the propriety, of befriending the friendless. If he take you by the hand, it must be your own fault should you not adequately benefit by the introduction. You shall hear what I have said, that you may know precisely the circumstances under which you will present yourself to him."

Mrs Saville then read the letter. It was little more than a statement of the manner in which she had become acquainted with Charles and his history, and a simple, but earnest entreaty, that he would endeavour to complete what she had begun.

"Now," continued Mrs Saville, "you shall depart with this early to-morrow. If you are at the first milestone, beyond the turnpike where the two roads meet, a little before five o'clock, the stage will pass in which you may proceed to London."

"I am utterly unable, madam"—exclaimed Charles, with an agitated voice—

"Spare yourself and me," interrupted Mrs Saville. "I should be sorry if you were able to say what it is natural you should feel, on an occasion like this. So here let us dismiss the subject. We shall not be at a loss, I dare say," she added, smiling, "for others;" and immediately led the conversation into various channels, till the excitement of Charles's mind gradually subsided. He then entered with animated freedom into discourse; and it was easy to perceive how her first favourable impressions were deepened, as she insensibly drew from him the authentic transcript of his mind.

When night came, he took leave of Mrs Saville. His farewell was imprinted on the hand extended towards him, with a silent fervour that would have satisfied the excellent

Mr Cranfield his heart was indeed "in the right place." In his bedroom he found the letter lying on the table, sealed and directed; and beside it a neat silken purse, containing twenty guineas.

Charles sat down to think; to live over again the extraordinary day he had passed. He was too young and inexperienced to read its eventful history, by the sober light of reason. The world and its concerns, the human heart and its mysteries, the holy deeds of unobtrusive virtue, were to him all unknown. What had happened, therefore, seemed more like a tale of fairy-land, than that thing merely which men call good fortune; of which the instances are so many, that were they all recorded, we should cease to write romance, as less romantic than truth. Thought could not help him out of his perplexity. "View it how I will," he exclaimed, at the close of his meditations, "it is a miracle; but at all events I will see the end of it."

With this declaration he retired to bed. In the morning he awoke refreshed and cheerful. When he descended from his room, the only person he saw was the pretty dove-eyed lass, who had been the ambassadress of Mrs Saville the preceding day. She looked as if she knew all that had happened, and rejoiced in her knowledge. A passing word of gallantry escaped his lips, as she opened the door for him; and hastening to the "first mile-stone beyond the turnpike-gate," the stage soon arrived in which he was conveyed to London.

It should be here mentioned, that when Charles entered the village, and seated himself upon the old stone, in the way already described, Julia Montague, a young lady in her eighteenth year, and the niece of Mrs Saville, was standing at the parlour window, while her aunt was busy settling the accounts of the week in another part of the room. It is not meant to be insinuated, that if, instead of Charles Coventry, (and the reader remembers what sort of a looking person Charles Coventry was,) a poor, decrepid, aged man, had rested his weary limbs on that same piece of antique stone, there would have been the least difference in Julia Montague's humanity. Be that as it may, however, it was entirely owing to her humanity, in the first instance, that Mrs Saville saw Charles at all; for the weekly accounts were very long, and it is exceedingly probable he would have left his seat before they were finished, had not her niece been the first to pity his distressed condition. Oh, the unsearchable depths of woman's sensibility!

The letter which Charles carried with him was directed to Nicholas Howard, Esq., Thames Street. Thither he proceeded the moment he arrived in London. Mr Howard was at home. He read the letter, and there was a smile upon his features, as if mentally exclaiming, "another of my good sister's benevolent whims!" Mr Howard, however, though, as Mrs Saville had said, "an excellent man," was very much a man of the world. His reception of Charles, therefore, was marked by a degree of caution which appeared cold and repulsive. It was evident too, from the questions he put, (and which Charles answered frankly but haughtily, because they were tacit impeachments of his veracity,) that he did not quite believe the story of himself as related to Mrs Saville. At the close of the interview, he said he must enquire further of Mr Cranfield, before he could promise to attend to his sister's request, offering him, meanwhile, some small pecuniary aid, if he stood in need of it.

"I do not, sir," said Charles respectfully; "Mrs Saville has placed me beyond the reach of immediate difficulties; but were it otherwise, I could not consider myself worthy of your bounty, till you thought me worthy of your confidence."

Mr Howard smiled, as men in whom experience has worn off the first fine edge of ingenuous feelings are apt to smile, when they listen to sentiments which they remember as once their own, and remember too, how, like the perfume of a gathered flower, they are hastening to decay in the beaten paths of life. He named a day when Charles was to call again, and they separated.

"What a difference between brother and sister!" he exclaimed, as he left the house; ignorant that their hearts might be cast in the same mould, but that the brother knew the world, and the sister did not. "Nothing will come of this, I see," he added, "for he has suspicions of me, which I would rather sweep the streets than condescend to remove"—and his proud blood mantled into his cheek.

Charles repeated his visit at the appointed time, armed with premeditated dislike—almost with an irritable spirit of predetermined offence. Mr Howard's altered manner dissipated in a moment the petulant humours of a week's nursing. He was a man of few words; but his words, like his dealings, were direct, and to a given purpose.

"Mr Coventry," said he, when Charles had taken a seat, "I can now give you my confidence. I have seen Mr Cranfield; I have also, unexpectedly, had opportunities of making other enquiries; and the best proof of their result is, the offer I at once make of receiving you into my employment." What followed may be briefly described. The situation was one of small emolument; but to Charles, (who accepted it with silent contrition for his ungenerous suspicions of Mr Howard at their first interview,) it was an estate, compared with his earnings in the service of Cranfield.

Years rolled on, and in each successive one Charles Coventry still found something to make it brighter than that which went before. There were no sudden bursts of prosperity: no charming windfalls, that "came pat like the catastrophe of the old comedy;" but there was a sober, steady, progressive improvement, which, by the time he was three-and-twenty, trebled his original salary. Nor was this because Mr Howard was liberal. It was because Charles was diligent, to render himself worthy of advancement. Had he been without that stirring quality which will not let its possessor keep the valley, while others tread the heights, his merely faithful services would have reaped the harvest which thinly strews the garners of negative virtue, while bolder, if not always better, husbandry, gathers in its abounding crop. But he had in his composition the first element, the fundamental basis of all prosperity in life, where prosperity waits upon desert—a fixed determination to be master of his situation whatever it might be. Had he been only a shoe-black, he would infallibly have been the best shoe-black of his time or place.

This impulse led him to widen the range of his studies, so as to embrace those comprehensive principles of commerce, which, in their practical application, produce that combination so rare in every country save England, the merchant-statesman; who makes knowledge the handmaid of enterprise; and surveys, with a philosophic mind, the rational and artificial wants, the physical resources, the moral characteristics, and the political institutions of all nations, to render all tributary to the prosperity of his own. Mr Howard quickly discovered the expanding resources of Charles's mind, and insensibly began to treat him with that deference, which intellectual superiority, in whatever shape it manifests itself, enforces alike from those who can, and those who cannot, estimate its precise value. Charles was gradually admitted to his confidence, consulted upon specific undertakings, and referred to for facts, connected with complicated questions of foreign or domestic trade. In no one case did Mr Howard find this confidence misplaced, or the advice he sought, or the information he required, inapplicable to its purpose.

Thus fortified in his opinions of his eminent qualities, and satisfied, from experience, that his prudence, and his cautious habits, were in no way injuriously affected by the impetuous energy of his general character, he confided to his management an affair of vital importance, as connected with both the honour and the stability of the house. A voyage to India, however, was necessary; and thither Charles went (then only in his five-and-twentieth year,) intrusted with full power to act upon his sole responsibility, in a matter of such vast magnitude, that it might have added furrows to a brow already wrinkled by a long life spent in adjusting similar transactions. But he approached the question undismayed; not from any over-weening reliance upon himself, but because, having deliberately investigated it, he believed he clearly saw where the justice of the case lay, and in that (if he were right) he had determined his strength should lie. He was right: and he stood like a rock. One by one, he obtained, from the adverse parties, the admissions which built up the defences of his own position; and when the whole was complete, they had no alternative but to concede the issue, or deny their previous acquiescence in all the premises upon which it was legitimately established.

At the expiration of three years, Charles returned to England. Mr Howard received him with warm congratulations, being already apprised, by his letters, of the course and issue of the negotiation. The sum which it involved was little less than half a million sterling; and this had not merely been released, but the mode of its release had completely effaced every mark of apparent dishonour, which eager enemies and cold friends had sought to fix upon the business. The name of Howard stood, if possible, higher than it had ever done; and the owner of that name not only felt the obligation, but it was his pride to acknowledge it suitably. His first act, in a spirit of munificent gratitude, was to transfer to the name of Charles Coventry, in the books of the house, one hundred thousand of the sum he had redeemed; his second, to notify on Change, and by all other usual means, that henceforth the house itself would be the firm of Howard and Coventry.

It was shortly after this event he saw Mrs Saville, for the first time since that memorable morning when, friendless, hungry, and destitute, he told his disastrous story to the churlish blacksmith, and attracted, unknowingly, the pitying notice of the fair Julia. He had never forgotten his kind benefactress; on the contrary, it was his delight, at each fresh turn of fortune in his favour, to make her acquainted with it; and she always received the intelligence with unabated interest in his welfare. She had come to town for the benefit of medical advice in that incurable disease old age, (for all her complaints were but the falling to pieces of an excellent constitution preparatory to the closing scene,) and taken up her abode in Mr Howard's house, where Charles renewed his personal acquaintance with her. He was shocked to see the dilapidations time had wrought in so short a period; forgetting that, between sixty-five and seventy-five, ten years make sad havoc. Her stature, always diminutive, had assumed the stoop of decrepitude; her flaxen hair was a silver white; her delicately pale complexion had the wan hue of sickness; and her clear, musical voice had lapsed into a cracked, tremulous tone. But there was the same benignity of countenance; and her carriage, though feeble, retained its impress of courtesy and refinement.

Mrs Saville was accompanied by her niece, who, strange to say, was still Julia Montague, though now bidding adieu to six-and-twenty. Julia, if not absolutely beautiful, was at least something more than interesting in her appearance; and united to elegant manners, an amiable disposition, and a richly cultivated mind. Whether she could have married, but would not; whether she would, but could not; or lastly, whether neither was the case, but that she was single for the same reason that she had auburn hair, are points which it were utterly indefensible to discuss. It is enough that she was single, and that the sterling qualities of her character attracted the notice of Mr Coventry in the frequent opportunities he now had of observing her. He, too, was beyond that period of life when either the heart or the eye is alone consulted, provided there be a head to lend its assistance. But Julia Montague had attractions for all three. The eye of a husband might dwell with conscious pride upon her personal charms; his heart, with fond devotion, upon her gentle virtues; and his mind, with calm admiration, upon the natural endowments and acquired treasures of hers. There was food for passion, for love, for esteem. When the first decayed, as decay it must, though "to a radiant angel linked," endearing love would fill the void, and sober reason, that knows no change, shed its mild lustre to the last.

After this preparation, the matter may as well be settled at once, for there can no longer be any secret in the business. Every reader has already anticipated the inevitable union between Charles Coventry and Julia Montague. It took place about six or seven months after her arrival in London, and scarcely as many weeks before the decease of Mrs Saville, who expired suddenly, while sitting at breakfast on the very morning of the day she had fixed for returning into the country, under the firm persuasion of signal benefit derived from the skill of her physician. It was a falling asleep, rather than that terrific struggle between soul and body, when they are to separate. She leaned back in her chair—the shadow of death passed for a moment over her countenance—there was one long-drawn sigh—and all was over! Thus mild and peaceful was the departure of Eugenia Saville from a world through which she had passed as mildly, as peacefully,—and most holily! Tears were shed for her, not such as fall upon the grave of all who leave behind kindred or friends to mourn a common loss with common grief; but such as hallow the memory of the good; tears, whose source was in the heart, and which dropped from eyes where many a time and oft they had been dried by the benign being they now bewailed.

Mr Howard did not survive his sister more than two years; the exact number by which he was her junior in age, so that their earthly pilgrimage was of the same duration, almost to a day. Having no family, and all his relations being in opulent circumstances, he bequeathed the bulk of his immense property to charitable institutions; and to his partner, Mr Coventry, the valuable possession of the business of the late firm. To his niece, Julia Coventry, he gave a legacy of five thousand pounds; "being," as he expressed it in his will, "the fifth part of the sum he had intended to leave her, had she not already succeeded to two fortunes—the one that was her aunt's, his dear departed sister, Eugenia Saville; the other, the far better fortune of a good husband."

From this period, the career of Charles Coventry was marked by unexampled prosperity. Wealth flowed in upon him through a thousand channels, with all its concomitants, vast influence, the highest distinction that can surround a commoner, and the ambition to become the founder of a family. As a first step towards effecting the last, he obtained a seat in Parliament; as a second, a preponderating voice in the nomination to other seats; and as a third, he concentrated all the energies of his mind and character to acquire public reputation as an orator and politician. He had the requisites for both; and his political principles were upon record, in a work which had excited an unusual degree of popular notice, from its caustic analysis of Whig patriotism, and its sarcastic delineations of the leading Whig patriots, for the last half century.

He was soon satisfied he had not placed before his hopes a visionary prize. Scarcely had he taken his seat, and certainly had not addressed the House more than three or four times, when he was singled out for one of those ferocious attacks by the Opposition, which they never make except upon an imbecile Minister, or a formidable adversary who is rising to his proper level. It embodied every mode of parliamentary warfare, from polished sarcasm and eloquent invective, to deep-mouthed reproof, and the light artillery of ridicule. The Whig benches rang with acclamations; the Treasury ones were silent. To have echoed those acclamations, would have been to recognise, as a champion, one who was on his trial to establish whether he had the mettle in him which would proclaim him such, or only the ardour of a well-disposed, but feeble auxiliary. There was not a man in the house who better understood the true nature of his position, or all that hung suspended on the issue, than Mr Coventry himself. Pride, ambition, glory, conscious strength, contempt of despicable motives, inflamed into resentment at the anticipated possibility of their success, every feeling that could inspire an ardent, generous nature, concurred to animate him. He rose. His exordium was placid, easy, playful even; but there was a collected energy of purpose on his brow; a kindling, but smothered fire in his eye; and a dignified repose of manner, which bespoke the secret knowledge of a reserved strength for the decisive onset. It came.

There had been the stillness that foretells the hurricane; the rising gusts and furious eddies that are its immediate harbingers; and there was the hurricane itself! The devastation was complete. Not a vestige remained of the mighty fabric which sarcasm and invective, reproof and ridicule, had raised to arrest his progress; and when he sat down, with the emphatic declaration, "that as he hoped he should never invite hostility by presumptuous arrogance, so would he never bend to it, when it wore, in his judgment, the livery of that most degenerate of our vices, or, if they liked it better, meanness of our infirmities," peals of tumultuous cheers bore testimony to the eloquence, manliness, and justice of his defence. The Minister was loud in his encomiums, and personally congratulated him upon the display he had made; while the adherents of government, now that he had shewn he was able to assert his own cause, came forward with oppressive alacrity to assert it for him. With modest self-denial, he belied the swelling exultation which throbbed in every pulse of his excited frame; but he who has fought hard for victory and gained it, with whatever well-beseeming diffidence he may teach his tongue to disclaim the laurel, has that within, even at the moment when he wraps the cloak of humility in its thickest folds about him, which whispers to his proud heart that he is a conqueror. Charles Coventry had feverish dreams that night. Titles, and ribbons, and glittering stars, and bright honours, dazzled his sleeping fancy; and such a glass as Banquo held in his hand, when the weird sisters "grieved the heart" of Macbeth, seemed to shew him "gold-bound brows" which he could "smile upon, and point at for his."

At length he found himself with his foot planted on the first step of "ambition's ladder." An executive appointment, with a baronetcy, were offered him in requital of his long, disinterested, and valuable support of government. He accepted them. Then came another night of feverish dreams, as he laid his head upon his pillow, Sir Charles Coventry, a member of the administration. He was now approaching his fiftieth year, and was the father of a numerous family, three of whom were sons. If, therefore, he had touched the boundary of his hopes, he had the satisfaction of knowing that with his wealth, he should transmit a title to his posterity. But the same prudence, talent, and unwearied ardour in the pursuit of whatever he undertook, which had conducted him thus far, opened the path to his further advancement. He distinguished himself greatly by the vigorous and efficient discharge of his official duties; and while he impressed his colleagues and the country with a high opinion of his fitness for more important functions, he silenced the hostility of political adversaries, who, when he accepted office, were not slow to fling upon him their taunts, as an adventurer for place without the requisite qualifications. A few short years saw him raised to the dignity of a privy-councillor, and graced with the ribbon of the order of the Bath.

Behold him now! The Right Honourable Sir Charles Coventry, K.B. giving weight to the measures of Government by his advice, and supporting them afterwards by his eloquence in Parliament, where he was no longer the candidate for distinction, but the possessor of it. He had wholly withdrawn himself from mercantile affairs, partly because their adequate superintendence was incompatible with the other demands upon his time; but more because they might stand in his way, if the occasion presented itself, for grasping at the great object of his ambition. He had realised a princely fortune, which he used with the unostentatious virtue of one who remembered what he was thirty-five years before; for it was just that period since his forlorn condition had awakened the sympathy of Mrs Saville, whose memory was idolized in his recollection. He never forgot that condition. The "neat silken purse," which contained the first twenty guineas that had ever called him master, was religiously preserved; and he would often fancifully compare it to a little rivulet welling forth from the side of some lofty mountain, which, augmented in its course by many tributary streams, becomes at last a mighty river, pouring its ample waters in a majestic tide to the green ocean.

One of those political emergencies, arising from the jealousies of rival statesmen, which have frequently lifted into power men who had been all their lives vainly striving to bring about such a consummation of their hopes, operated propitiously for Sir Charles Coventry. It is true he had sown the seeds; but it is no less true, that without such a concurrence of circumstances, in all probability he would never have reaped the harvest. Matured, however, as his experience now was, and unabated as was that ardour of character which had distinguished him from his cradle, a transient misgiving of himself crept over his mind when the prize lay fairly within his reach, and he was invited to stretch forth his hand. But the misgiving was only transient. A noble enthusiasm succeeded; the more certain to conduct him prosperously through his trial, because it had been ushered in by a wise diffidence. He accepted the seals of office; took his seat at the council-table, as a Cabinet Minister; and saw himself honoured, in a pre-eminent degree, by the personal and constitutional confidence of his sovereign. As on the other occasions of his life, he at once filled the space in which he moved. The energies of his nature developed themselves with increased amplitude; the dimensions of his intellect were enlarged to the full extent of its new sphere. This extraordinary quality, whose existence could never have been known, but by the means which actually disclosed it, (although its secret influence was the hidden-spring of all his actions, as it ever must be of all men who build themselves a name,) created so much astonishment in one of his colleagues, that he observed, "If Sir Charles Coventry were to become King of England, every body would say he was born to wear a crown; for he always seems to have been intended by nature for the precise station he occupies." A profound mystery of the world was solved in this half-jocular, half-petulant remark. It is those, and those only, "intended by nature for the precise station they occupy," who rule the world, from the Macedonian conqueror down to the village oracle; and many a heart, which has the noble quality, lives and dies in ignorance of its presence, because occasion has not called it forth.

Sir Charles Coventry exercised the high function of a Cabinet Minister for eleven years; and during the last three, that of Prime Minister.

But he had now passed his grand climacteric; and though free from any of the more enfeebling symptoms of age, began to feel a desire for repose. He had lived long enough for others, and for worldly objects. He wished to find a quiet interval, this side the grave, for the peaceful enjoyment of himself. Such, however, is the fascination of power, (next to life, the hardest thing, perhaps, to part with voluntarily,) that the desire languished two years before he could resolve to intinate it to his Royal Master. When he did, permission was granted, but with many flattering expressions of regret, and the still more flattering declaration of a wish that the memory of his eminent services should be perpetuated by the honours of the peerage. A few weeks after, the Minister resigned the seals of office as VISCOUNT GLENCRAIG!

Here terminated his public life; but it was the dispensation of Providence that he should live to a ripe old age in the serene luxury of a gradual unfelt decay, surrounded by an affectionate family, beloved by many friends, and honoured in the world's esteem. Lady Glencraig, who had been his companion in climbing the dazzling heights of rank and power, shared with him, a short time, the tranquil retirement that followed; but she set out before him on the great journey of eternity. The separation was tender, not agonizing; for no earthly happiness is blighted, no fondly-cherished hopes of years to come are destroyed, when, trembling on the verge of eighty, hearts are unlinked by death, which have throbbled in unison through all their foregone days. "Tarry yet a little space, and we will go together," may speak the natural wish of the survivor; but the soul breathes this consolation, "to-day is appointed for thee—and for me a to-morrow which is at hand." The venerable Glencraig felt this, as he bent over the aged form of her, on whose pale wrinkled face there beamed the placid smile which told of blameless joy that she was summoned first; yet, not till parting was like the current of a quiet stream, whose waters, separated by some dark and rocky fragment, flow in a divided course round its base, but meet again to be for ever joined.

Two sons and four daughters of Lord Glencraig were married, and the parents of a numerous offspring. The elder of the former, who was heir to the title, had distinguished himself in several foreign missions of great delicacy. Two other sons, and one daughter, remained unmarried, the last probably because she was devoted to a science which withdrew all her thoughts from earth. She was an astronomer; but beyond looking at the heavenly bodies through magnificent telescopes, it never appeared that any thing came of her star-gazing.

It was delightful to see him, with unimpaired faculties of mind, and few infirmities of body, wearing out the remnant of a life that had been so full of busy incidents. Some branches of his family were always with him, and once in each year it was his custom to have them all assembled at his table, children, grandchildren, and great-grand-children, even down to the nursing of six months old, or younger, if there chanced, at such time, to be a fresh arrival. Oh! the flow of sublime and holy feeling that would seem to gush from the old man's heart at those moments, as he looked round and saw the living images of his Maker, in whose veins ran kindred blood! How, like a patriarch of the chosen land, he would discourse wisdom with the elders, mingling the maxims of this world with the piety of the next! And then, he had cheerful thoughts, and a lightsome spirit, to call up mirth and laughter on the unclouded brow of youth; while infancy itself, seated on his knee, would chuckle, and clap its dimpled hands, as he danced before its sparkling eyes the glittering watch-chain, or radiant diamond that adorned the shrivelled shaking hand. All were happy; but he, of all, the happiest; for his share of happiness was swelled to overflowing by the addition of theirs.

"Julia, how old are you?" said the venerable peer, at one of these annual heart-greetings, addressing the daughter of his eldest son.

"Seventeen," was the reply.

"Stand by me:—And you, Mr Frederick, with your fearless hawk's eye, what is your age?"

"Eleven, grandfather."

"Come you here too."—Then, casting his looks round, he fixed upon another, and another, and another, till he had gathered eight of his children's children about him.—"I want another yet," he continued, "and it must be that little Miss who is so busy with her doll, in a corner by herself."

The child was brought. The laughing, rosy group stood wondering at what was to follow.

"By this living multiplication table," said he, with a gay, good-humoured air, "I reckon my age."

Then he began counting them: seventeen—eleven—fourteen—twelve—ten—six—eight—four—two—EIGHTY-FOUR.

"Heigho!" he exclaimed; "to think that I have had for my single share of life, as much as has yet fallen to the lot of this whole cluster!

Well—next year you will steal a march upon me, and make a terrible stride, so that I must drop you, Madam," (patting the sweet cherub-face of Harriet Beauchamp, who had answered with a pretty lisp she was eight years old,) "and make up eighty-five without you."

But this was his LAST BIRTHDAY. Never again did that happy circle gather round him; for when the time came that so they would have done, Charles Coventry, Viscount Glencraig, was made partaker of that awful secret whose mystery stretches not beyond the grave. His end was peaceful. He laid down life, as a man who had tasted of its sweetness even to satiety; and he put on immortality—for eternity dawns upon the soul before this world fades from its glimmering consciousness for ever—as one who had humble hope in having done well.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAPTER IV.

Consumption—The Spectral Dog—The Forger.

CONSUMPTION.

CONSUMPTION!—Terrible, insatiable tyrant! who can arrest thy progress, or number thy victims? why dost thou attack almost exclusively the fairest and loveliest of our species? why select blooming and beautiful youth, instead of haggard and exhausted age? why strike down those who are bounding blithely from the starting-post of life, rather than the decrepid beings tottering towards its goal?—By what infernal subtilty hast thou contrived hitherto to baffle the profoundest skill of science, to frustrate utterly the uses of experience, and disclose thyself only when thou hast irretrievably secured thy victim, and thy fangs are crimsoned with its blood?—Destroying angel!—why art thou commissioned thus to smite down the first-born of agonized humanity?—What are the strange purposes of Providence, that thus letteth thee loose upon the objects of its infinite goodness?

Alas, how many aching hearts have been agitated with these unanswerable questions, and how many myriads are yet to be wrung and tortured by them!—Let me proceed to lay before the reader a short and simple statement of one of the many many cases of consumption, and all its attendant broken-heartedness, with which a tolerably extensive practice has, alas, crowded my memory. The one immediately following has been selected, because it seemed to me, though destitute of varied and stirring incident, calculated, on various accounts, to excite peculiar interest and sympathy. Possibly there are a few who may consider the ensuing pages pervaded by a tone of exaggeration. It is not so. My heart has really ached under the task of recording the bitter premature fate of one of the most lovely and accomplished young women I ever knew; and the vivid recollection of her sufferings, as well as those of her anguished relations, may have led me to adopt strong language,—but not strong enough adequately to express my feelings.

Miss Herbert lost both her father and mother before she had attained her tenth year, and was solemnly committed by each to the care of her uncle, a baronet, who was unmarried, and, through disappointment in a first attachment, seemed likely to continue so to the end of his life. Two years after his brother's death, he was appointed to an eminent official situation in India, as the fortune attached to his baronetcy had suffered severely from the extravagance of his predecessors. He was for some time at a loss how to dispose of his little niece. Should he take her with him to India, accompanied by a first-rate governess, and have her carefully educated under his own eye; or leave her behind in England, at one of the fashionable boarding-schools, and trust to the general surveillance of a distant female relation? He decided on the former course; and, accordingly, very shortly after completing her twelfth year, this little blooming exotic was transplanted to the scorched soil, and destined to "waste its sweetness" on the sultry air, of India.—A more delicate and lovely little creature than was Eliza Herbert, at this period, cannot be conceived. She was the only bud from a parent stem of remarkable beauty:—but, alas, that stem was suddenly withered by consumption! Her father, also, fell a victim to the fierce typhus fever only half a year after the death of his wife. Little Eliza Herbert inherited, with her mother's beauty, her constitutional delicacy. Her figure was so slight, that it almost suggested to the beholder the idea of transparency; and there was a softness and languor in her azure eyes, beaming through their long silken lashes, which told of something too refined for humanity. Her disposition fully comported with her person and habits—arch, mild, and intelligent, with a little dash of pensiveness. She loved the shade of retirement. If she occasionally flitted for a moment into the world, its glare and uproar seemed almost to stun her gentle spirit. She was, almost from infancy, devotedly fond of reading; and sought with peculiar avidity books of sentiment. Her gifted preceptress—one of the most amiable and refined of women—soon won her entire confidence, and found little difficulty in imparting to her apt pupil all the stores of her own superior and extensive accomplishments. Not a day passed over her head, that did not find Eliza Herbert riveted more firmly in the hearts of all who came near her, from her doting uncle, down to the most distant domestic. Every luxury that wealth and power could procure was, of course, always at her command; her own innate propriety and just taste prompted her to prefer simplicity in all things. Flattery of all kinds she abhorred—and forsook the house of a rich old English lady, who once told her to her face she was a beautiful little angel! In short, a more sweet, lovely, and amiable being than Eliza Herbert never adorned the ranks of humanity. The only fear which incessantly haunted those around her, and kept Sir — in a feverish flutter of apprehension every day of his life, was, that his niece was, in his own words, "too good—too beautiful, for this world;" and that unseen messengers from above were already flitting around her, ready to claim her suddenly for the skies. He has often described to me his feelings on this subject. He seemed conscious that he had no right to reckon on the continuance of her life; he felt, whenever he thought of her, an involuntary apprehension that she would, at no distant period, suddenly fade from his sight; he was afraid, he said, to let out the whole of his heart's affections on her. Like the Oriental merchant, who shudders while freighting "one bark—one little fragile bark," with the dazzling stores of his immense ALL, and committing it to the capricious dominion of wind and waves;—so Sir — often declared, that, at the period I am alluding to, he experienced cruel misgivings, that if he embarked the whole of his soul's loves on little Eliza Herbert, they were fated to be shipwrecked. Yet he regarded her every day with feelings which soon heightened into absolute idolatry.

His fond anxieties soon suggested to him, that so delicate and fragile a being as his niece, supposing for a moment the existence of any real grounds of apprehension that her constitution bore an hereditary taint, could not be thrown into a director ~~for~~ for her grave, than in India; that any latent, lurking tendency to consumption would be quickened and developed with fatal rapidity in the burning atmosphere she was then breathing. His mind, once thoroughly suffused with alarms of this sort, could not ever afterwards be dispossessed of them; and he accordingly determined to relinquish his situation in India, the instant he should have realized, from one quarter or another, sufficient to enable him to return to England, and support an establishment suitable to his station in society. About five years had elapsed since his arrival in India, during which he had contrived to save a large portion of his very ample income—when news reached him that a considerable fortune had fallen to him, from the sudden death of a remote relation. The intelligence made him, comparatively, a happy man. He instantly set on foot arrangements for returning to England, and procuring the immediate appointment of his successor.

Unknown to his niece, about a year after his arrival in India, Sir — had confidentially consulted the most eminent physician on the spot. In obedience to the injunctions of the baronet, Dr C — was in the habit of dropping in frequently, as if accidentally, to dinner, for the purpose of marking Miss Herbert's demeanour, and ascertaining whether there was, so to speak, the very faintest adumbration of any consumptive tendency. But no—his quick and practised eye detected no morbid indications; and he reiteratedly gladdened the baronet's heart, by assuring him, that, in any present evidence to the contrary, little Miss Herbert bade as fair for long and healthy life as any woman breathing, especially if she soon returned to the more salubrious climate of England. Though Dr C — had never spoken professionally to her, Eliza Herbert was too quick and shrewd an observer, to continue unapprized of the object of his frequent visits to her uncle's house. She had not failed to notice his searching glances; and knew well that he watched almost every mouthful of food she eat, and scrutinized all her movements. He had once also ventured to feel her pulse, in a half-in-earnest, half-in-joke manner, and put one or two questions to the governess about Miss Herbert's general habits, which that good, easy, communicative creature unfortunately told her inquisitive little pupil. Now, there are few things more alarming and irritating to young people, even if consciously enjoying the most robust health, than suddenly to find that they have long been, and still are, the objects of anxious medical surveillance. They begin naturally to suspect that there must be very good reason for it; and especially in the case of nervous, irritable temperaments—their peace of mind is thenceforward destroyed by torturing apprehensions that they are the doomed victims of some insidious, incurable malady. I have often and often known illustrations of this. Sir — also was aware of its ill consequences, and endeavoured to avert even the shadow of a suspicion from his niece's mind as to the real object of Dr C —'s visits, by formally introducing him, from the first, as one of his own intimate friends. He therefore flattered himself that his niece was profoundly ignorant of the existence of his anxieties concerning her health; and was not a little startled one morning by Miss Herbert's abruptly entering his study, and, pale with ill-disguised anxiety, enquiring if there was "anything the matter with her." Was she unconsciously falling into a decline? she asked, almost in so many words. Her uncle was so confounded by the suddenness of the affair, that he lost his presence of mind, changed colour a little, and, with a consciously embarrassed air, assured her that it was "no such thing," quite a mistake—a "very ridiculous one," a "childish whim," &c. &c. &c. He was so very earnest and energetic in his assurances that there was no earthly ground for apprehension—and, in short, concealed his alarm so clumsily, that his poor niece, though she left him with a kiss and a smile, and affected to be satisfied, retired to her own room, and from that melancholy moment resigned herself to her grave. Of this, she herself, three years subsequently, in England, assured me. She never afterwards recovered that gentle buoyancy and elasticity of spirits which made her burst upon her few friends and acquaintance like a little lively sunbeam of cheerfulness and gaiety. She felt perpetually haunted by gloomy, though vague suspicions that there was something radically wrong in her constitution—that it was from her birth sown with the seeds of death—and that no earthly power could eradicate them. Though she resigned herself to the dominion of such harassing thoughts as these while alone, and even shed tears abundantly, she succeeded in banishing, to a great extent, her uncle's disquietude, by assuming even greater gaiety of demeanour than before. The baronet took occasion to mention the little incident above related to Dr C—; and was excessively agitated to see the physician assume a very serious air.

"This may be attended with more mischief than you are aware of, Sir —," he replied. "I feel it my duty to tell you how miserably unfortunate for her it is, that Miss Herbert has at last detected your restless uneasiness about her health, and the means you have taken to watch her constitution. Henceforward she may appear satisfied—but mark her if she can forget it. You will find her fall frequently into momentary fits of absence and thoughtfulness. She will brood over it," continued Dr C—.

"Why, good God! doctor," replied the baronet, "what's the use of frightening one thus? Do you think my niece is the first girl who has known that her friends are anxious about her health? If she is really, as you tell her, free from disease—why the devil!—can she fancy herself into a consumption?"

"No, no, Sir —; but incessant alarm may accelerate the evil you dread, and predispose her to sink, her energies to droop, under the blow—however lightly it may at first fall—which has been so long impending. And besides, Sir —, I did not say she was free from disease, but only that I had not discerned any present symptoms of disease."

"Oh, stuff, stuff, doctor! nonsense!" muttered the baronet, rising and pacing the room with excessive agitation. "Can't the girl be laughed out of her fears?"

It may be easily believed that Sir

— spent every future moment of his stay in India in an agony of apprehension. His fears exaggerated the slightest indication of his niece's temporary indisposition into a symptom of consumption; anything like a cough from her would send him to a pillow of thorns; and her occasional refusal of food at meal-times was received with undisguised trepidation on the part of her uncle. If he overtook her at a distance, walking out with her governess, he would follow unperceived, and strain his eyesight with endeavouring to detect any thing like feebleness in her gait. These incessant, and very natural anxieties about the only being he loved in the world, enhanced by his efforts to conceal them, sensibly impaired his own health and spirits. He grew fretful and irritable in his demeanour towards every member of his establishment, and could not completely fix his thoughts for the transaction of his important official business.

This may be thought an overstrained representation of Sir —'s state of mind respecting his niece—but by none except a young, thoughtless, or heartless reader. Let the thousand—the million heart-wrung parents who have mourned, and are now mourning, over their consumptive offspring—let them, I say, echo the truth of the sentiments I am expressing. Let those whose bitter fate it is to see gradually sinking, shipwrecked before their very eyes, say, whether the pen or tongue of man can furnish adequate words to give expression to their anguished feelings!

"The bark, so richly freighted with their love,"

Eighteen years of age—within a trifle—was Miss Herbert, when she again set foot on her native land, and the eyes and heart of her idolizing uncle leaped for joy to see her augmented health and loveliness, which he fondly flattered himself might now be destined to "Grow with her growth, and strengthen with her strength."

The voyage—though long and monotonous as usual—with its fresh breezy balminess, had given an impetus to her animated spirits; and as her slight figure stepped down the side of the gloomy colossal Indian-~~man~~ which had brought her across the seas, her blue eye was bright as that of a seraph—her beautiful cheeks glowed with a soft and rich crimson, and there was a lightness, ease, and elasticity in her movements—as she tripped the short distance between the vessel and the carriage, which was in waiting to convey them to town—that filled her doting uncle with feelings of almost frenzied joy.

"God Almighty bless thee, my darling!—Bless thee—bless thee for ever, my pride! my jewel!—Long and happy be thy life in Merry England!" sobbed the baronet, folding her almost convulsively in his arms, as soon as they were seated in the carriage, and giving her the first kiss of welcome to her native shores. The second day, after they were established at one of the hotels, while Miss Herbert and her governess were riding the round of fashionable shopping, Sir ——— drove alone to the late Dr Baillie. In a long interview (they were personal friends) he communicated all his distressing apprehensions about his niece's state of health, imploring him to say whether he had any real cause of alarm whatever—immediate or prospective—and what course and plan of life he would recommend for the future. Dr Baillie, after many and minute enquiries, contented himself with saying, that he saw no grounds for present apprehensions. "It certainly did sometimes happen, that a delicate daughter of a consumptive parent, inherited her mother's tendencies to disease," he said. "And as for her future life and habits, there was not the slightest occasion for medicine of any kind; she must live almost entirely in the country, take plenty of fresh dry air and exercise—especially eschew late hours and company;" and he hinted, finally, the advantages, and almost the necessity, of an early matrimonial engagement.

It need hardly be said, that Sir ——— resolved most religiously to follow this advice to the letter.

"I'll come and dine with you in Dover Street, at seven to-day," said Dr Baillie, "and make my own observations."

"Thank you, doctor—but—but we dine out to-day," muttered the baronet, rather faintly, adding, inwardly, "no, no!—no more medical espionage—no, no!"

Sir ——— purchased a very beautiful mansion, which then happened to be for sale, situated within ten or twelve miles of London; and thither he removed, as soon as ever the preliminary arrangements could be completed.

The shrine, and its divinity, were worthy of each other. ——— Hall was one of the most charming picturesque residences in the county. It was a fine antique semi-Gothic structure, almost obscured from sight in the profound gloom of forest shade. The delicious velvet greensward, spread immediately in front of the house, seemed formed for the gentle footsteps of Miss Herbert. When you went there, if you looked carefully about, you might discover a little white tuft glistening on some part or other of the "smooth soft-shaven lawn;" it was her pet lamb, cropping the crisp and rich herbage. Little thing! it would scarce submit to be fondled by any hand but that of its innocent indulgent mistress. She, also, might, occasionally, be seen there, wandering thoughtfully along, with a book in her hand—Tasso, probably, or Dante—and her loose light hair straying from beneath a gipsy bonnet, commingling in pleasant contact with a saffron-coloured riband. Her uncle would sit for an hour together, at a corner of his study-window, overlooking the lawn, and never remove his eyes from the figure of his fair niece.

Miss Herbert was now talked of everywhere in the neighbourhood, as the pride of the place—the star of the county. She budded forth almost visibly; and though her exquisite form was developing daily, till her matured womanly proportions seemed to have been cast in the mould of the Venus de Medici, though on a scale of more slenderness and delicacy,—it was, nevertheless, outstripped by the precocious expanding of her intellect. The sympathies of her soul were attuned to the deepest and most refined sentiment. She was passionately fond of poetry—and never wandered without the sphere of what was first-rate.

Dante and Milton were her constant companions, by day and night; and it was a treat to hear the mellifluous cadences of the former uttered by the soft and rich voice of Miss Herbert. She could not more satisfactorily evidence her profound appreciation of the true spirit of poetry, than by her almost idolatrous admiration of the kindred genius of Handel and Mozart. She was scarcely ever known to play any other music than theirs;—she would listen to none but the “mighty voices of those dim spirits.” And then she was the most amiable and charitable creature that sure ever trode the earth! How many colds, slight, to be sure, and evanescent, had she caught, and how many rebukes from the alarmed fondness of her uncle had she suffered in consequence, through her frequent visits, in all weathers, to the cottages of the poor, and sick! —“You are describing an ideal being, and investing it with all the graces and virtues—one that never really existed,” perhaps exclaims one of my readers. There are not a few now living, who could answer for the truth of my poor and faint description, with anguish and regret. Frequently, on seeing such instances of precocious development of the powers of both mind and body, the curt and correct expression of Quintilian has occurred to my mind with painful force—“Quod observatum fere est, celerius occidere festinatam maturitatem,”* aptly rendered by the English proverb, “Soon ripe, soon rotten.”

The latter part of Dr Baillie’s advice was anxiously kept in view by Sir —; and soon after Miss Herbert had completed her twentieth year, he had the satisfaction of seeing her encourage the attentions of a Captain —, the third son of a neighbouring nobleman. He was a remarkably fine and handsome young man, of a very superior spirit, and fully capable of appreciating the value of her whose hand he sought. Sir — was delighted, almost to ecstasy, when he extracted from the trembling blushing girl, a confession that Captain —’s company was any thing but disagreeable to her.

The young military hero was, of course, soon recognised as her suitor; and a handsome couple, people said, they would make. Miss Herbert’s health seemed more robust, and her spirits more buoyant, than ever. How, indeed, could it be otherwise, when she was daily riding in an open carriage, or on horseback, over a fine, breezy, champaign country, by the side of the gay, handsome, fascinating Captain —?

The baronet was sitting one morning in his study, having the day before returned from a month’s visit to some friends in Ireland, and engaged with some important letters from India, when Miss B—, his niece’s governess, sent a message requesting to speak in private with him. When she entered, her embarrassed, and somewhat flurried manner, not a little surprised Sir —.

“How is Eliza?—How is Eliza, Miss B—?” he enquired hastily, laying aside his reading glasses. “Very well,” she replied, “very;” and after a little fencing about the necessity of making allowance for the exaggeration of alarm and anxiety, she proceeded to inform him, that Miss Herbert had latterly passed restless nights—that her sleep was not unfrequently broken by a cough—a sort of faint churchyard cough, she said, it seemed—which had not been noticed for some time, till it was accompanied by other symptoms—“Gracious God! madam, how was this not told me before?—Why—why did you not write to me in Ireland about it?”—enquired Sir —, with excessive trepidation. He could scarcely sit in his chair, and grew very pale; while Miss B—, herself equally agitated, went on to mention profuse night-sweats—a disinclination for food—exhaustion from the slightest exercise—a feverishness every evening—and a faint hectic flush —

“Oh, plague-spot!” groaned the baronet, almost choked, letting fall his reading-glasses. He tottered towards the bell, and the valet was directed to order the carriage for town immediately. “What—what possible excuse can I devise for bringing Dr Baillie here?" said he to the governess, as he was drawing off his gloves. "Well—well—I'll leave it to you—do what you can. For God's sake, madam, prepare her to see him somehow or another, for the doctor and I shall certainly be here together this evening. Oh!—say I'm called up to town on sudden business, and thought I might as well bring him on with me, as he is visiting a patient in the neighbourhood—Oh, any thing, madam—any thing!" He hardly knew what he was saying.

Dr Baillie, however, could not come, being himself at Brighton, an invalid, and the baronet was therefore pleased, though with ill-disguised chagrin, to summon me to supply his place. On my way down, he put me in possession of most of the facts above narrated. He implored me, in tenderness to his agitated feelings, to summon all the tact I had ever acquired, and alarm the object of my visit as little as possible. I was especially to guard against appearing to know too much; I was to beat about the bush—to extract her symptoms gradually, &c. &c. I never saw the fondest, the most doting father or mother, more agitated about an only child, than was Sir — about his niece. He protested that he could not survive her death,—that she was the only prop and pride of his declining years, and that he must fall, if he lost her—and made use of many similar expressions. It was in vain that I besought him not to allow himself to be carried so much away with his fears. He must let me see her, and have an opportunity of judging whether there were any real cause of alarm, I said; and he might rely on my honour as a gentleman, that I would be frank and candid with him, to the very utmost—I would tell him the worst. I reminded him of the possibility that the symptoms he mentioned might not really exist; that they might have been seen by Miss B—— through the distorting and magnifying medium of apprehension;—and that, even if they did really exist—why, that—that—they were not always the precursors of consumption, I stammered, against my own convictions. It is impossible to describe the emotions excited in the baronet, by my simple uttering the word "consumption." He said it stabbed him through the heart!

On arriving at — Hall, the baronet and I instantly repaired to the drawing-room, where Miss Herbert and her governess were sitting at tea. The pensive sunlight of September shone through the Gothic window near which they were sitting. Miss Herbert was dressed in white, and looked really dazzlingly beautiful; but the first transient glance warned me that the worst might be apprehended. I had that very morning been at the bedside of a dying young lady, a martyr to that very disease which commenced by investing its victim with a tenfold splendour of personal beauty, to be compensated for by sudden and rapid decay! Miss Herbert's eyes were lustrous as diamonds; and the complexion of her cheeks, pure and fair as that of the lily, was surmounted with an intense circumscribed crimson flush—alas, alas!—the very "plague-spot" of hectic—of consumption. She saluted me silently, and her eyes glanced hurriedly from me to her uncle, and from him again to me. His disordered air defied disguise.

She was evidently apprized of my coming, as well as of the occasion of my visit. Indeed, there was a visible embarrassment about all four of us, which I felt I was expected to dissipate, by introducing indifferent topics of conversation. This I attempted, but with little success. Miss Herbert's tea was before her on a little ebony stand, untouched; and it was evidently a violent effort only that enabled her to continue in the room. She looked repeatedly at Miss B——, as though she wished to be gone. After about half an hour's time, I alluded complimentarily to what I had heard of her performance on the piano; she smiled coldly, and rather contemptuously, as though she saw the part I was playing. Nothing daunted, however, I begged her to favour me with one of Haydn's sonatas; and she went immediately to the piano, and played what I asked—I need hardly say, very exquisitely. Her uncle then withdrew, for the alleged purpose of answering a letter, as had been arranged between us; and I was then left alone with the two ladies. I need not fatigue the reader with a minute description of all that passed. I introduced the object of my visit as casually and gently as I could, and succeeded more easily than I had anticipated in quieting her alarms. The answers she gave to my questions amply corroborated the truth of the account given by Miss B—to the baronet. Her feverish accelerated pulse, also, told of the hot blighting breathings of the destroying angel, who was already hovering close around his victim! I was compelled to smile with an assumed air of gaiety and nonchalance, while listening to the poor girl's unconscious disclosures of various little matters, which amounted to infallible evidence that she was already beyond the reach of medicine. I bade her adieu, complimenting her on her charming looks, and expressing my delight at finding so little occasion for my professional services! She looked at me with a half-incredulous, half-confiding eye, and with much girlish simplicity and frankness put her hand into mine, thanking me for dispersing her fears, and begging me to do the same for her uncle. I afterwards learned, that as soon as I left the room, she burst into a flood of tears, and sighed and sobbed all the rest of the evening.

With Sir —— I felt it my duty to be candid. Why should I conceal the worst from him, when I felt as certain as I was of my own existence, that his beautiful niece was already beginning to wither away from before his eyes? Convinced that "hope deferred maketh sick the heart," I have always, in such cases, warned the patient's friends, long beforehand, of the inevitable fate awaiting the object of their anxious hopes and fears, in order that resignation might gradually steal thoroughly into their broken hearts.—To return. I was conducted to the baronet's study, where he was standing with his hat and gloves on, ready to accompany me as far as the high-road, in order that I might wait the arrival of a London coach. I told him, in short, that I feared I had seen and heard too much to allow a doubt that his niece's present symptoms were those of the commencing stage of pulmonary consumption; and that though medicine and change of climate might possibly avert the evil day for a time, it was my melancholy duty to assure him, that no earthly power could save her.

"Merciful God!" he gasped, loosening his arm from mine, and leaning against the park gate, at which we had arrived. I implored him to be calm. He continued speechless for some time, with his hands clasped.

"Oh, doctor, doctor!" he exclaimed, as if a gleam of hope had suddenly flashed across his mind, "we've forgot to tell you a most material thing, which perhaps will alter the whole case—oh, how could we have forgotten it!" he continued, growing heated with the thought; "my niece eats very heartily—nay, more heartily than any of us, and seems to relish her food more." Alas, I was obliged, as I have hundreds of times before been obliged, to dash the cup from his lips, by assuring him that an almost ravenous appetite was as invariably a forerunner of consumption, as the pilot-fish of the shark!

"Oh, great God, what will become of me! What shall I do?" he exclaimed, almost frantic, and wringing his hands in despair. He had lost every vestige of self-control. "Then my sweet angel must DIE! Damning thought! Oh, let me die too! I cannot, I will not survive her!—Doctor, doctor, you must give up your London practice, and come and live in my house—you must! By G—, I'll fling my whole fortune at your feet! Only save her, and you and yours shall wallow in wealth, if I go back to India to procure it!—Oh, whither—whither shall I go with my darling? To Italy—France?—My God! What shall I do when she is gone—for ever!" he exclaimed, like one distracted. I entreated him to recollect himself, and endeavour to regain his self-possession before returning to the presence of his niece. He started. "Oh, mockery, doctor, mockery! How can I ever look on the dear girl again? She is no longer mine; she is in her grave—she is!"

Remonstrance and expostulation, I saw, were utterly useless, and worse, for they served only to irritate. The coach shortly afterwards drew up; and wringing my hands, Sir —— extorted a promise that I would see his niece the next day, and bring Dr Baillie with me, if he should have returned to town. I was as good as my word, except that Dr Baillie could not accompany me, being still at Brighton. My second interview with Miss Herbert was long and painfully interesting. She and I were alone. She wept bitterly, and recounted the incident mentioned above, which occurred in India, and occasioned her first serious alarm. She felt convinced, she told me, that her case was hopeless; she saw too that her uncle possessed a similar conviction, and sobbed agonizingly when she alluded to his altered looks. She had felt a presentiment, she said, for some months past, which, however, she had never mentioned till then, that her days were numbered, and attributed, too truly, her accelerated illness to the noxious clime of India. She described her sensations to be that of a constant void within, as if there were a something wanting—an unnatural hollowness—a dull, deep aching in the left side—a frequent inclination to relieve herself by spitting, which, when she did, alas! alas! she observed more than once to be streaked with blood.

"How long do you think I have to live, doctor?" she enquired faintly.

"Oh, my dear madam, do not, for Heaven's sake, ask such useless questions!—How can I possibly presume to answer them, giving you credit for a spark of common sense?" She grew very pale, and wiped her forehead.

"Is it likely that I shall have to endure much pain?" she asked with increasing trepidation. I could reply only, that I hoped not—that there was no ground for immediate apprehension—and I faltered, that possibly a milder climate, and the skill of medicine, might yet carry her through. The poor girl shook her head hopelessly, and trembled violently from head to foot.

"Oh, poor uncle!—Poor, poor Edw——" She faltered, and fell fainting into my arms; for the latter allusion to Captain—— had completely overcome her. Holding her senseless, sylphlike figure in my arms, I hurried to the bell, and was immediately joined by Sir——, the governess, and one or two female attendants. I saw the baronet was beginning to behave like a madman, by the increasing boisterousness of his manner, and the occasional glare of wildness that shot from his eye. With the utmost difficulty I succeeded in forcing him from the room, and keeping him out till Miss Herbert had recovered.

"Oh, doctor, doctor!" he muttered hoarsely, after staggering to a seat, "this is worse than death! I pray God to take her and me too, and put an end to our misery!"

I expostulated with him rather sternly, and represented to him the absurdity and impiousness of his wish.

"D—n—n!" he thundered, starting from his chair, and stamping furiously to and fro across the room, "What the—— do you mean by suivelling in that way, doctor? Can I see my darling dying—absolutely dying by inches—before my very eyes, and yet be cool and unconcerned? I did not expect such conduct from you, Doctor;"—he burst into tears. "Oh! I'm going mad!—I'm going mad!" and he sunk again into his seat. From one or two efforts he made to gulp down again, as it were, the emotions which were swelling and dilating his whole frame, I seriously apprehended either that he would fall into a fit, or go absolutely raving mad. Happily, however, I was mistaken. His fearful excitement gradually subsided. He was a man of remarkably strong and ardent feelings, which he had never been accustomed to control, even in the moments of their most violent manifestations; and on the present occasion, the maddening thought, that the object of his long, intense, and idolizing love and pride was about to be lost to him irretrievably—for ever—was sufficient to overturn his shaken intellects. I prevailed upon him to continue where he was, till I returned from his niece, for I was summoned to her chamber. I found her lying on the bed, only partially undressed. Her beautiful auburn hair hung disordered over her neck and shoulders, partially concealing her lovely marble-hued features. Her left hand covered her eyes, and her right clasped a little locket, suspended round her neck by a plain black riband, containing a little of Captain——'s hair. Miss

B——, her governess, her maid, and the housekeeper, with tears and sobs, were engaged in rendering various little services to their unfortunate young mistress; and my heart ached to think of the little—the nothing—I could do for her.

Two days afterwards, Dr Baillie, another physician, and myself, went down to see Miss Herbert; for a note from Miss B—— informed me that her ward had suffered severely from the agitation experienced at the last visit I had paid her, and was in a low nervous fever. The consumptive symptoms, also, were beginning to gleam through the haze of accidental indisposition with fearful distinctness. Dr Baillie simply assured the baronet that my predictions were but too likely to be verified; and that the only chance of averting the worst form of consumption (a galloping one) would be an instant removal to Italy, that the fall of the year, and the winter season, might be spent in a more genial and fostering climate. We, at the same time, frankly assured Sir ——, who listened with a sullen, despairing apathy of manner, that the utmost he had to expect from a visit to Italy, was the faintest chance of a temporary suspension of the fate which hovered over his niece. In a few weeks, accordingly, they were all settled at Naples.

But what have I to say, all this time, the reader is possibly asking, about the individual who was singled out by fate for the first and heaviest stroke inflicted by Miss Herbert's approaching dissolution? Where was the lover? Where was Captain ——? I have avoided allusions to him hitherto, because his distress and agitation transcended all my powers of description. He loved Miss Herbert with all the passionate romantic fervour of a first attachment; and the reader must ask his own heart, what were the feelings by which that of Captain —— was lacerated.

I shall content myself with recording one little incident which occurred before the family of Sir —— left for Italy. I was retiring one night to rest, about twelve o'clock, when the startling summons of the night-bell brought me again down stairs, accompanied by a servant. Thrice the bell rung with impatient violence before the door could possibly be opened, and I heard the steps of some vehicle let down hastily.

"Is Dr —— at home?" enquired a groom, and being answered in the affirmative, in a second or two a gentleman leaped from the chariot standing at the door, and hurried into the room, whither I had retired to await him. He was in a sort of half military travelling dress. His face was pale, his eye sunk, his air disordered, and his voice thick and hurried. It was Captain ——, who had been absent on a shooting excursion in Scotland, and who had not received intelligence of the alarming symptoms disclosed by Miss Herbert, till within four days of that which found him at my house, on the present occasion, come to ascertain from me the reality of the melancholy apprehensions so suddenly entertained by Sir —— and the other members of both families.

"Good God! Is there no hope, doctor?" he enquired faintly, after swallowing a glass of wine, which, seeing his exhaustion and agitation, I had sent for. I endeavoured to evade giving a direct answer—attempted to divert his thoughts towards the projected trip to the continent—dilated on the soothing, balmy climate she would have to breathe—it had done wonders for others, &c. &c.—and in a word, exhausted the stock of inefficient subterfuges and palliatives to which all professional men are on such occasions compelled to resort. Captain —— listened to me silently, while his eye was fixed on me with a vacant unobserving stare. His utter wretchedness touched me to the soul; and yet, what consolation had I to offer him? After several profound sighs, he exclaimed, in a flurried tone, "I see how it is. Her fate is fixed—and so is mine! Would to God—would to God I had never seen or known Miss Herbert!—What will become of us!" He rose to go. "Doctor, forgive me for troubling you so late, but really I can rest nowhere! I must go back to —— Hall." I shook hands with him, and in a few moments the chariot dashed off.

Really I can scarcely conceive of a more dreadful state of mind than that of Captain ——, or of any one whose "heart is in the right place," to use a homely but apt expression, when placed in such wretched circumstances as those above related. To see the death warrant sealed of her a man's soul dotes on—who is the idolized object of his holiest, fondest, and possibly first affections! yes, to see her bright and beautiful form suddenly snatched down into “utter darkness” by the cold relentless grasp of our common foe—the “desire of our eyes taken away as with a stroke”—may well wither one! That man's soul which would not be palsied, prostrated, by such a stroke as this, is worthless, and worse—it is a foul libel on his kind. He cannot love a woman as she should and must be loved. Why am I so vehement in expressing my feelings on this subject? Because, in the course of my professional intercourse, my soul has been often sickened with listening to the expression of opposite sentiments. The poor and pitiful philosophy—that the word should ever have been so prostituted!—which is now sneaking in among us, fostered by foolish ears, and men with hollow hearts and barren brains, for the purpose of weeding out from the soul's garden its richest and choicest flowers, sympathy and sentiment—this philosophy may possibly prompt some reader to sneer over the agonies I have been attempting to describe; but, oh reader, do you eschew it—trample on it—trample on it whenever, wherever you find it, for the reptile, though very little, is very venomous.

Captain —'s regiment was ordered to Ireland, and as he found it impossible to accompany it, he sold out, and presently followed the heart-broken baronet and his niece to Italy. The delicious climate sufficed to kindle and foster for a while that deceitful ignis fatuus, hope, which always flits before in the gloomy horizon of consumptive patients, and leads them and their friends on—and on—and on—till it suddenly sinks quivering into their grave!—They staid at Naples till the month of July. Miss Herbert was sinking, and that with fearfully accelerated rapidity. Sir —'s health was much impaired with incessant anxiety and watching; and Captain— had been several times on the very borders of madness. His love for the dear being who could never be ~~his~~, increased ten thousand fold when he found it hopeless!—Is it not always so?

Aware that her days were numbered, Miss Herbert anxiously importuned her uncle to return to England. She wished, she said, to breathe her last in her native isle—among the green pastures and hills of — shire, and to be buried with her father and mother. Sir — listened to the utterance of these sentiments with a breaking heart. He could see no reason for refusing a compliance with her request; and accordingly the latter end of August beheld, the unhappy family once more at — Hall.

I once saw a very beautiful lily, of rather more than ordinary stateliness, whose stem had been snapped by the storm over-night; and on entering my garden in the morning, alas, alas! there lay the pride of all chaste flowers, pallid and prostrate on the very bed where it had a short while before bloomed so sweetly!—This little circumstance was forcibly recalled to my recollection, on seeing Miss Herbert for the first time after her return from the continent. It was in the spacious drawing-room at — Hall, where I had before seen her, in the evening; and she was reclining on an ottoman, which had been drawn towards the large fretted Gothic window formerly mentioned. I stole towards it with noiseless footsteps; for the hushing, cautioning movements of those present warned me that Miss Herbert was asleep. I stood and gazed in silence for some moments on the lovely unfortunate—almost afraid to disturb her, even by breathing. She was wasted almost to a shadow,—attenuated to nearly ethereal delicacy and transparency. She was dressed in a plain white muslin gown, and lying on an Indian shawl, in which she had been enveloped for the purpose of being brought down from her bedchamber. Her small foot and ankle were concealed beneath white silk stockings, and satin slippers—through which it might be seen how they were shrunk from the full dimensions of health. They seemed, indeed, rather the exquisite chiselling of Canova, the representation of recumbent beauty, than flesh and blood, and scarcely capable of sustaining even the slight pressure of Miss Herbert's wasted frame. The arms and hands were enveloped in long white gloves, which fitted very loosely; and her waist, encircled by a broad violet-coloured riband, was rather that of a young girl of twelve or thirteen, than a full-grown woman. But it was her countenance—her symmetrical features, sunk, faded, and damp with death-dews, and her auburn hair falling in rich matted careless clusters down each side of her alabaster temples and neck—it was all this which suggested the bitterest thoughts of blighted beauty, almost breaking the heart of the beholder. Perfectly motionless and statue-like lay that fair creature, breathing so imperceptibly that a rose leaf might have slept on her lips unfluttered. On an easy-chair, drawn towards the head of the ottoman, sat her uncle, Sir —, holding a white cambric handkerchief in his hand, with which he from time to time wiped off the dews which started out incessantly on his niece's pallid forehead. It was affecting to see his hair changed to a dull iron-grey hue; whereas, before he had left for the continent, it was jet-black. His sallow and worn features bore the traces of recent tears.

And where now is the lover? Where is Captain —? again enquires the reader. He was then at Milan, raving beneath the tortures and delirium of a brain-fever, which flung him on his sick-bed only the day before Sir —'s family set out for England. Miss Herbert had not been told of the circumstance till she arrived at home; and those who communicated the intelligence will never undertake such a duty again!

After some time, in which we around had maintained perfect silence, Miss Herbert gently opened her eyes; and seeing me sitting opposite her uncle, by her side, gave me her hand, and with a faint smile, whispered some words of welcome which I could not distinguish.

"Am I much altered, doctor, since you saw me last?" she presently enquired, in a more audible tone. I said I regretted to see her so feeble and emaciated.

"And does not my poor uncle also look very ill?" enquired the poor girl, eyeing him with a look of sorrowful fondness. She feebly extended her arms, as if for the purpose of putting them round his neck, and he seized and kissed them with such fervour, that she burst into tears. "Your kindness is killing me—oh don't, don't!" she murmured. He was so overpowered with his emotions, that he abruptly rose and left the room. I then made many minute enquiries about the state of her health. I could hardly detect any pulsation at the wrist, though the blue veins, and almost the arteries, I fancied, might be seen meandering beneath the transparent skin. * * * My feelings will not allow me, nor would my space, to describe every interview I had with her. She sunk very rapidly. She exhibited all those sudden deceitful rallyings, which invariably agonize consumptive patients and their friends with fruitless hopes of recovery. Oh, how they are clung to! how hard to persuade their fond hearts to relinquish them! with what despairing obstinacy will they persist in "hoping against hope!" I recollect one evening in particular, that her shattered energies were so unaccountably revived and collected—her eye grew so full and bright—her cheeks were suffused with so rich a vermillion—her voice soft and sweet as ever, and her spirits so exhilarated—that even I was staggered for a moment; and poor Sir — got so excited, that he said to me in a sort of ecstasy, as he accompanied me to my carriage—"Ah, doctor, a phœnix, doctor! a phœnix. She's rising from her ashes—ah! ha! She'll cheat you for once—darling!" and he raised his handkerchief to his eyes, for they were overflowing.

"Doctor, you're fond of music, I believe; you will not have any objection to listen to a little now, will you?—I'm exactly in the mood for it, and it's almost the only enjoyment I have left, and Miss B— plays enchantingly. Go, love, please, and play a mass from Mozart—the one we listened to last night," said Miss Herbert, on one occasion, about a week after the interview last mentioned. Miss B—, who was in tears, immediately rose, and took her seat at the piano. She played with exquisite taste and skill. I held one of my sweet patient's hands in mine, as she lay on the sofa, with her face turned towards the window, through which the retiring sunlight was streaming in tender radiance on her wasted features, after tinting the amber-hued groves which were visible through the window. I need not attempt to characterise the melting music which Miss B—— was pouring from the piano. I have often thought that there is a sort of spiritual, unearthly character about some of the masses of Mozart, which draws out the greatest sympathies of one's nature, striking the deepest and most hidden chords of the human heart. On the present occasion, the peculiar circumstances in which I was placed—the time—the place—the dying angel whose hand was clasped in mine—disposed me to a more intense appreciation of Mozart's music than I had ever known before. The soft, soothing, solemn, swelling cadences undulated one after another into my full heart, till they forced the tears to gush from my eyes. I was utterly overcome. Oh, that languishing, heart-breaking music, I can never forget! the form of Eliza Herbert flits before me to this day when I hear it spoken of. I will not listen to any one play it now;—though I have often wept since on hearing it from Miss B——, to whom Miss Herbert bequeathed her piano.—To return. My tears flowed fast; and I perceived also the crystal drops oozing through the closed eyelids of Miss Herbert. "Heart-breaking music, is it not, doctor?" she murmured. I could make her no reply. I felt at that moment as if I could have laid down my life for her.—After a long pause—Miss B—— continuing all the while playing—Miss Herbert sobbed—"Oh, how I should like to be buried while the organ is playing this music!—And ~~he—he~~ was fond of it, too!" she continued, with a long shuddering sigh. It was echoed, to my surprise, but in a profounder tone, from that quarter of the room where the grand-piano was placed. It could not have been from Miss B——, I felt sure; and looking towards her, I beheld the dim outline of Sir ——'s figure leaning against the piano, with his face buried in his white handkerchief. He had stolen into the room unperceived—for he had left it half an hour before, in a fit of sudden agitation—and after continuing about five minutes, was compelled, by his feelings, again to retire. His sigh, and the noise he made in withdrawing, had been heard by Miss Herbert.

"Doctor—doctor"—she stammered faintly, turning as white as ashes, "who—who is that? what was it?—Oh dear—it can never be—no—no—it cannot"—and she suddenly fainted. She continued so long insensible, that I began to fear it was all over. Gradually, however, she recovered, and was carried up to bed, which she did not leave again for a week.

I mentioned, I think, in a former part of this narrative, Miss Herbert's partiality for poetry, and that her readings were confined to that which was of the highest order. While sitting by her bedside, I have heard her utter often very beautiful thoughts, suggested by the bitterness of her own premature fate. All—all are treasured in my heart!

I have not attempted to describe her feelings with reference to Captain ——, simply because I cannot do them justice, without, perhaps, incurring the reader's suspicions that I am slipping into the character of the novelist. She did not know that Captain —— continued yet at death's door at Milan, for we felt bound to spare her feelings. We fabricated a story that he had been summoned into Egypt, to enquire after the fate of a brother who had travelled thither, and whose fate, we said, was doubtful. Poor girl! she believed us at last—and seemed rather inclined to accuse him of unkindness for allowing any thing to withdraw him from her side. She never, however, said any thing directly of this kind. It is hardly necessary to say, that Captain —— never knew of the fiction. I have never, to this day, entirely forgiven myself for the part I took in it.

I found her one morning, within a few days of her death, wretchedly exhausted both in mind and body. She ~~had~~ passed, as usual, a restless night, unsoothed even by the laudanum, which had been administered to her in much larger quantities than her medical attendants had authorized. It had stupified, without at the same time composing and calming her. Poor—poor girl! almost the last remains of her beauty had disappeared. There was a fearful hollowness in her once lovely and blooming cheeks; and her eyes—those bright orbs which had a short while ago dazzled and delighted all they shone upon—were now sunk—quenched—and surrounded by dark halos! She lay with her head buried deep in the pillow, her hair folded back, matted with perspiration. Her hands—but I cannot attempt to describe her appearance any further. Sir——sate by her bedside, as he had sat all through her illness, and was utterly worn out. I occupied the chair allotted to Miss B——, who had just retired to bed, having been up all night. After a long silence, Miss Herbert asked very faintly for some tea, which was presently brought her, and dropped into her mouth by spoonfuls. Soon after she revived a little, and spoke to me, but in so low a whisper that I had great difficulty in distinguishing her words. The exertion of utterance, also, was attended with so much evident pain, that I would rather she had continued silent.

"Laudanum—laudanum—laudanum, doctor! They don't give me enough of laudanum!" she muttered. We made her no reply. Presently she began murmuring at intervals somewhat in this strain: "Ah—among the pyramids—looking at them—sketching—ascending them, perhaps—oh! what if they should fall and crush him? Has he found his brother? On his way—home—sea—ships—ship." Still we did not interrupt her, for her manner indicated only a dim dreamy sort of half-consciousness. About an hour afterwards (why did I linger there; it may be asked, when I could do nothing for her, and could ill spare the time? I know not—I could not leave) she again commenced, in a low moaning, wandering tone—"Uncle! What do you think? Chatterton—poor, melancholy Chatterton, sat by my side all night long—in that chair where Dr——is sitting. He died of a broken heart—or of my disease—didn't he?—Wan—wan—sad—cold—ghostly—but so like a poet!—Oh, how he talked—no one, earthly, like him!—His voice was like the mysterious music of an Eolian harp—so solemn—soft—stealing!—* * He put his icy fingers on my bosom, and said it must soon be as cold!—But he told me not to be afraid—nor weep, because I was dying so young—so early. He said I was a young little rose-tree, and would have the longer to bloom and blossom when he came for me." She smiled faintly and sadly. "Oh, dear, dear!—I wish I had him here again! But he looks very cold and ghostly—never moves—nothing rustles—I never hear him come, or go—but I look, and there he is!—and I'm not at all frightened, for he seems gentle—but I think he can't be happy—happy—never smiles, never!—* * Dying people see and hear more than others!"—

This, I say, is the substance of what she uttered. All she said was pervaded by a sad romance, which shewed that her soul was deeply imbued with poetry.

"Toll!—Toll!—Toll!—How solemn!—White plumes!—White scarfs!—Hush—'Earth to earth'—oh dreadful!—It is crumbling on my breast! They all go—they leave me all—poor, poor Eliza!—they leave me all alone in the cold church.—He'll often walk in the church by himself—his tears will fall on the pavement—but I shall not hear him—nor see him!—He will never see me!—Will the organ play, I wonder?—It may wake me from sleep for a while!" I listened to all this, and was fit for nothing the rest of the day. Again—again I saw her, to let fall tears over the withered petals—the blighted blossoms of early beauty!—It wrung my heart to see her little more than a breathing corpse. Oh, the gloom—anguish—desolation, diffused through——Hall! It could be felt; it oppressed you, on entering!

* * * On Saturday morning, (the — day of November, 18—,) I drove down early, having the preceding evening promised to be there as soon as possible the next day. It was a cold, scowling, bitter November morning, and my heart sunk within me as my chariot rattled rapidly along the hard highway towards——Hall. But I was too late. The curtain had fallen, and hid poor Eliza Herbert from this world, for ever!—She had expired about half an hour before my arrival.

As I was returning to town, after attending the funeral of Miss Herbert, full of bitter and sorrowful thoughts, I met a travelling carriage and four thundering down the road. It contained poor Captain —, his valet, and a young Italian medical attendant—all just returned from the continent. He looked white and wasted. The crape on my hat—my gloves—weepers—mourning suit, told all instantly. I was in a moment at his side—for he had swooned. As for the disconsolate baronet, little remains to be said. He disposed of — Hall; and, sick of England—ill and irritable—he attempted to regain his Indian appointment, but unsuccessfully; so he betook himself to a solitary house belonging to the family, in —shire; and, in the touching language of one of old, “Went on mourning to the end of his days.”

THE SPECTRAL DOG—AN ILLUSION.

THE age of ghosts and hobgoblins is gone by, says worthy Dr Hilbert; and so, after him, says almost every body now-a-days. These mysterious visitants are henceforth to be resolved into mere optical delusion, acting on an excitable fancy, and an irritable nervous temperament; and the report of a real bona fide ghost, or apparition, is utterly scouted. Possibly this may not be going too far, even though it be in the teeth of some of the most stubborn facts that are on record. One, or possibly two, of this character, I may perhaps present to the reader on a future occasion; but at present I shall content myself with relating a very curious and interesting case of acknowledged optical delusion; and I have no doubt that many of my medical readers can parallel it with similar occurrences within the sphere of their own observation.

Mr D—— was a clergyman of the Church of England, educated at Oxford,—a scholar, “a ripe and good one,”—a man of remarkably acute and powerful understanding; but, according to his own account, destitute of even an atom of imagination. He was also an exemplary minister; preached twice, willingly, every Sunday; and performed all the other duties of his office with zealous fidelity, and to the full satisfaction of his parishioners. If any man is less likely to be terrified with ghosts, or has less reason to be so, than another, surely it was such a character as Mr D——.

He had been officiating on Sunday evening for an invalid friend, at the latter's church, a few miles' distance from London, and was walking homewards enjoying the tranquillity of the night, and enlivened by the cheerful beams of the full moon. When at about three miles distance from town, he suddenly heard, or fancied he heard, immediately behind him, the sound of gasping and panting, as of a dog following at his heels, breathless with running. He looked round, on both sides; but seeing no dog, thought he must have been deceived, and resumed his walk and meditations. The sound was presently repeated. Again he looked round, but with no better success than before. After a little pause, thinking there was something rather odd about it, it suddenly struck him, that what he had heard was nothing more than the noise of his own hard breathing, occasioned by the insensibly accelerated pace at which he was walking, intent upon some subject which then particularly occupied his thoughts. He had not walked more than ten paces further, when he again heard precisely similar sounds; but with a running accompaniment—if I may be allowed a pun—of the pit-pit-pattering of a dog's feet, following close behind his left side.

“God bless me!” exclaimed Mr D—— aloud, stopping for the third time, and looking round in all directions, far and near; “why, really, that's very odd—very!—Surely I could not have been mistaken again?” He continued standing still, wiped his forehead, replaced his hat on his head, and, with a little trepidation, resumed his walk, striking his stout black walking-stick on the ground with a certain energy and resoluteness, which sufficed in re-assuring his own flurried spirits. The next thirty or forty paces of his walk Mr D—— passed over “erectis auribus,” and hearing nothing similar to the sounds which had thrice attracted his attention, was relapsing into his meditative mood, when, in a few moments, the noise was repeated, apparently from his right-hand side; and he gave something like a start from the path-side into the road, on feeling the calf of his leg brushed past—as he described it—by the shaggy coat of his invisible attendant. He looked suddenly down, and, to his very great alarm and astonishment, beheld the dim outline of a large Newfoundland dog—of a blue colour! He moved from the spot where he was standing—the phantom followed him—he rubbed his eyes with his hands, shook his head, and again looked; but there it still was, large as a young calf, [to which he himself compared it,] and had assumed a more distinct and definite form. The colour, however, continued the same—faint blue. He observed, too, its eyes—like dim-decaying fire-coals, as it looked up composedly in his face. He poked about his walking-stick, and moved it repeatedly through and through the form of the phantom; but there it continued—indivisible—impalpable—in short as much a dog as ever, and yet the stick traversing its form in every direction from the tail to the tip of the nose! Mr D— hurried on a few steps, and again looked;—there was the dog! Now the reader should be informed that Mr D— was a remarkably temperate man, and had, that evening, contented himself with a solitary glass of port by the bedside of his sick brother; so that there was no room for supposing his perceptions to have been disturbed with liquor.

“What can it be?” thought he, while his heart knocked rather harder than usual against the bars of its prison—“oh, it must be an optical delusion—oh, ’tis clearly so! nothing in the world worse! that’s all. How odd!”—and he smiled, he thought very unconcernedly;—but another glimpse of the phantom standing by him in blue indistinctness instantly darkened his features with the hue of apprehension. If it really was an optical delusion, it was the most fixed and pertinacious one he ever heard of! The best part of valour is discretion, says Shakspeare; and in all things; so, observing a stage passing by at that moment, to put an end to the matter, Mr D—, with a little trepidation in his tone, ordered it to stop; there was just room for one inside; and in stepped Mr D—, chuckling at the cunning fashion after which he had succeeded in jockeying his strange attendant. Not feeling inclined to talk with the fat woman who sat next him, squeezing him most unmercifully against the side of the coach, nor with the elderly grazier-looking man fronting him, whose large dirty top-boots seriously incommoded him, he shut his eyes, that he might pursue his thoughts undisturbed. After about five minutes’ riding, he suddenly opened his eyes—and the first thing that met them was the figure of the blue dog, lying stretched in some unaccountable manner at his feet, half under the seat!

“I—I—hope THE DOG does not annoy you, sir?” enquired Mr D—, a little flustered, of the man opposite, hoping to discern whether the dog chose to be visible to any one else.

“Sir!” exclaimed the person he addressed, starting from a kind of doze, and staring about in the bottom of the coach.

“Lord, sir!” echoed the woman beside him.

“A dog, sir, did you say?” enquired several, in a breath.

“Oh—nothing—nothing, I assure you. ’Tis a little mistake,” replied Mr D—, with a faint smile; “I—I thought—in short, I find I’ve been dreaming; and I’m sure I beg pardon for disturbing you.” Every one in the coach laughed except Mr D—, whose eyes continued riveted on the dim blue outline of the dog lying motionless at his feet. He was now certain that he was suffering from an optical illusion of some sort or other, and endeavoured to prevent his thoughts from running into an alarmed channel, by striving to engage his faculties with the philosophy of the thing. He could make nothing out, however; and the Q. E. D. of his thinkings startled him not a little, when it came in the shape of the large blue dog, leaping at his heels out of the coach, when he alighted. Arrived at home, he lost sight of the phantom during the time of supper and the family devotions. As soon as he had extinguished his bedroom candle, and got into bed, he was nearly leaping out again, on feeling a sensation as if a large dog had jumped on that part of the bed where his feet lay. He felt its pressure! He said he was inclined to rise, and make it a subject of special prayer to the Deity. Mrs D—— asked him what was the matter with him? for he became very cold, and shivered a little. He easily quieted her with saying he felt a little chilled; and as soon as she was fairly asleep, he got quietly out of bed, and walked up and down the room. Wherever he moved, he beheld, by the moonlight through the window, the dim dusky outline of the dog, following wherever he went! Mr D—— opened the windows, he did not exactly know why, and mounted the dressing-table for that purpose. On looking down before he leaped on the floor, there was the dog waiting for him, squatting composedly on his haunches! There was no standing this any longer, thought Mr D——, delusion or no delusion; so he ran to the bed—plunged beneath the clothes, and, thoroughly frightened, dropt at length asleep, his head under cover all night! On waking in the morning, he thought it must have been all a dream about the dog, for it had totally disappeared with the daylight. When an hour's glancing in all directions had convinced him that the phantom was really no longer visible, he told the whole to Mrs D——, and made very merry with her fears—for she would have it, it was “something supernatural,” and, good lady, “Mr D—— might depend upon it, the thing had its errand!” Four times subsequently to this did Mr D—— see the spectral visitant—in nowise altered either in its manner, form, or colour. It was always late in the evenings when he observed it, and generally when he was alone.—He was a man extensively acquainted with physiology; but felt utterly at a loss to what derangement, of what part of the animal economy to refer it. So, indeed, was I—for he came to consult me about it. He was with me once during the presence of the phantom. I examined his eyes with a candle, to see whether the interrupted motions of the irides indicated any sudden alteration of the functions of the optic nerve; but the pupils contracted and dilated with perfect regularity. One thing, however, was certain—his stomach had been latterly a little out of order, and every body knows the intimate connexion between its functions and the nervous system. But why he should see spectra—why they should assume and retain the figure of a dog, and of such an uncanine colour too—and why it should so pertinaciously attach itself to him, and be seen precisely the same, at the various intervals after which it made its appearance—and why he should hear, or imagine he heard it utter sounds,—all these questions I am as unable to answer as Mr D—— was, or as the reader will be. He may account for it in whatever way his ingenuity may enable him.—I have seen and known other cases of spectra, not unlike the one above related; and great alarm and horror have they excited in the breasts of persons blessed with less firmness and good sense than Mr D—— displayed.

THE FORGER.

A GROOM, in plain livery, left a card at my house one afternoon during my absence, on which was the name, “MR GLOUCESTER, No. —, REGENT STREET;” and in pencil, the words—“Will thank Dr — to call this evening.” As my red-book was lying on the table at the time, I looked in it, from mere casual curiosity, to see whether the name of “Gloucester” appeared there—but it did not. I concluded, therefore, that my new patient must be a recent comer. About six o'clock that evening, I drove to Regent Street, sent in my card, and was presently ushered by the man-servant into a spacious apartment, somewhat shewily furnished. The mild retiring sunlight of a July evening was diffused over the room; and ample crimson window-curtains, half drawn, mitigated the glare of the gilded picture-frames which hung in great numbers round the walls. There was a large round table in the middle of the room covered with papers, magazines, books, cards, &c.; and, in a word, the whole aspect of things indicated the residence of a person of some fashion and fortune. On a side-table lay several pairs of boxing-gloves, foils, &c. &c.—The object of my visit, Mr Gloucester, was seated on an elegant ottoman, in a pensive posture, with his head leaning on his hand, which rested on the table. He was engaged with the newspaper when I was announced. He rose as I entered, politely handed me to a chair, and then resumed his seat on the ottoman. His countenance was rather pleasing—fresh-coloured, with regular features, and very light auburn hair, which was adjusted with a sort of careless fashionable negligence. I may perhaps be laughed at by some for noticing such an apparently insignificant circumstance; but the observant humour of my profession must sufficiently account for my detecting the fact, that his hands were not those of a born and bred gentleman—of one who, as the phrase is, “has never done any thing” in his life; but they were coarse, large, and clumsy-looking. As for his demeanour also, there was a constrained and over-anxious display of politeness—an assumption of fashionable ease and indifference, that sate ill on him, like a court-dress fastened on a vulgar fellow. He spoke with a would-be jaunty, free-and-easy, small-swagger sort of air, and changed at times the tones of his voice to an offensive cringing softness, which, I daresay, he took to be monstrously insinuating. All these little circumstances put together prepossessed me with a sudden feeling of dislike to the man. These sort of people are a great nuisance to one; since there is no knowing exactly how to treat them. After some hurried expressions of civility, Mr Gloucester informed me that he had sent for me on account of a deep depression of spirits, to which he was latterly subject. He proceeded to detail many of the symptoms of a disordered nervous system. He was tormented with vague apprehensions of impending calamity; could not divest himself of an unaccountable trepidation of manner, which, by attracting observation, seriously disconcerted him on many occasions; felt incessantly tempted to the commission of suicide; loathed society; disrelished his former scenes of amusement; had lost his appetite; passed restless nights, and was disturbed with appalling dreams. His pulse, tongue, countenance, &c. corroborated the above statement of his symptoms. I asked him whether any thing unpleasant had occurred in his family? Nothing of the kind. Disappointed in an affaire du cœur? Oh, no. Unsuccessful at play? By no means—he did not play. Well—had he any source of secret annoyance which could account for his present depression? He coloured, seemed embarrassed, and apparently hesitating whether or not he should communicate to me what weighed on his spirits. He, however, seemed determined to keep me in ignorance, and with some alteration of manner, said, suddenly, that it was only a constitutional nervousness—his family were all so—and he wished to know whether it was in the power of medicine to relieve him. I replied that I would certainly do all that lay in my power, but that he must not expect any sudden and miraculous effect from the medicines I might prescribe;—that I saw clearly he had something on his mind which oppressed his spirits—that he ought to go into cheerful society—he sighed—seek change of air—that, he said, was, under circumstances, impossible. I rose to go. He gave me two guineas, and begged me to call the next evening. I left, not knowing what to make of him. To tell the plain truth, my suspicion was that he was neither more or less than a systematic London sharper—a gamester—a hanger-on about town—and that he had sent for me in consequence of some of those sudden alternations of fortune to which the lives of such men are subject. I was by no means anxious for a prolonged attendance on him.

About the same time next evening I paid him a second visit. He was stretched on the ottoman, enveloped in a gaudy dressing-gown, with his arms folded on his breast, and his right foot hanging over the side of the ottoman, and dangleing about as if in search of a stray slipper. I did not like this elaborately careless and conceited posture. A decanter or two, with some wine glasses, stood on the table. He did not rise on my entering, but, with a languid air, begged me to be seated in a chair opposite him. "Good evening, Doctor—good evening," said he, in a low and hurried tone; "I'm glad you are come, for if you had not, I'm sure I don't know what I should have done. I'm deucedly low to-night."

"Have you taken the medicines I prescribed, Mr Gloucester?" I enquired, feeling his pulse, which fluttered irregularly, indicating a high degree of nervous excitement. He had taken most of the physic I had ordered, he said, but without perceiving any effect from it. "In fact, Doctor," he continued, starting from his recumbent position to his feet, and walking rapidly three or four paces to and fro—"d—n me, if I know what's come to me. I feel as if I could cut my throat." I insinuated some questions for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any hereditary tendency to insanity in his family—but it would not do. "He saw," he said, "what I was driving at," but I was "on a wrong scent."

"Come, come, Doctor!—after all, there's nothing like wine for low spirits, is there? D—me, Doctor, drink, drink. Only taste that claret"—and, after pouring out a glass for me, which ran over the brim on the table—his hand was so unsteady—he instantly gulped down two glasses himself. There was a vulgar offensive familiarity in his manner, from which I felt inclined to stand off; but I thought it better to conceal my feelings. I was removing my glove from my right hand, and putting my hat and stick on the table, when, seeing a thin slip of paper lying on the spot where I intended to place them—apparently a bill or promissory note—I was going to hand it over to Mr Gloucester; but, to my astonishment, he suddenly sprung towards me, snatched from me the paper, with an air of ill-disguised alarm, and crumpled it up into his pocket, saying hurriedly,—“Ha, ha, Doctor—d—me!—this same little bit of paper—didn't see the name, eh? 'Tis the bill of an extravagant young friend of mine, whom I've just come down a cool hundred or two for—and it wouldn't be the handsome thing to let his name appear—ha—you understand?" He stammered confusedly, directing to me a sudden and penetrating glance as I ever encountered. I felt excessively uneasy, and inclined to take my departure instantly. My suspicions were now confirmed—I was sitting familiarly with a swindler—a gambler—and the bill he was so anxious to conceal, was evidently wrung from one of his ruined dupes. My demeanour was instantly frozen over with the most distant and frigid civility. I begged him to be re-seated, and allow me to put a very few more questions to him, as I was in great haste. I was thus engaged, when a heavy knock was heard at the outer door. Though there was nothing particular in it, Mr Gloucester started, and turned pale. In a few moments I heard the sound of altercation—the door of the room in which we sat was presently opened, and two men entered. Recollecting suddenly a similar scene in my own early history, I felt faint. There was no mistaking the character or errand of the two fellows, who now walked up to where we were sitting: they were two sullen Newgate myrmidons, and—gracious God!—had a warrant to arrest Mr Gloucester for FORGERY! I rose from my chair, and staggered a few paces, I knew not whither. I could scarce preserve myself from falling on the floor. Mr Gloucester, as soon as he caught sight of the officers, fell back on the ottoman—suddenly pressed his hand to his heart—turned pale as death, and gasped, breathless with horror.

"Gentlemen—what—what—do you want here?"

"Isn't your name E—— T——?" asked the elder of the two, coolly and unconcernedly.

"N—o—my name is Glou—ces—ter," stammered the wretched young man, almost inaudibly.

"Gloucester, eh?—oh, d—me, none of that there sort of blarney! Come, my kiddy—caged at last, eh? We've been long after you, and now you must be off with us directly. Here's your passport," said one of the officers, pointing to the warrant. The young man uttered a deep groan, and sunk senseless on the sofa. One of the officers, I cannot conceive how, was acquainted with my person; and, taking off his hat, said, in a respectful tone—"Doctor, you'll bring him to his wits again, an't please you—We must have him off directly!" Though myself but a trifle removed from the state in which he lay stretched before me, I did what I could to restore him, and succeeded at length. I unbuttoned his shirt-collar, dashed in his face some water brought by his man-servant, who now stood looking on shivering with affright—and endeavoured to calm his agitation by such soothing expressions as I could command.

"Oh, Doctor, Doctor, what a horrible dream it was!—Are they gone?—are they?" he enquired, without opening his eyes, and clasping my hand in his, which was cold as that of a corpse.

"Come, come—none of these here tantrums—you must off at once—that's the long and short of it," said an officer, approaching, and taking from his coat-pocket a pair of handcuffs, at sight of which, and of a large horse pistol projecting from his breast-pocket, my very soul sickened.

"Oh, Doctor, Doctor—save me! save me!" groaned their prisoner, clasping my hands with convulsive energy.

"Come—d—n your cowardly snivelling!—Why can't you behave like a man now, eh?—Come!—Off with this peacock's covering of yours—it was never made for the like of you, I'm sure—and put on a plain coat, and off to cage like a sensible bird," said one of the two, proceeding to remove the dressing-gown very roughly.

"Oh, my God—oh, my God—have mercy on me!—Oh, strike me dead at once!" nearly shrieked their prisoner, falling on his knees on the floor, and glaring towards the ceiling with an almost maniac eye.

"I hope you'll not treat your prisoner with unnecessary severity," said I, seeing them disposed to be very unceremonious.

"No—not by no manner of means, if as how he behaves himself," replied one of the men, respectfully. Mr Gloucester's dressing-gown was quickly removed, and his body-coat—himself perfectly passive the while—drawn on by his bewildered servant, assisted by one of the officers. It was nearly a new coat, cut in the very extreme of the latest fashion, and contrasted strangely with the disordered and affrighted air of its wearer. His servant placed his hat on his head, and endeavoured to draw on his gloves—showy sky-coloured kid. He was standing with a stupefied air, gazing vacantly at the officers, when he started suddenly to the window, manifestly with the intention of leaping out.

"Ha, ha! that's your game, my lad, is it?" coolly exclaimed one of the officers, as he snatched him back again with a vice-like grasp of the collar. "Now, since that's the sport you're for, why, you must be content to wear these little bracelets for the rest of your journey. D—me! it's your own seeking; for I didn't mean to have used them, if as how you'd only behaved perfectly;" and in an instant the young man's hands were locked together in the handcuffs. It was sickening to see the frantic efforts—as if he would have severed his hands from the wrists—he made to burst the handcuffs.

"Take me—to Hell, if you choose!" he gasped, in a hoarse hollow tone, sinking into a chair, utterly exhausted, while one of the officers was busily engaged rummaging the drawers, desks, &c. in search of papers. When he had concluded his search, filled his pockets, and buttoned his coat, the two approached, and told him to rise and accompany them.

"Now, d—me! are you for a rough or a quiet passage, eh?" said one of them, seizing him not very gently by the collar. He received no answer. The wretched prisoner was more dead than alive.

"I hope you have a hackney-coach in waiting, and don't intend to drag the young man through the streets on foot?" I enquired.

"Why, true, true, Doctor—it might be as well for us all; but who's to stump up for it?" replied one of the officers. I gave him five shillings, and the servant was instantly dispatched for a hackney-coach. While they were waiting its arrival, conceiving I could not be of any use to Mr Gloucester, and not choosing to be seen leaving the house with two police officers and a handcuffed prisoner, I took my departure, and drove home in such a state of agitation as I have never experienced before or since. The papers of the next morning explained all. The young man "living in Regent Street, in first-rate style," who had summoned me to visit him, had committed a series of forgeries, for the last eighteen months, to a great amount, and with so much secrecy and dexterity, as to have, till then, escaped detection; and had, for the last few months, been enjoying the produce of his skilful villainy in the style I witnessed—passing himself off, in the circles where he associated, under the assumed name of Gloucester. The immediate cause of his arrest was forging the acceptance of an eminent mercantile house to a bill of exchange for L.45. Poor fellow! it was short work with him afterwards. He was arraigned at the next September sessions of the Old Bailey—the case clearly proved against him—he offered no defence—was found guilty, and sentenced to death. Shortly after this, while reading the papers one Saturday morning, at breakfast, my eye lit on the usual gloomy announcement of the Recorder's visit to Windsor, and report to the King in Council of the prisoners found guilty at the last Old Bailey Sessions—"all of whom," the paragraph concluded, "his Majesty was graciously pleased to respite during his royal pleasure, except E—— T——, on whom the law is left to take its course next Tuesday morning."

Transient and any thing but agreeable as had been my intimacy with this miserable young man, I could not read this intelligence with indifference. He whom I had so very lately seen surrounded with the life-bought luxuries of a man of wealth and fashion, was now shivering the few remaining hours of his life in the condemned cells of Newgate! The next day (Sunday) I entertained a party of friends at my house to dinner; to which I was just sitting down when one of the servants put a note into my hand, of which the following is a copy:—

"The Chaplain of Newgate is earnestly requested by E—— T——, (the young man sentenced to suffer for forgery next Tuesday morning,) to present his humble respects to Dr ——, and solicit the favour of a visit from him in the course of to-morrow (Monday). The unhappy convict, Mr —— believes, has something on his mind, which he is anxious to communicate to Dr ——.—Newgate, September 28th, 182—.

I felt it impossible, after perusing this note, to enjoy the company I had invited. What on earth could the culprit have to say to me?—what unreasonable request might the put me to the pain of refusing?—ought I to see him at all?—were questions which I incessantly proposed to myself during the evening, but felt unable to answer. I resolved, however, at last, to afford him the desired interview, and be at the cell of Newgate in the course of the next evening, unless my professional engagements prevented me. About six o'clock, therefore, on Monday, after fortifying myself with a few extra glasses of wine—for why should I hesitate to acknowledge that I apprehended much distress and agitation from witnessing so unusual a scene?—I drove to the Old Bailey, drew up opposite the Governor's house, and was received by him very politely. He dispatched a turnkey to lead me to the cell where my late patient, the soi-disant Mr Gloucester, was immured in chilling expectancy of his fate.

Surely horror has appropriated these gloomy regions for her peculiar dwelling-place! Who that has passed through them once, can ever forget the long, narrow, lamp-lit passages,—the sepulchral silence, save where the ear is startled with the clangour of iron doors closing harshly before and behind,—the dimly-seen spectral figure of the prison-patrol gliding along with loaded blunderbuss,—and the chilling consciousness of being surrounded by so many fiends in human shape,—inhaling the foul atmosphere of all the concentrated crime and guilt of the metropolis! My heart leaped within me to listen even to my own echoing footfalls; and I felt several times inclined to return without fulfilling the purpose of my visit. My vacillation, however, was abruptly put an end to by my guide exclaiming, "Here we are, sir." While he was unbar-ring the cell-door, I begged him to continue at the outside of the door during the few moments of my interview with the convict.

"Holloa! young man, there—here's Dr ——— come to see you!" said the turnkey, hoarsely, as he ushered me in. The cell was small and gloomy; and a little lamp lying on the table, barely sufficed to shew me the persons of the culprit, and an elderly, respectable-looking man, muffled in a drab greatcoat, and sitting gazing in stupefied silence on the prisoner.—Great God, it was his FATHER! He did not seem conscious of my entrance; but his son rose, and feebly asked me how I was, muttered a few words of thanks, sunk again—apparently overpowered with his feelings—into his seat, and fixed his eyes on a page of the Bible, which was lying open before him. A long silence ensued; for none of us seemed either able or inclined to talk. I contemplated the two with feelings of lively interest. How altered was the young culprit before me, from the gay "Mr Gloucester," whom I had visited in Regent Street! His face had now a ghastly, cadaverous hue; his hair was matted, with perspiration, over his sallow forehead; his eyes were sunk and bloodshot, and seemed incapable of distinguishing the print to which they were directed. He was dressed in a plain suit of mourning, and wore a simple black stock round his neck. How I shuddered, when I thought of the rude hands which were soon to unloose it! Beside him, on the table, lay a white pocket handkerchief, completely saturated, either with tears, or wiping the perspiration from his forehead; and a glass of water, with which he occasionally moistened his parched lips. I knew not whether he was more to be pitied than his wretched, heart-broken father! The latter seemed a worthy, respectable person, (he was an industrious tradesman in the country,) with a few thin grey hairs scattered over his otherwise bald head, and sate with his hands closed together, resting on his knees, gazing on his doomed son with a lack-lustre eye, which, together with his anguish-worn features, told eloquently of his sufferings!

"Well, Doctor!" exclaimed the young man, at length, closing the Bible, "I have now read that blessed chapter to the end; and, I thank God, I think I feel it.—But now, let me thank you, Doctor, for your good and kind attention to my request! I have something particular to say to you, but it must be in private," he continued, looking significantly at his father, as though he wished him to take the hint, and withdraw for a few moments. Alas! the heart-broken parent understood him not, but continued with his eyes riveted—vacantly—as before.

"We must be left alone for a moment," said the young man, rising, and stepping to the door. He knocked, and when it was opened, whispered the turnkey to remove his father gently, and let him wait outside for an instant or two. The man entered for that purpose, and the prisoner took hold tenderly of his father's hand, and said, "Dear—dear father!—you must leave me for a moment, while I speak in private to this gentleman;" at the same time endeavouring to raise him from the chair.

"Oh! yes—yes—What?—Of course," stammered the old man, with a bewildered air, rising; and then, as it were with a sudden gush of full returning consciousness, flung his arms round his son, folded him convulsively to his breast, and groaned—"Oh, my son; my poor son!" Even the iron visage of the turnkey seemed darkened with a transient emotion, at this heart-breaking scene. The next moment we were left alone; but it was some time before the culprit recovered from the agitation occasioned by this sudden ebullition of his father's feelings.

"Doctor," he gasped at length, "we've but a few—very few moments, and I have much to say. God Almighty bless you," squeezing my hands convulsively, "for this kindness to a guilty, unworthy wretch like me; and the business I wanted to see you about is sad, but short. I have heard so much of your goodness, Doctor, that I'm sure you won't deny me the only favour I shall ask."

"Whatever is reasonable and proper—if it lie in my way—I shall certainly—" said I, anxiously waiting to see the nature of the communication he seemed to have for me to execute.

"Thank you, Doctor; thank you. It is only this—in a word—guilty wretch that I am!—I have"—he trembled violently—"seduced a lovely, but poor girl—God forgive me!—And—and—she is now—nearly on the verge of her confinement!" He suddenly covered his face with his handkerchief, and sobbed bitterly for some moments. Presently he resumed—"Alas, she knows me not by my real name; so that, when she reads the account of—of—my execution in the papers of Wednesday—she won't know it is her Edward! Nor does she know me by the name I bore in Regent Street. She is not at all acquainted with my frightful situation; but she must be, when all is over! Now, dear, kind, good Doctor," he continued, shaking from head to foot, and grasping my hand, "do, for the love of God, and the peace of my dying moments, promise me that you will see her—(she lives at ———)—visit her in her confinement, and gradually break the news of my death to her; and say my last prayers will be for her, and that my Maker may forgive me for her ruin! You will find in this little bag a sum of L.30—the last I have on earth—I beg you will take five guineas for your own fee, and give the rest to my precious—my ruined Mary!" He fell down on his knees, and folded his arms round mine, in a supplicating attitude. My tears fell on him, as he looked up at me—"Oh, God be thanked for these blessed tears!—They assure me you will do what I ask—may I believe you will?"

"Yes—yes—yes, young man," I replied, with a quivering lip; "it is a painful task; but I will do it—give her the money, and add ten pounds to the thirty, should it be necessary."—"Oh, Doctor, depend on it, God will bless you and yours for ever, for this noble conduct!—And now, I have one thing more to ask—yes—one thing"—he seemed choked—"Doctor, your skill will enable you to inform me—I wish to know—is—the death I must die to-morrow"—he put his hand to his neck, and, shaking like an aspen-leaf, sunk down again into the chair from which he had risen—"is—hanging—a painful—a tedious—" He could utter no more, nor could I answer him.

"Do not," I replied, after a pause, "do not put me to the torture of listening to questions like these. Pray to your merciful God; and, rely on it, no one ever prayed sincerely in vain. The thief on the cross—" I faltered; then feeling, that if I continued in the cell a moment longer, I should faint, I rose, and shook the young man's hands; he could not speak, but sobbed and gasped convulsively;—and in a few moments I was driving home. As soon as I was seated in my carriage I could restrain my feelings no longer, but burst into a flood of tears. I prayed to God I might never be called to pass through such a bitter and afflicting scene again, to the latest hour I breathed! I ought to have called on several patients that evening, but finding myself utterly unfit, I sent apologies, and went home. My sleep in the night was troubled; the distorted image of the convict I had been visiting flitted in horrible shapes round my bed all night long. An irresistible and most morbid restlessness and curiosity took possession of me, to witness the end of this young man. The first time the idea presented itself, it sickened me; I revolted from it. How my feelings changed, I know not; but I rose at seven o'clock, and, without hinting it to any one, put on the large top coat of my servant, and directed my hurried steps towards the Old Bailey. I got into one of the houses immediately opposite the gloomy gallows, and took my station, with several other visitors, at the window. They were conversing on the subject of the execution, and unanimously execrated the sanguinary severity of the laws which could deprive a young man, such as they said E—— T—— was, of his life, for an offence of merely civil institution. Of course, I did not speak. It was a wretched morning; a drizzling shower fell incessantly. The crowd was not great, but conducted themselves most indecorously. Even the female portion—by far the greater—occasionally vociferated joyously and boisterously, as they recognised their acquaintance among the crowd. At length, St Sepulchre's bell tolled the hour of eight—gloomy herald of many a sinner's entrance into eternity; and as the last chimes died away on the ear, and were succeeded by the muffled tolling of the prison bell, which I could hear with agonizing distinctness, I caught a glimpse of the glistening gold-tipped wands of the two under-sheriffs, as they took their station under the shade at the foot of the gallows. In a few moments, the Ordinary, and another grey-haired gentleman, made their appearance; and between them was the unfortunate criminal. He ascended the steps with considerable firmness. His arms were pinioned before and behind; and when he stood on the gallows, I could hear the exclamations of the crowd—"Lord, Lord, what a fine young man! Poor fellow!" He was dressed in a suit of respectable mourning, and wore black kid gloves. His light hair had evidently been adjusted with some care, and fell in loose curls over each side of his temples. His countenance was much as I saw it on the preceding evening—fearfully pale; and his demeanour was much more composed than I had expected, from what I had witnessed of his agitation in the condemned cell. He bowed twice very low, and rather formally, to the crowd around—gave a sudden and ghastly glance at the beam over his head, from which the rope was suspended, and then suffered the executioner to place him on the precise spot which he was to occupy, and prepare him for death. I was shocked at the air of sullen, brutal indifference, with which the executioner loosed and removed his neckerchief, which was white, and tied with neatness and precision—dropped the accursed noose over his head, and adjusted it round the bare neck—and could stand it no longer. I staggered from my place at the window to a distant part of the room, dropped into a chair, shut my eyes, closed my tingling ears with my fingers,—and, with a hurried aspiration for God's mercy towards the wretched young criminal who, within a very few yards of me, was, perhaps, that instant surrendering his life into the hands which gave it, continued motionless for some minutes, till the noise made by the persons at the window, in leaving, convinced me all was over. I rose and followed them down stairs; worked my way through the crowd, without daring to elevate my eyes, lest they should encounter the suspended corpse,—threw myself into a coach, and hurried home. I did not recover the agitation produced by this scene for several days.—This was the end of a FORGER!

In conclusion, I may just inform the reader, that I faithfully executed the commission with which he had intrusted me, and a bitter, heart-rending business it was!

THE PROPERTY AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

EVERY man who is a friend to that religion which is the most mild, tolerant, and scriptural in its doctrines—the most free from bigotry, fanaticism, and tyranny in its spirit and practice—the most in harmony with political freedom—and the most fruitful of national prosperity and happiness, must be a friend to the Church of England. And every friend to this Church must find in her modern history cause of bitter sorrow and gloomy apprehension.

Thirty or forty years ago, she had even her warmest friends in the middle and lower classes; she was enthusiastically supported by the body of the English population; while the dissenters, low in station, few in number, confined to particular places, destitute of political weight, and assailed by popular hostility, were so far from being able to attack her possessions, that they could scarcely enjoy the toleration allowed them by law. In Ireland, her laymen, as well as clergy, were, save in the exception, her devoted champions; and the Catholics, as a body, solemnly disavowed all enmity to her property and rights. While she was thus mighty in national attachment, she was the revered spouse of the State; the law gave her, directly, or otherwise, a monopoly of almost all influential and civil trusts.

At present the state of things is wellnigh reversed. It is not yet quite so much a matter of reproach to be a churchman as it was formerly to be a dissenter; but, however, the churchmen have sunk into a despised minority. To defend the Church is to provoke popular derision and enmity, and in almost every struggle her party is defeated. The middle and lower classes have transferred much of the animosity they heretofore entertained against the dissenters to her clergy; and with the higher ones, it has become a system to stand aloof from her and advise concession in every thing that affects her interests. While the dissenters have gained the first place in popular favour and support, they have been exempted from legal restriction, and they are alone, or in conjunction with her other enemies, making offensive war on her in every direction. One party attacks her tithes, another her rates, and a third her authority; in both England and Ireland, the seizure of a large part of her wealth is openly advocated. To give the utmost effect to the turn of popular feeling against her, she has been divorced from the State, and made its political menial.

If any thing on earth can be certain, this must be so—if the Church of England continue to decline as she has long done, her fall cannot be far distant.

We might take hope, if we could see reason to believe that the things which have operated so calamitously against her had exhausted their powers of evil; but, alas! we can only see the contrary. The assurances which were so profusely given on all sides, that the razing of her fortifications would free her from assault—the removal of restriction from the Protestant dissenter and Roman Catholic would put an end to their hostility towards her—and the carrying of the Catholic question would unite the body of the community in her favour, have been put to the proof; and what is the issue? Attack has been transferred from the disqualifications of her foes to her own existence; concession, instead of filling the dissenters, Protestant and Catholic, with the spirit of peace, has only prompted them to attempt such inroads on her property and rights as, a few years since, they did not dare to mention. The carrying of the Catholic question has converted an immense portion of her defenders into assailants, destroyed the bond which combined the body of the people with the aristocracy and clergy, and done much towards uniting the community against her. In Ireland, it has changed the Orangeman into a Liberal, stripped her of friends, and suspended exertions for extending her religion. At the election, it was the great cause, in both England and Ireland, of giving the House of Commons to those who are hostile to her.

The principle, that she can only prosper through the things which must, of necessity, cripple and destroy her, is still the prevailing one; and its parents have gained the control of the Legislature. Her party is powerless and passive. The Ministry has been incapacitated for defending, and its interests have been turned against her. The clergy and laity have been involved in war, and the latter has been taught to call for her spoliation, as a matter of pecuniary benefit.

We might be consoled if the decline of the Church had produced no evil to the empire. But the constitution, the laws, constituted authorities—all things valuable in the political and social edifice, have sunk in public veneration with her. In proportion as her political influence has declined, principles of government have prevailed which have filled the realm with loss, want, and suffering, and which threaten the dissolution of society; opposition to her has been, as a matter of course, the support of the innovator, demagogue, and traitor. Her loss of such influence has been an equal one to truth, independence, and freedom: it has, in a great measure, destroyed the salutary control which the enlightened part of society, and that part which has an interest in being independent, exercised over the remainder; and replaced it with the tyranny of the party knave, and the profligate of faction. What religion has lost in her fall, it has not gained in the exaltation of her rivals; its power has fallen with her in the Cabinet and Legislature, in every class, from the highest to the lowest. The humbler part of the population has not forsaken her to fill the chapels of the dissenters, but to forsake religion, and to a lamentable extent embrace infidelity. Of course, morals have declined with her; and corruption, want of principle, vice, and crime, have proportionally increased.

In this state of things it is idle to tell us to be silent. We may be assured by this or that bishop, that the affairs of the Church are conducted in the most pure and perfect manner, but it is rendered worthless by the fact, that instead of being able to stand her ground, she is rapidly sinking. This fact is alone sufficient to convince us, that in her system of government there is something radically vicious and defective, and to justify us in an unsparing examination of it. The insinuation lately put forth by an Irish prelate, in the words, "Lay Synod," calls for small notice, because we think no English one would venture to repeat it. When the Church exists for the benefit of the laity—when laymen, by law, supply her Head, select her functionaries, and have her under their control, it is too much to intimate that they have no right to intermeddle with her affairs. Too long, indeed, have laymen contented themselves with passive obedience, and the time has arrived when they must display something of a different character; not the least of the reasons for their doing this is to be found in the indolence, incapacity, and misconduct of the clergy in regard to her present condition. To the stigmas cast by that party which bears the name of High Church, on all who suggest remedy and reform, we reply, Prove that the Church is flourishing and secure, and we will at once admit that change is unnecessary; those are her enemies who resist all attempts to save her from obvious ruin.

But we can find ample apology for what we are about to say in this alone. The clergy have a bill before Parliament for making a great change touching her titles: and report states, that such a strong and comprehensive measure, as a new distribution of her property, is on the eve of being brought forward. Every one will own, that the moment when she is placed under process of purgation and repair, is a peculiarly fitting one for suggesting all the amendments which her state appears to call for. While we think that the measures we have named will be beneficial, we are convinced that, alone, they will do little for her salvation—they will not reach the weightier causes which are working her ruin.

Some years since, we recommended sundry amendments, which have since been adopted in different dioceses, with, we believe, considerable benefit. We confined ourselves to such as were not calculated to produce any derangement and disorder in the Church; because the state of the Catholic question made it impolitic for us to go further; this restriction exists no longer; it has been changed into an obligation for us to call loudly for every reform which we then could not in prudence mention. In discharging this obligation, we shall deem ourselves at liberty to revert to the amendments we formerly proposed, in so far as their importance and their connexion with a new distribution of church property may render it necessary.

In offering some brief remarks on the measures we have named, touching such property, we will, in the first place, notice the disgraceful doctrines which have been put forth in various quarters respecting the disposal of it. It is not by the poor and ignorant alone, that "reforms" in it have been called for which confessedly, or evidently, mean its seizure in a greater or smaller degree, for the uses of the State, or the benefit of individuals, who in claim to it have not the slightest.

The title of the Church to her property is as good as that of any individual whatever to his; and it is far better than that of many very exalted people. Much of this property—we are sorry for it—belongs to individuals. This has been denied, on the ground, that the clergyman only possesses his living for life, while the interest of the individual in his property is absolute; but the distinction is clearly worthless; to entitle it to notice, the living ought to revert to the State on the death of the clergyman. The property of the Church belongs to her in perpetuity, as that of the individual belongs to him; it has been again and again solemnly guaranteed to her by every authority in constitution and law, which can give sanctity to right; and it is preposterous to argue that her title to it is defective, because it does not belong in perpetuity to those who enjoy it under her as her servants. It does not follow that the State is its real owner, because her ministers are public functionaries: the State has divested itself of all right and claim to it, without reserving any power of resumption, save through acts of forfeiture in her. We need not enquire how much of it she has received from private individuals; it is sufficient to say, that whether property be given by the State, or acquired in any other manner, the right to it is precisely the same. The impeachment of her title must destroy all security of private fortune.

Passing from right, is there any evidence to prove that the property of the Church is too great? It may be urged, that some of her ministers have too much of it; but it is demonstrable that many of them have far too little, and that, on the average, it is less than it ought to be on public as well as other grounds. While this is the case, it continually sustains great relative diminution; amidst the increase of population and individual wealth, it remains almost stationary.

The uses for which this property is set apart can need little illustration. To those—and, alas! they are far too numerous—who seem to think that religion is of no value in regard to a future state of existence, we may say that all acknowledge public morals to be essential for the weal of the community in every particular; and that the chief of these uses is to teach not only them, but the only thing which can keep them in existence. But the property is intended to do much more than bestow religious and moral instruction; it is to provide every dwelling, without excepting the humblest, with a friend in trouble, a comforter in sorrow, and a benefactor in distress.

If the State should lay unhallowed hands on the property of the Church, the body of the population could gain little from it in relief from taxation. The property thus taken would pass principally to the great landowners, and the benefit which the country draws from the clergy, as a numerous body of small ones, would be greatly reduced. In Ireland, the mass of the people, from their habits, would scarcely be reached by any remission of taxes which church-robbery would yield; while the latter would take the land from the best of resident proprietors, and give it to the absentees. Such robbery would operate in the most pernicious manner to the population at large.

When this is looked at, it is alike astonishing and afflicting, that men can be found to call for the spoliation of the Church, as a matter of public benefit. It forms the best of all reasons why, instead of yielding to them, redoubled efforts should be made for extending religious instruction.

Returning to the measure which relates to the tithes; a clamour is raised against the latter by many landowners and farmers, as well as others, which has for its object abolition rather than commutation. We repeat what we said some time ago, that every owner of land subject to tithes, or his ancestors, either received it as a gift, or bought it, subject to them for ever. If it were given, they were not included in the gift; if it were bought, they were not included in the purchase, but on the contrary, their full value was allowed in the purchase-money. The owner of such land has no more right to the tithes of it, whatever their operation may be, than any other individual; yet their abolition would give them to him without equivalent. The base dishonesty of asking for this needs no other exposure.

What makes the matter the more unpardonable, is the fact, that very many of the landowners, who wish to seize on the tithes, warmly supported the changes of law, which brought on them the distress they plead in excuse. By their besotted ignorance and party profligacy, they plunged themselves and their tenants into suffering; and now they seek relief in the robbery of the innocent. Their plea amounts to this,—the Church must be despoiled for their benefit, because they have been imbecile and unprincipled.

The case is similar with the farmers. The rent of titheable, is in proportion even lower than that of tithe-free land, therefore the occupiers really pay no tithes at their own cost. The farmer, in effect, has the full value of his tithes returned to him in the shape of reduction of rent, and should they be abolished, his rent would have this value added to it.

It is urged that tithes operate against improvements. Those who look at the advances which agriculture has made in the last thirty years, will not find in this sufficient ground for wholesale knavery. They are either a stimulant to enclosures, because, by the latter, the Church has land given her in lieu of them: in some other improvements, they can be taxed for their proportion of the cost. The landlord has small cause to complain of them on this score; and when the tenant only pays in rent and tithes jointly what the occupier of tithe-free land pays in rent alone, he cannot have much more.

This will shew the absurdity of the assertion, that it is unjust for Catholic landowners and farmers to be compelled to pay tithes to a Protestant Church. They are under no such compulsion; the tithes taken from their land do not, and never did, belong to them; and in reality they pay no more tithes than the owners and occupiers of tithe-free land.

But the question of right must be carried further. A very large portion of the tithes does not belong to the church, but is the property of laymen; it is very evident that the abolition of tithes would be as direct robbery to these laymen, as the confiscation of his fortune would be to Lord Ebrington, or any other tithe-reviler. Farther, another very large portion is strictly private property, although it is enjoyed by the Church; we allude to the livings which belong, by purchase or otherwise, to individuals, both lay and clerical; and abolition would be similar robbery here. It may be said, that the better part of those who declaim against tithes do not go so far; but it is very obvious that they seek change as a matter of unjust gain to themselves, and unjust loss to the tithe-owners.

If, then, tithes should be abolished, the gain would be almost wholly monopolized by the owners of land subject to them, who would acquire it through the direct robbery of another part of the community; the occupiers of such land would gain very little, if any thing; the owners and occupiers of tithe-free land, and the country at large, would gain nothing. To enable the community in the aggregate to draw pecuniary profit from tithes, they must be sold or annually collected for the benefit of the Treasury; in such case the owners and occupiers of land subject to them will find them considerably augmented.

It is thus demonstrable that the whole which the landowners and farmers who clamour against tithes, are justly entitled to, is, liberty to buy the latter, or to pay an annual sum in lieu of them, according to their fair value: the rights of others will not grant more. From the feelings which are abroad respecting tithes, the litigation they produce, and the injury they inflict on the Church by creating enmity between the clergyman and his flock, we should rejoice to see this liberty conceded. Every friend of the Church must, from these reasons, wish to see them, not taken from her, but converted into a different kind of property. We are of course glad that her heads have brought forward a bill for their general commutation, and we earnestly trust it will be successful.

The second measure for amending the distribution of Church property, is, according to report, to be brought forward by Mr Brougham. If the report be true—and, for any thing we know, it may be groundless—we must say, the hands of the learned gentleman are the very last in which such employment ought to be placed. Changes in the internal affairs of the Church ought to be introduced only by the faithful part of the clergy, or such of her lay members as are known to be her warm and conscientious friends. When the anti-church assertions and projects which abound so greatly in Mr Brougham's history are looked at, is it possible to regard him as one of her members, or to suppose him free from hostility to her? As almost every measure which he has hitherto brought forward has made the public good subservient to that of party, may we not reasonably fear, that in this matter his object is, less the benefit of the Church, than the production of war amidst the clergy for the promotion of Whig interests? Have we not cause to believe that his intemperance and party fanaticism wholly unfit him for undertaking the question? Having said this to put the friends of the Church on their guard, we will add, if Mr Brougham bring forward a sound plan in a right spirit, let him be supported.

Every intelligent well-wisher to the Church will, we think, own that her interests would be greatly promoted by a better distribution of her property; he will own this, not because some of her ministers have too much, but because others have far too little. That system must be alike vicious and injurious, which gives to a wealthy Church a poverty-stricken parochial clergy. In addition, a part of this property might be employed much more advantageously to her in other ways than the payment of her ministers.

Improvement might be carried to a very high point without putting any thing to hazard, or provoking any important difference of opinion. No small part of the wealth of the Church is enjoyed by men who either have almost nothing to do, or whose duties are of no value; and certainly valid objection could not be raised to the abolition of sinecures and useless offices, in order to give the emoluments of them to the laborious and effective part of the clergy.

A point of more difficulty presents itself in the taking of income from such of the industrious and necessary ministers of the Church as are overpaid. The duties of a prelate are of the highest importance, and if they be properly performed, they are most laborious ones. Those, therefore, on whom they rest, ought to be paid liberally; they ought, for the sake of public benefit, to have too much rather than too little; but their emoluments should be regulated in some degree by the principles which govern salary in civil offices. If, without touching the poorer sees, a portion of revenue were taken from the rich ones, and given to small livings, there would be much justice as well as wisdom in the measure. It must be grievous wrong for a Bishop to enjoy a great excess of wealth, as long as there is one clergyman who has not a competency.

In many cases the living of a small village yields from L.500 to L.1500 per annum; while that of a populous town does not yield more than L.300 or L.400. The greatness of the income in the village is pernicious; it places the minister so far above his flock, that he is either a stranger or tyrant, instead of what he ought to be. The smallness of the income in the town is equally pernicious; it disables the minister for employing proper assistance, and attending to the just claims on his benevolence. If, by any possibility, an exchange of livings could take place between the village and the town, it would be highly beneficial.*

The living of a village yields L. 1000 per annum, while those of two adjoining villages only yield each L. 100. For reasons which will soon be disclosed, we do not wish to see equality, but if, without making any change of fixed property, L. 100 per annum of income were taken from the rich living, and divided between the poor ones, it would, in regard to the interests of the Church, be highly beneficial to all the three. In many cases this could not be done, because the livings are private property; but even in them the transferring of a rich living from a small village to a large town in the way of exchange cannot be an impossibility.

In large cities and towns, the minister of the parish church has perhaps a revenue much greater than necessary, while his church can only accommodate a trifling part of the parishioners; it could be just, rather than the contrary, to attach the redundant part of his income to additional churches in the same parish. When the surplice-fees in such places are so considerable, and a fair division of them would operate so beneficially to unendowed churches and chapels, we cannot see why one church in a parish should monopolize them. The monopoly is injurious in many respects; it causes various rites of the Church to be performed in a manner which is a scandal to her.

We will go no farther into detail, because, if change be pronounced necessary, the important points it ought to embrace will be easily discovered. It ought evidently to look at practical good, and not at theoretic perfection, and to scrupulously avoid all attempts to produce chaos amidst Church property for purposes of speculative re-organization. Its grand object should be—the proper enlargement of small livings, and multiplication of churches, through the abolition of useless places, and the reduction of such incomes as are too large; and it should carry the latter no farther than may be required by the former. If it abolish and reduce, without looking at any thing save theoretic reform, and labour to bring down the emoluments of the heads of the Church to the lowest point, merely to raise those of the parochial clergy to the highest, it will produce much more evil than good.

There is, however, too much reason to believe that very many people mean, by a better distribution, nothing beyond the enlargement of the revenues of the working clergy. This alone would operate as little more than an act of justice to a meritorious part of the ministers of the Church; it would yield small benefit to her general interests. It is preposterous to imagine, that to make her more wealthy ministers poorer, and her parochial ones richer, is all that is necessary for causing her to flourish. In addition, provision must be made for giving places of worship and clergymen to that immense part of the population which now, practically, has none; and farther, radical changes must be made in her system of government. All this must be done to make a new distribution of her property yield material advantage to herself and the country.

Of the Church of England, it may be said, she has the best creed and form of worship that could be conceived, for enabling her to prosper, and the most effective system of government that could be invented for producing her ruin. To stand and flourish, she must, necessarily, possess the confidence and affection of the body of the population; to possess these, her ministers must display the qualifications and conduct, and her regulations and the general management of her affairs must be of the description, requisite for generating and promoting them. Her system of government is calculated to produce, in all respects, the reverse. It stands diametrically opposed to all reason and wisdom, to every thing which enables her rivals to triumph against her, and to the principles and rules which, throughout civil society, are found to be indispensable.

* Such exchange could be justified on the present practice of the Church: The functionary of the cathedral is paid for serving it with the income of a country living he scarcely ever sees; the pluralist, if he do duty in one living, is partly paid with the income of another in which he does not officiate. In the first case, the income of the country living is really attached to the cathedral; and what practical difference can there be between this and the attaching of it to a town-church?

Her laymen are, as such, wholly excluded from sharing in the disposal of her trusts, and the management of her general interests; and not a single effective bond unites them with her; their power in her only extends to tithes, rates, and such other matters as make it a means of arraying them against her. They see and hear her ministers if they go from choice to her places of worship; but if they remain at home, they do not, in a religious sense, know that she has any. They, therefore, look on her as a national institution, common to all, which they are to be jealous of and oppose; but not as a religious body, of which they are members, and which it is their interest to protect and enlarge. They see in her ministers those of the Church, but not their own; a number of public functionaries, to be restrained from abuse of power; but not the leaders of their own cause, to be venerated and supported.

The exclusion we have named sits to almost the same extent on her clergy. They do not select her more important functionaries, or dispose of her benefices, or superintend her general affairs, in union. Their power is chiefly confined to minor matters; and where it extends further, they either have not the means of making a proper use of it, or they have every incitement to abuse it. They grant ordination, but the regulations under which they act, restrict them from rejecting unfit candidates; individually they select the curates, but they are surrounded with temptations to make the worst selection possible.

While the laity and clergy are, jointly and separately, positively and negatively, restricted in material points, from appointing her functionaries, and managing her general affairs; those who do it, notoriously act in utter disregard of her weal, and under every stimulant to the sacrifice of it. When a bishop dies, where is the man who dreams that the new one will be chosen on account of his qualifications for the office; or that the lower vacancies caused by the event, will be filled with reference to merit? When a living in the gift of the Lord Chancellor is to be disposed of, who is so foolish as to imagine that it will be given to the most deserving parish clergyman? In both cases, qualification is disregarded, the most worthy are passed by, and the most unworthy are selected. The trusts of the Church are admitted to be, and used as, patronage, in the most vulgar and corrupt sense of the term; and the Minister of State who bestows them regularly, does it to enrich his connexions, reward his adherents, or bribe his opponents.

This, bad as it is, is not the worst. If the Ministry wish to carry any prejudicial measure to the Church, its practice is to bestow her preferments on such of the clergy only as will support it, and act the part of her enemies. From the turn which the carrying of the Catholic question has given to public affairs, the Ministry which is the most favourable to her must exist in a large degree through the support or neutrality of her enemies; therefore it will be compelled to discountenance effective zeal in her service, and to confine her leading trusts to men regardless of her interests. Farther, one of the great parties of the country regularly patronizes her enemies, and labours to humble her; of course, when it enjoys office, it must give her preferments to such of the clergy as will assail and betray her.

Why is this man made a Bishop? He has been tutor in one noble family, or he is connected by blood with another, or he enjoys the patronage of some polluted female favourite of Royalty, or he is the near relative of a Minister, or, at the nod of the Premier, he has been a traitor to the Church in a matter affecting her existence. Why is this man made a Dean? He has married a relative of the Home Secretary, or he is a turncoat who has joined the enemies of the church in the destruction of her securities, or it is necessary to prevent some powerful family from going into Opposition. Why is this stripling invested with an important dignity in the Church? He is the illegitimate son of a member of the Royal Family, or he is the same to some nobleman, or he belongs to a family which, in consideration of it, will give the Ministry a certain number of votes in Parliament. And why is this man endowed with a valuable benefice? He has potent interest, or it will prevent him from giving further opposition to measures for injuring the Church, or he has voted at an election for a Ministerial candidate, or his connexions have much election influence, or he is a political tool of the Ministry. At the contest for the University of Oxford, which expelled Sir R. Peel, it was generally asserted, that certain members of the Ministry used every effort to gain votes for him by offers of church preferment; or in other words, they used the property of the Church as bribes to induce the clergy to support the assailant of her securities against the defender of them. According to the newspapers, something similar took place at the recent contest for the University of Dublin. After the carrying of the Catholic question, the preferments which fell on certain of the apostate Bishops, or their connexions, proved that these men had been bought with her own property to turn their sacrilegious hands against her. The disposal of what is called Church patronage in this manner, is not the exception, but the rule; it is not a matter of secrecy, or one which escapes public observation; it is looked on as a thing of course, and so far has the monstrous abuse been sanctified by custom, that while no one expects to see a vacancy in the Church filled according to merit, the filling of it in the most profligate way scarcely provokes reprobation.

Let us now look at those appointments in the Church which are not in the hands of government. A great number of livings are private property. On what principle are they disposed of? The owners fill them without the least regard for qualification; they practically give them to their relatives while yet in the womb or the cradle, and these relatives enter into orders from no other reason than to enjoy them as private fortune; or clergymen and others buy such livings solely for private benefit. In the appointment of curates, those are chosen who are the cheapest, the least formidable as rivals, and in consequence the most disqualified; care for the interests of the Church is out of the question.

Thus, in the general appointment of the functionaries of the Church, whether it rest with the government or individuals, qualification is disregarded, and the reverse of it is, to a very large extent, made the ground of selection.

These are some of the inevitable consequences: In the first place, the office of clergyman is sought by the very last people who ought to receive it. Before it is decided that a youth shall be a barrister, a physician, an officer in the army, or even a member of a mechanical trade, it is ascertained that he possesses the requisite ability and turn of mind; but his lack of these is too often the reason on which it is decided that he shall be a clergyman. However brainless or profligate he may be, he still must enter into holy orders, because his friends have property or interest in the Church; perhaps they select him for it in preference to his brothers, because he happens to be the dunce of the family. While the most improper men are thus impelled to enter into orders, the most fitting ones are restricted from it. What can the man of talent and piety hope for as a clergyman, if he be destitute of fortune and friends? Preferment is to him impossible; his merit alone is a positive bar to it. He can scarcely regard a curacy as an attainable matter; for his ability might make him too popular; his integrity might incapacitate him for joining in illegal bargain, and his piety might bring on him the imputation of evangelism.

In the second place, the system directly operates, not only to keep ability and piety at the lowest points amidst the clergy, but to render the portion of them which may be forced into orders almost useless to the Church. If an able, pious clergyman exert himself zealously in her behalf, he crosses the wishes of the Ministry, and offends various of its supporters; he is therefore looked on as a dangerous, impracticable person, who must be excluded from preferment. To gain the latter, he must imitate his incapable brethren, be neutral and inactive, and study the wishes of government, however hostile they may be to the interests it is his duty to guard. If the Ministry defend the Church, and the exertions of the clergy be therefore unnecessary, the Philpotts deluge the country with their pamphlets, and the Blomfields fill Parliament with their speeches, in her favour; rectors and curates vie with each other in giving utterance to the sentiments of martyrdom. But if the Ministry seek to injure her, and the clergy be therefore called on, in the most imperious manner, to exert themselves in her protection, they either do nothing effectual, or turn their arms against her. In melancholy proof, we need only point to what took place when the Catholic question was carried. The Ministry, by the simple revelation of its intentions, dissipated the zeal, and suspended the efforts, of the Clergy, to the utmost extent allowed by decency. While such laymen as the illustrious Lord Eldon, Lord Winchelsea, and others, demonstrated that they were ready to sacrifice their all for her, the bishops, who did not join her assailants, contented themselves with cold, commonplace opposition speeches, which left their sincerity doubtful. That Bishop of London, who, when Lord Liverpool was the Premier, spoke so vehemently and powerfully against the measure, now, although he professed to be still its opponent, deprecated all effectual opposition to it, undervalued the evils it was calculated to produce, and even spoke of his debt of gratitude to those who had made him what he was. If the Church be suffering vital injury from the want of reforms and improvements, the Clergy can say and do nothing, from the fear of giving offence to government. Where the influence of the latter does not reach, matters are no better. The curate knows, that if he confine himself to the cold performance of the duties prescribed by law, he is safe with his employer; but if he do more, he endangers both character and subsistence.

In the third place, the Clergy and Laity are separated from, and arrayed against, each other. The Minister has no interest in conciliating, preserving, and increasing his flock; its favour cannot benefit, and its hostility cannot injure, him. He therefore regards its members as men placed under him by authority, and whose duty is to hear and obey him, without reference to his conduct. In truth, their favour and affection, particularly if he be a curate, are more likely to prevent than to assist his promotion. The layman is estranged from his minister by his want of communication with him and the distance at which he is kept; he is disgusted with the manner in which the preferments of the Church are disposed of, and with the worldly-mindedness, indolence, and servility of the Clergy. In every emergency in which they ought to act together for the good of the Church, the Laity finds the Clergy, to a large extent, ranged with her enemies. They form, in regard to her interests, two separate and conflicting bodies.

To give to all this the most comprehensive powers of mischief, almost any man may, so far as concerns ability and character, gain admission into holy orders. A Clergyman may be destitute of religious feeling; he may be grossly immoral; he may discharge his duties in the most incompetent manner, and lose his flock—he may do almost any thing, short of legal crime, and still he will neither forfeit his living nor draw on himself any punishment.

On the whole, then, the interests of the Laity are placed in opposition to those of the Church—the case is the same with the interests of the Clergy—the Laity and Clergy are arrayed against each other—the Clergy are selected on the very best grounds for rendering them incapable, and then they are placed in the very best circumstances for making them impotent and negligent—all the temptations, stimulants, and restrictions, are ranged on the side of wrong—and the Church is deprived of all effectual defence in any thing the Ministry may resolve on against her.

There is wisdom in learning the art of war, or at least of self-defence, from an enemy; let us therefore look amidst the Dissenters to discover what it is in their system of government which has rendered them so prosperous.

It is of the highest importance to the State, as well as to herself, for the Church to be mighty amidst the middle and lower classes, particularly in large places; and it is amidst these classes that the Dissenters have been the most omnipotent against her; they have, in truth, to a very large extent, deserted her. A leading cause of this is, they are, in a great measure, excluded from her places of worship; the latter, in large towns, are for the wealthy only, and, in addition, they are infinitely too few in number. On surveying the congregation of one of them, we are struck with its appearance of riches and splendour; we see almost every pew occupied by elegantly dressed people or their gaudy menials; more minute inspection enables us to discover a few of the poor in the aisles and some obscure corner, but these, instead of forming in the congregation, as they ought, the great majority, are little more than the exception to the rule. While the middle and lower classes are thus literally prohibited from entering the church by high pew rents and the want of room, they are tempted to the chapel by low rents and free seats.

The large revenues possessed by cathedrals for their support, are often expended very uselessly or improperly. If the Church should annually employ a portion of them, in providing new places of worship principally for the accommodation of the poorer part of the community, she would reap from it vast benefit; and no earthly reason exists why she should not do so. This, we trust, will not be overlooked, if any better distribution of her property be made.

Another leading cause is, that the clergy, as well as the places of worship, are calculated for the wealthy only. The dissenting ministers, Protestant and Catholic, rise in a considerable degree from the humbler classes; and in so far as they are expressly educated for the sacred office, they are not taught to exalt themselves above the station they are destined for; to this their influence with those classes is largely owing. The ministers of the Church are taken chiefly from amidst the gentry; and this, with the education they receive, unfits them for mixing with the poorer members of their flocks as spiritual brethren, and performing the toil called for by duty. In general they are too much gentlemen to bestow any personal notice on the body of those who are placed under their care, and to do any thing beyond the performance of divine service. To carry this to the greatest possible height, some of the bishops decided not long since to refuse ordination to all who had not been a certain time at the university. The effect of this most impolitic regulation must be to make fortune and general unfitness the qualifications. The doctrine is most true, that it is highly beneficial to the Church for her trusts to be filled in a certain degree by members of the aristocracy; but while we admit this, we must insist, that on the same grounds it is highly beneficial to her for the parochial clergy to be taken in some measure from the lowest of the democracy; yet here is a regulation which prohibits both the lower and the middle classes from entering her priesthood. While the clergyman drives the body of the people from him, by shunning intercourse with, and placing himself above them; the dissenting minister gains them, by seeking their acquaintance, and treating them as religious friends.

A man cannot become a Protestant dissenting minister if he do not possess the requisite ability, piety, and sanctity of life; in consequence he cannot become one if he do not possess the qualifications for gaining the humbler part of the community. The clergyman, from the manner in which he obtains his office, often has not the necessary ability, piety, and sanctity of life, or the two latter, and therefore he is totally disqualified for winning the confidence and attachment of the lower and middle orders; he cannot go among them as a religious friend and adviser.

If the property of the church be distributed in a better manner, we earnestly trust that a portion of it will be employed in forming an establishment for the proper education of the clergy, and bestowal of holy orders. This might be done in the way of addition to the universities.

Instances may be seen almost daily in which young men of low or poor extraction, but of considerable natural powers, are anxious, from taste and a religious turn of mind, to take on them the sacred office; and it frequently happens that they join the Dissenters, because they have not the means for gaining orders in the Church. Such men would make the best of all parish clergymen; and it is greatly to be lamented, that instead of becoming the powerful servants of the Church, they too often become her powerful enemies. The establishment we have named ought to give them, in respect of education, cheap or gratuitous admission into her ministry, on satisfactory proof of qualification. While we would make the gaining of ordination as cheap and easy as possible to the most deserving, we would wholly deny it to the undeserving. The power to grant it ought to be confined to this establishment; and rejecting the present vague and negative rules of bestowal, proper powers of oratory, a reasonable share of ability, positive purity of life, industry, and religious character, should be insisted on.

Each body of the Dissenters practically forms a club: amidst both the Protestants and the Catholics, the members are firmly bound to each other and to their faith. This unites the laymen to the ministers, and makes them enthusiastic in favour of their religion; it keeps the ministers and laymen in friendly communication, and enables the former to visit the latter at their homes, both to preserve their attachment, and to use them as instruments for gaining new hearers and proselytes. With the Church, the case is different; she has hearers, but not members—a clergy, but not, in the proper sense of the term, a laity. Those who frequent her places of worship never see their ministers save in the pulpit, or at the communion table; they have no outward, valid tie to bind them to her as members, and they almost scruple to say that they belong to her; in every direct attack upon her they stand aloof, as not being affected by it. An inroad on the Methodists, the Independents, or the Catholics, is held to be one on the whole body, lay and clerical; but one on the Church is held to reach the clergy only. It is idle to conceal the fact, that the petitions which were poured into Parliament against the Catholic claims, sprang much more from fear and hatred of Catholicism, than affection for the Church of England.

If those who compose the congregations of the Church were changed from a kind of no-religion people, into her regularly enrolled members—from mere dissenters from other religions, into zealous champions of their own; this would yield benefits not only to her, but also to the State, which transcend calculation. And what is there to render it impossible? Nothing. A plan for forming a Church society in every parish could be easily drawn, and rendered highly successful: amidst both rich and poor, it would find a sufficiency of supporters. Let it not be forgotten that the primary reason why the middle and lower classes have forsaken the Church is, she has forsaken them. This plan would remove the barrier which separates the clergyman from at least the humbler members of his flock, and make him their regular visitor and friend. Saying nothing of other matters, it would be of immense advantage to the physical comforts of the poor, if in this manner their circumstances were kept constantly under the eyes of the clergy, and they were brought into regular contact and communion with the charitable rich. Vast numbers of families which now never enter a place of worship, and scarcely know what religion means, might thus be placed under regular religious instruction, and be as much improved in circumstances, as in morals.

The Dissenters are careful that their ministers shall be not only duly qualified, but acceptable to their respective flocks. With some of them the laity appoints the minister, and changes him at pleasure; with others, while it is excluded from all share in appointing him, its taste is as far as possible consulted, and in addition he only remains in the same place a year or two; even amidst the Catholics, particular attention is paid to the feelings of the laity in this point. The Church appoints her clergyman without the most distant reference to the feelings of his flock, and then if he be in the highest degree incapable and unpopular—if he deprive her of this flock altogether—she still keeps him for life in the benefice. If he be a curate, he is chosen and retained with the same utter scorn of the sentiments of the laity. This fact is sufficient to make it matter of surprise that she is not wholly forsaken.

The Dissenters act as we have stated, because they know it to be essential, not only for their prosperity, but their existence; and why cannot the Church imitate them? In reply, we will say, she surpasses them in means. To enable her, however, to suit the pastor to his flock, the power of selecting him must pass wholly into new hands.

In the first place, let the curate system, in so far as it is one of substitutes, and not of assistants, be totally abolished. The curates are pitied because they are poor, and eulogised, because they perform the labour for which others are paid; but nevertheless they are, as a whole, an incapable body of men. They are made incapable by the system, and they are employed for being so. Civil sinecures may plead in their defence, that they are practically duly earned pensions, or that they are necessary for supporting the poorer part of the nobility; but Church ones can plead nothing. The latter plunder the Church, the officiating clergy, and the laity; they debase one part of the clergy, incapacitate the other, and bestow an enormous portion of the revenues of the Church, which ought to be distributed by the hand of charity amidst the poor, on men who have not the slightest claim to it. It matters not if the possessor of two livings performs all the duties of one of them; he is still a sinecurist in respect of the other. The fact that almost any clergyman, however small his interest may be, can easily obtain the qualification for being a pluralist, is a sufficient answer to those who argue that the existing laws prevent pluralities as far as is necessary. Let no functionary of the Church be suffered to perform his duty by deputy; and let emolument be in both name and reality attached to the performance of duty. If a man be a bishop, dean, or canon, let him be distinctly paid as one; but let him not, because he is one, be the rector or vicar of a parish in which the clerical duties are performed by another. If the officers of universities, cathedrals, &c. cannot be sufficiently paid in any other way than from the incomes of distant livings in which they never officiate, at any rate do not give them, with the emoluments, the power of nominating the acting ministers; let each living be charged with a specific annual sum for them, and do not suffer them to interfere with it farther, but give it, subject to this encumbrance, to the clergyman who performs its duties.

In the second place, having in so far as concerns the curate system, taken from individuals the power of appointing the acting clergy, take it, as far as possible, from them in those cases in which livings are private property. Such livings are constantly on sale; and it is matter of bitter reproach to the Church, that the right to nominate the clergy, and of course the spiritual interests of the community, are to so large an extent made the objects of mercenary, and even corrupt, traffic. If a new distribution of her property be made, let a few thousands per annum be set apart for the purchase of these livings on her behalf.

In the third place, we have no hesitation in saying, that the time has fully arrived when, for the benefit of all parties, the power of direct appointment, in respect of every grade of the clergy, ought to be taken from the civil government. Without speaking of the manner in which the King became the head of the Church, and thereby acquired a power possessed by no other sovereign, and submitted to by scarcely any other religious body, we will observe, it is as clear in experience, as in reason, that such power ought never to have been his. While we maintain that, for the weal of the state, government ought to have authority to prevent influential offices, not only in the Church, but in every religious body, from being obtained by religious ministers of dangerous political character; we maintain also, that, for the good of the state, this authority ought not to extend farther. The civil ruler is an infinitely more unfit person than a disaffected archbishop or bishop, to be intrusted with the means of using the Church as an engine against public institutions; yet he must possess such means, if he possess the power to appoint her clergy.

We will put the King out of sight, for he is only nominally concerned in the matter; the question is really not one of prerogative, but of ministerial power and patronage. The Ministry is in reality the head of the Church. Looked at in the most favourable light possible, the case stands thus: The laity and clergy are, as such, strictly excluded from all share in electing the spiritual functionaries of the Church; and the selection is confided to such men as the Duke of Wellington, Lord Lyndhurst, and Sir Robert Peel; it is confided to these men, not in their character of members of the Church, but in that of trading politicians in the worst sense of the terms; they hold it only because they are such politicians. Could any thing be conceived more thoroughly at variance with every principle of reason and right? But this is now much too favourable a view of it. Henceforward the Ministry will generally consist partly of dissenters, and often of men anxious to injure the Church for the benefit of the dissenters. Thus the selection is confided to men who will not only sacrifice the weal of the Church to their private interests, but also endeavour, on religious or party grounds, to produce her ruin!

Can a single reason be urged why this monstrous state of things should continue? No. To be defensible, it ought to be necessary, either for restraining the Church from improper political conduct, or for extracting from her the requisite portion of public benefit. With regard to the first, if she were wholly independent of the government, she would be its supporter to the utmost extent called for by public good; the danger is, that she would be so farther: her interests would be identified with good principles of every description. But her absolute independence is not called for; and it would be perfectly easy to combine effectual restraint on this point, with all the freedom she needs in the management of her affairs. Touching the second, her bondage to Ministers disables her in every way, and binds her as much as possible from the production of public benefit.

While nothing can be pleaded in its defence, state reasons of every kind demand its termination. In defiance of that sound principle which insists on keeping the patronage of Ministers at the lowest point, here is an enormous mass enjoyed by men without even a pretext to justify it. The disposal of civil patronage is in general placed under sufficient checks; the objects must in material points be selected on qualification; but ecclesiastical patronage knows no such checks, and it is always, save in the exception, disposed of in a corrupt manner. We know not where a greater error could be found than this—the giving to any Ministry the power to make the clergy support it without reference to the character of its measures; yet this power, under the present system, must be possessed by any Ministry that may exist: whether the Ministry be composed of the Wellington party, the Whigs, or the new party, which, under the name of Liberals, is assuming distinct and formidable shape in the House of Commons, it must, no matter what it may do, carry the clergy with it. The error is the greater, because it converts that into a mighty engine of evil which might be one of good. The clergy of a country like this, if properly independent, would form an invaluable guide to the public mind, and a potent safeguard against misconduct in the executive. Another gigantic error we have in this—a national church is established, and then she is placed under regulations which cripple her, impel the population to dissent from her, restrict her from use, and make her a source of abuse. The clergy must be party men or they can gain no patronage; from this those who oppose them in politics must avoid them as religious teachers; and thus the Church is perverted into an instrument of dissent and irreligion. One of the essentials in a free country is, to keep the population, as far as possible, independent of political parties, and under the guidance of proper leaders; but here is a system for denying it the latter, and attaching it, as far as possible, to such parties. Another of these essentials is, to keep religion separated from party politics; but here is a regulation for forcing it into their spirit. A third essential is, to keep from the dissenters all causes of disaffection, and to make religion a source of loyalty and content; but here is a law for ranging the dissenters with the opponents of government, and rendering religion the parent of insubordination and disaffection.

Whatever might be the case when the body of the population was attached to the Church, her party support at present we fear weakens, rather than strengthens, the Ministry. Because it is connected with her, it must be opposed by the mighty mass of dissenters and people of no religion. To any Ministry, the effects of its compulsory connexion with her will be the same. It would add largely to the strength of the government, if it could stand in the eyes of the community at large free from mere party attachment and enmity to her. To one of the great parties of the state her political favour, and to the other her political hostility, is now a source of infinite odium and feebleness. The Tories are hated by a vast part of the population, because they are looked on as her party allies; and the Whigs are hated by another vast part, because they are regarded as her party enemies. Both would gain greatly from losing the character they thus bear, and being exempted when in office from the jealousy and opprobrium which the disposal of her trusts must bring upon them. She must be rendered independent of, and impartial between them, to give them this gain.

To the empire it has become a matter of the first consequence, that these parties should no longer be understood to fight the battles of one religious body against another; and that every thing should be removed which is calculated to make one of them the regular political leader and confederate of the Catholics against the Church. Every thing dear to it imperiously calls for the extinction of the causes, through which the Ministry and Opposition involve the religious bodies in political contention; and also for the disabling of both from making on the Church farther inroads. Her independence would operate powerfully to restrain them from injurious principle and conduct; while her slavery generates in them the worst doctrines and acts; and makes her a mighty engine in their hands for assailing the public weal.

The Church has nothing to expect from a continuance of her slavery but certain ruin. No Ministry can now possess the power, if it have the wish, to manage her interests properly; and no Ministry will exist that will have the wish to do so. She must look for the appointment of deliberate traitors to her trusts, in addition to the things which have operated so destructively against her. Because her clergy are degraded into the menials of the Ministry, she is in essentials deprived of a laity,—because the Ministry is despised, she is overwhelmed with unpopularity,—because she is a political tool, she is fought against as a religious body by the mass of the people. Her laymen are neutral, or ranged with her enemies in the schemes which are advocated for despoiling and destroying her; and her clergy can do nothing in her favour, but on the contrary, can be used as instruments for inflicting any injury on her that Ministers, hostile to her from necessity or creed, may desire.

Let then the Church of England be taken from the political arena; let her funds no longer form the treasury of political corruption; and her clergy and laity be used no farther as the political means of her destruction. Let the King remain her head; but, instead of being the despot he is, in regard to the disposal of her trusts, make him her limited sovereign. Give him his negative—his power to exclude all improper men from her preferments; but here fix the limit of his authority.

Having taken the appointment of the functionaries of the Church from the destructive hands which now hold it, the next thing is, to place it in the most fitting ones. It is very evident that it ought to be strictly confined to such members of the Church, clerical, or lay, or both, as would exercise the momentous trust in the most righteous manner for her benefit only. We do not wish to see the laity possess any large share in the selection of the clergy; and perhaps the best plan would be to give it to a committee of management, composed of a limited number of prelates and parochial clergy. The Archbishop of Canterbury might, ex officio, be the permanent head of this committee; but it would perhaps be better to change the other members triennially. The number of its members ought to be too great for bias, corruption, and intimidation; and too small for party divisions and strife. It might in every important vacancy place two or three names before the King for his choice; but beyond this, his power of selection, or, to speak more correctly, that of the Ministry, ought not to extend.

We do not, however, wish to see laymen denied all share in the choice of their ministers. Their rigid exclusion from all participation in managing the religious interests of the Church has contributed most powerfully to combine them with her enemies, and deprive her of a laity; to admit them into such management to the farthest point allowed by prudence, would have the best effects in giving them a deep personal interest in her welfare, uniting them with the clergy, and causing her to flourish. Those churches in which the parishioners select the afternoon lecturer, are filled to overflow in the afternoon, if they be almost deserted in the morning; and this fact is sufficient to establish what we have asserted. Whenever a living, or at least one in a populous parish, should become vacant, the committee might name two or three clergymen to perform the duty for a limited time, and then leave the election of one of them to the church society, of which we have spoken.

We have said that we do not wish to see an equalization of income amidst the Clergy, and we will now state our reasons. We dissent so far from the wish which was not long since expressed in Parliament for rendering the bishops incapable of translation, that we are anxious to see the principle of translation much more extensively acted on than it is. To take from the bishops the hope of farther preferment, is to destroy a potent stimulant to good, for the sake of removing a temptation to evil. The fault is not in translation, but in the power that now governs it; a bishop can only look for it to friends, sacrifice of duty, sycophancy, betrayal of trust, or any thing rather than merit; but let him gain it through desert alone, and it will form a source of incalculable benefit. Having placed church appointments in proper hands, we wish some of the sees to continue much poorer than others, both as a means of stimulating their possessors to exertion, and of bringing them all frequently under new inspection and management.

On the same grounds we wish for considerable inequality to be preserved in the yearly value of parish livings. At present, the parish clergyman is destitute of all incentives to proper exertions; if he be a starving curate, without fortune and friends, he can scarcely hope that any display of ability and merit will enable him to better his condition; if he possess the living, he, in general, has nothing more to expect from the Church, whatever his services and qualifications may be. This state of things is not more disgraceful to the Church than to the country. If preferment consist primarily in rank of office, it cannot, under the best management, benefit, in any material degree, the great body of the Clergy; we are, therefore, desirous for it to consist likewise, to a great extent, in advance of income only.

To turn this inequality of revenue, in both sees and livings, to account, let every clergyman, without reference to birth and fortune, have one of the small livings only, when he commences his clerical life; and let all be assured that promotion must depend solely on ability and conduct—not on eloquence alone, but also on visiting the sick, relieving the distressed, preserving and increasing the lay-members of the Church, &c., &c. When a bishop, or the holder of a rich living, dies, let his successor be taken from the oldest, in point of service, of the ministers who are the most worthy to succeed him; and fill every vacancy on the same principle. Through this a single death will produce a considerable number of promotions, and every clergyman will have the reward of exertion sufficiently within his reach. We need not dilate on the mighty effect it would have in improving the clergy. It would continually change the parish ministers, and this alone would have excellent fruits amidst the laity.

The feelings which make us anxious to see the clergy exalted and rewarded according to desert, lead us to think that they ought to be degraded and punished for demerit. If one of them make himself obnoxious to his flock and banish it from the church, ought he to be suffered to retain his trust for life? No one will reply in the affirmative. If the fault lie not with him, the weal of the Church requires at least his removal: and if it do, he ought, according to the extent of his misconduct, to be expelled from the ministry, or sent to one of the smallest livings. If a clergyman be licentious and profligate—be a gamester, a duellist, &c., is it proper that he should retain the sacred office, even without admonition? The committee should be empowered to take cognisance of the moral conduct of the clergy, and to visit all grave cases with expulsion.

We do not say that there ought to be no functionaries, in point of rank, between the bishop and the parish clergyman, but we assert that all such ought to be made as industrious and useful as either. Suppose that a bishop had even two assistants given him, selected, in a large degree, on account of their eloquence; and that, while one of the three, in rotation, remained at home to discharge his duties there, the other two went, separately, from parish to parish, through his diocese, to remain a few days in each place, for the purpose of preaching in it, visiting the parishioners, examining the interests of the Church, &c., it would yield vast advantage, particularly in giving to the Church what she so greatly needs—a real Laity.

It is of the first importance that a parish clergyman should resign his trust when he is incapacitated by infirmity or age for performing his duties efficiently; and in consequence, if a better distribution of Church property be made, it ought to supply a provision for him on his retirement.

The Church at present has no general government; she is, in essentials, without a head and without rulers. Saving imbecile resistance to the attacks of her enemies, the Ministry pays no regard to her collective interests, and the Clergy pay as little. Is she sinking, she may sink—is she ruined by neglect in one quarter and misconduct in another, she may be ruined; there is no one to stretch forth the arm to raise and to save. In this diocese the bishop is destroying her by indolence and inattention, in that he is doing it by the scandalous sacrifice of his duty to vicious politics; but he is despotic in the matter, and there is no remedy. In one parish the clergyman is depriving her of a laity by incapacity, and in another by gross immorality and negligence; but he has no master, and the state of things cannot be changed. Here she is nearly banished from a populous town by the want of places of worship, and there she is wellnigh expelled from a county by impotent curates and the lack of resident clergymen; but there is no one to take cognisance of it and apply correctives. As a whole, she is totally destitute, in both name and reality, of a government to watch over and promote her interests.

This must necessarily be just as destructive to her as it would be to any civil body. As a remedy, many people advise the restoring of the Convocation; but to this we who write, always have been, and still are, decidedly opposed; we have only to look at convocation-history, the divided state of the Clergy, and the feelings of the community, to be convinced that it would carry the ruin of the Church to completion. But while we are adverse to the forming of an Ecclesiastical Parliament, we are anxious for the creation of an efficient Church-government. We therefore propose that the Committee of which we have spoken should be invested with sufficient powers to form the latter. Let it regularly enquire into the state of every diocese and parish in the country; wherever it may find the Church feeble or declining, let it examine the causes, and build churches, change the ministers, or apply any other proper remedies. Place the conduct of the prelates, as well as that of the parochial clergy, under its cognisance. The perfection of civil government consists in subjecting the conduct of all functionaries, without excepting the highest, to jealous inspection and control; and that which is necessary touching a minister of state or a king, cannot be unnecessary touching a bishop or an archbishop.

In all this, we are advocating nothing that partakes of the nature of uncertain experiment. Every thing we recommend has been abundantly tried with triumphant success, not only amidst the dissenters, but in every department of civil life; we ask only for that which is found to be essential in every body, religious or civil, save the Church of England. If it were carried into effect, it would produce no sacrifice of property, no disorder, and no angry feelings. It would give the utmost satisfaction to the great body of the laity. We will add, we are advising no encroachments on the dissenters; we wish every thing to be done in the spirit of peace towards them. They have benefited the morals of the middle and lower classes to an incalculable extent, but the field here now is infinitely too wide for them to occupy. In large places, the mass of these classes, particularly of the lower ones, are literally sheep without a shepherd; they are excluded alike from the church and the chapel; they have neither a clergyman nor a dissenting minister to instruct them; and the Church might labour amidst them almost without a rival. She can have places of worship, and clergymen, as well calculated to gain them as those of the dissenters. If her present ministers be disqualified for it in many respects, it is her special duty to educate a certain number expressly for the purpose of sending them to labour amidst the humbler part of society in large places. She has abundant means for surpassing the dissenters in every thing.

Nevertheless, we see little to encourage hope. If we look at the Ministry, it is suspected, despised, incapable, and powerless; it can do nothing. If we look at the Prelates, they are grovelling at the feet of Ministers; nothing can they say or do which might give offence to their patrons and masters. Yet there are men among them, who ought to be found combating, with apostolic ardour and independence, for the cause of the Church and the Laity. There is a Bishop of Durham, who has risen from the lowest class of the clergy, and who was exalted to his present dignity—honoured for it be the mo-memory of the good Lord Liverpool!—for his merits. He has the talent and experience, and we might ask him, whether he could discharge his debt of gratitude to his deceased benefactor in a better way, than by endeavouring to give an efficient clergy, and prosperity, to the Church of England. If we look at the Whigs, they have justly covered themselves with the jealousy and hostility of the Church; they, moreover, can regard nothing but theory and party interests.

In our despair, may we turn to the King. When we remember, that through his family the Church of England has already once been saved—that to her it owes a debt of incalculable magnitude—that their interests are inseparable—and that the warmest affection has hitherto subsisted between them, is it too much to hope that she may be saved through it a second time? In the exercise of that liberty given us by the inestimable constitution under which we live, we will say, that the unhappy occurrences of the last reign give her peculiar claims on the present one; and that these claims reach his Majesty personally. The time has fully arrived for ascertaining how far the monarchy has been benefited by the wretched policy of humbling her; and whether, if she fall, it can be preserved. What we have recommended is admirably calculated for gracing a new reign; it ought, according to the constitution, to emanate from the crown, and it would be most beneficial in every respect for it to do so. We will therefore venture to trust that his Majesty will propose a commission for enquiring how far the government of the Church is capable of improvement, and magnanimously offer to make any surrender on his part which such improvement may call for. He could not confer a more signal benefit on his people. Let him not be misled touching the extent of the sacrifice we have placed before him. He is the head of the Navy; but are its commissions and appointments at the disposal of the Premier and Lord Chancellor? or are its general interests left without guardians? No. A body of men is formed expressly for the purpose of selecting its officers, managing its other affairs, and watching over its weal. These men act in his name; but, under proper restrictions, they expend money, appoint to trusts, change or expel functionaries, make regulations, &c. at their discretion; they are really the heads of the Navy. The case is the same with the other departments of government. There is little practical difference, and none that militates against the just rights and interests of the crown, between this and what we have recommended touching a committee for conducting the affairs of the Church. Can any reason be assigned why the interests of the Church cannot be managed by a board, in the same manner as those of the Navy are? No; not even on the score of prerogative. The King would really lose nothing by the change; he would merely transfer certain duties from one body of servants to another, and the loss of patronage to his Ministers would, on the whole, be a gain to them.

If any thing be attempted, we devoutly trust that it will be kept free from the spirit of party. If the Whigs intend to take up the affairs of the Church, we appeal to such men as Earl Grey, whether she has not already suffered sufficiently from being dragged into the filth and iniquity of party strife; and whether they can reap any benefit from mutilating her farther, and heaping on her still more unpopularity. We appeal to Mr Brougham with less confidence, but even he cannot be inaccessible to reason. If we have on various occasions spoken of him with asperity, his public conduct has been the sole cause. He has fought his battles in violation of all the laws of civilized warfare; because he has been unable to crush his opponents in any other manner, he has sought to crush the State; unable to reach office through the carnage of foes, he has laboured to do it through the demolition of public institutions and the destruction of the foundations of society; he voluntarily made the Aristocracy and the Church, the relations between superior and inferior, and the property and bread of the community, obstacles in his way; and then, because he has found them so, he has employed his artillery against them. A man who acts in this manner, will always, we trust, find us amidst his opponents. But if Mr Brougham will shake off that detestable spirit of party which hitherto has had such unexampled influence over him; and will, now that he has ample opportunity for doing so, seek to win office by honestly employing his magnificent powers for the good of the empire; even our pen shall not be tardy in rendering him assistance. To the Whigs as a whole we say, Consult the prelates, prove that the benefit of the Church is your real object, and act throughout in the spirit of peace and patriotism, or meddle no more with the affairs of the Church. Her farther weakness will operate as fatally against you as against your opponents; and your renewed attacks on her will at once throw you back into the insignificance and scorn from which you are emerging.

But perhaps the perversion of all attempts to save the Church, by necessary reform, into matter of party strife, is the most to be feared from that party which professes to consist of her exclusive champions. We cannot forget that this party, in late years, has done her infinitely more injury than the worst of her open enemies; on every occasion when she has really needed support, it has deprived her of it, by dividing her friends against each other. It fought against her extension in Ireland, by means of Bible, School, and Reformation Societies; it opposed the Brunswick Clubs; it apologised for the apostacy of the Duke of Wellington and Sir R. Peel; it regularly exasperates the Dissenters to the utmost by wretched scurrility; and it as regularly foments the unhappy division which rages in the Church, by casting the same scurrility on what it calls the evangelical part of her members. On every emergency this party is found on the side of her most bitter foes, with this difference only, that it uses more certain and destructive weapons—that it makes the Church herself their ally. If it, as is but too certain, make such attempts as we have named, a reason for blowing the trumpet of discord, we trust the remembrance of the deadly mischief it has so often produced, will cause it to be disregarded.

THE DEMONIAIC : A POEM IN SEVEN CHAPTERS.

BY THOMAS AIRD.

CHAPTER I.

MIRIAM'S INTERVIEW WITH CHRIST.

I.

In the green month of Zif, afar, beneath a palm-tree sate,
In the wide plain of Jericho, a mother desolate.
Her lips were cover'd with her robe, and on her head she cast
The dust of earth. And over her the hours unheeded pass'd.
Forth from the neighbouring trees came Christ, and stood at Miriam's feet;
His face with peace and ardour blent, unutterably sweet.

II.

She raised her head, she saw him, knelt, clasp'd his knees fervently :—
“ Help me, great Man of Nazareth ! give back my son to me !
Take pity on a mother's loins, broken with weary pain !
Over the cloudy hills I go—I seek him still in vain !
Hope's but the liar and the lie : sleep flees from me : for food,
Thy handmaid oft is fain to pick harsh berries from the wood :

III.

“ My heart breaks : Tell me, where is he ? ”—“ Daughter of Judah, how Should I thy son know ? ”—“ I have seen thy might—a prophet thou !
And I have heard thee speak great things, like arrows dipp'd in gall,
Shot from a bow, against the proud ; have seen before them fall
The brows of haughty men : But aye, like honey-drops, distil
Thy words, the spirits of the grieved with healing balm to fill.

IV.

“ Tell me, where is my Herman wild ? At first, I staid at home,
Till it was cruel so to rest, whilst he was forced to roam.
At morn I look'd for him, from noon on to the twilight dim ;
And when in the uncertain light the evening shadows swin,
I shaped him thence : He came not—God from love has cast him forth ;
But he is dear to me, and I will hunt him o'er the earth.

V.

“ Hear me, thou Man of Nazareth ! O ! then thy handmaid bless !
Pride dares not in thy presence live : the tale of my distress
I hide not from thee. God had given, to glad my widowhood,
Two children fair exceedingly, but not more fair than good.
Peace to my Judith in the grave ! She died in her young days :
God took her to himself : and I bless'd the Almighty's ways.

VI.

“ And Herman yet was left to me, my hope ! my more than joy !
Bright as a mother's restless heart would fashion forth her boy !
With power, like an anointed child's, with glory his brow was clad ;
His cheek with virgin health : How bloom'd the beauty of his head !
His young eye was as when the sun shines in an eagle's eye ;
A life within a life was there, burnish'd, and bold, and shy.

VII.

“ And scarce the silky blossom of his yellow beard was seen,
When he the ancient forests traced with slings and arrows keen :
Heroic daring from each limb breathed : as the posting winds
Fleet, o'er the hills so high and bright he chased the dappled hinds.

Then with the men of Napthali, a lion-hunter bold,
He toss'd his golden head afar on their snowy mountains cold.

VIII.

" His boyhood with just joys enlarged, no guilt had spoilt, no fear;
Nor painted women lured his youth,—hence was his spirit clear.
And I had taught him the great acts of old embattled kings,
Champions, and sainted sages, priests, judges, all mighty things,
Till, from deep thought, his eye was like a prophet's burden'd eye:
And he was now a man indeed, built for a purpose high.

IX.

" God of my fathers! if my hopes in him presumptuous were,
From him to me the punishment, temper'd with love, transfer!
Help us, thou Man of God! Perhaps by hopeless passions bound
And render'd weak, the mastery a demon o'er him found:
Reason and duty all, all life, his being all became Subservience to the wild strange law that overbears his frame.

X.

" Dark as the blue piled thunderlofts then grew his forehead high;
And gleam'd like their vein'd lightnings, rash and passionate, his eye;
For he was sorely vex'd and fierce. Anon, in gentle fits,
Like idle hermit looking at the clouds, all day he sits.
At length he fled far from my care; he felt his life disgraced:
Pride took him to the wilderness—shame keeps him in the waste.

XI.

" Strong as the eagle's wings of quest, on aimless errands runs
The beauteous savage of my love; but still his mother shuns.
Along the dizzy hills that reel up in the cloudy rack,
O'er tumbling chasms, by desert wells, he speeds his boundless track;
And in the dead hours of the night, when happier children lie
In slumber seal'd, he journeys far the flowing rivers by.

XII.

" And oft he haunts the sepulchres, where the thin shoals of ghosts
Flit shivering from Death's chilling dews: to their unbodied hosts,
That churn through night their feeble plaint, he yells: At the red morn
Meets the great armies of the winds, high o'er the mountains borne,
Leaping against their viewless rage, tossing his arms on high,
And hanging balanced o'er sheer steeps against the morning sky.

XIII.

" His food from honey of the rocks and old cleft trees is drawn,
From wild-fowl caught in weedy pools by the raw light of dawn,
From berries, all spontaneous fruits. In winter, in the caves
Of hills he sleeps: the summer tree above his slumber waves:
Nature's wild commoner, my child! On the bleak autumn eves,
When small birds shriek adown the wind, he lies among the leaves.

XIV.

" By day the sun, the frost by night, weariness, want, and pain,
Sorely his young eyes must have spoilt; and dried his wasted brain.
Gone are his youth's fine hopes: And mine, what are they? My poor child, Sweet Patience for thy minister, go with thee to the wild!
What shalt thou do when sickness comes? How much it grieveth me,
That from thy mother's love thou shouldst, as from an enemy, flee!

XV.

" For him these chasten'd bones of mine have stood the winter's shock.
I've crept to reach him as he sate on the bald top of the rock;

When summer has enlarged the year upon the pleasant mountains,
I've seen him sit long hours afar beside their spangled fountains;
But the coy lightning of his eye sleeps not: My art is vain:
Swift as a roe-buck he is gone; and I must weep again.

XVI.

"Charmers, exorcists of old skill, wizards that muttering go,
All that deal subtly, I have tried: I add but sin to woe.
The Expiation-feast I've kept. I've pray'd by many a tomb
Of prophets, fervid men of old, that God would change his doom;—
All's vain! No, no, it shall not be; for I will track the earth, Reach—hold him with strong bands of love—and drive the demon forth!"

XVII.

A cry rung in the distant woods: And Miriam rose and ran;
But turn'd, came back, knelt, kiss'd the robe of that mild holy Man,—
For anxious hope is dutiful. With beating heart again
She turn'd away, ere Jesus spake, and sought the woody plain:
And through the rustling alleys, through the wild glades, one by one,
She wander'd half the summer day, but could not see her son.

CHAPTER II.

MIRIAM'S INTERVIEW WITH HER SON, HERMAN THE DEMONIC.

I.

ON Jordan's banks, beneath a tree, then Miriam sate and wept.
She heard a groan: A man from out the shrubs before her crept:
And, like the Serpent damn'd of God—as if to crush the worm
Of hunger that within him gnaw'd, and ground his writhing form—
He trail'd his belly in the dust: his eye, that keenly burn'd
With famine's purging fire, to her—his mother—was upturn'd.

II.

"Bread! bread! Oh bread!" feebly he cried. Her little store she took,
Stoop'd, gave it to his trembling clutch; brought water from the brook
In hollow leaves; stood, gazed on him with patience strange; then she Sate, gently drew his yellow head, and laid it on her knee:
With kiss long as an exile's kiss, she clung unto him there;
Bedew'd his cheek with silent tears, and wiped them with her hair.

III.

He slept, like an o'erwearied babe. She held her sobbing breast,
To stir him not; and hid his eyes, that he might longer rest;
Arranged his far-descending locks, dishonour'd with the dust.
And long and calmly did he sleep beneath her sacred trust.
At length he started with a groan, he knelt upon his knee:—
"Thou mother! why hast thou not sought Jesus the Christ for me?"

IV.

"Ha! this is harsh: O! pardon me! I know thy love, well tried,
Has me by the tall forests sought, and by the pastures wide,
Rocks, and dim sepulchres: dear one! O! think me not unkind;
The fiend has kept me from you so, wild as the wintry wind:
He takes me far, he brings me near: athwart your path I fleet;
But never in the green or dry wilderness you must meet.

V.

"Blest are the dead! What though their face no more beholds the sun,
Though fill'd with barren ashes be the breast of each loved one,
With dusty motes confused and dull the jewel of the eye;
Yet are they gone, and are at rest: how peacefully they lie!

Whilst I—would I were dead, smit through with blue plagues, each sore ill,
And not a wretched vessel fill'd with an infernal will!

VI.

"I am thy quarry of the wild! my faithful huntress thou!
And thinkst thou not thy toils for me my spirit down must bow?
The fiend will come again; leave me ere I leave thee: Away!
Spend not thy sweet limbs; so shall I less truly be thy prey."—
"Speak not to me; I will not go: thinkst thou thy youth's first prime Was half so dear to me as thou, now old before thy time?"

VII.

"But come with me: fear not; 'tis past: we'll hear soft waters flow;
The stock-dove in the twilight woods shall soothe us as we go,
Which aye so well thou lovedst to hear; the stars, that softly burn
O'er the green pasture-hills, shall light our homeward glad return;
And then the holy moon will rise, and lead us all the way,
And the very God of peace and love will guard our home for aye!"

VIII.

"Ha! this is vain: why art thou here? haste, there is but one hope:
The Man of Nazareth alone can with the demon cope:
Man? Nay—the Son of God; for oft have I, in midnight hours,
Heard in Engaddi's howling caves whisperings of the Dark Powers Speak of Messiah, and declare Jesus the same to be:
And, from some great event at hand, this pause is given to me."

IX.

"To-day—O! had I him constrain'd! With my own thoughts oppress'd, Even I can see him more than man: From house to house distress'd
He breathes his noiseless peace: by shores of lakes, on the dim hills,
He teaches men: the lazarus-house his beaming presence stills:
A new spirit whispers through the woods of him to me at eve:
All nature seems with conscious hopes of some great change to heave."

X.

"Lord God! the fiend! hark!" Herman cried. "He left me here at noon, Hungry and sick among the brakes; and comes he then so soon?"
Up from the shores of the Dead Sea came a dull booming sound:
The leaves shook on the trees: thin winds went wailing all around.
Then laughter shook the sullen air. To reach his mother's hand,
The young man grasp'd, but back was thrown convulsed upon the sand.

XI.

No time was there for Miriam's love. He rose; a smother'd gleam
Was on his brow; with fierce motes roll'd his eye's distemper'd beam.
He smiled—'twas as the lightning of a hope about to die
The last time from the furrow'd brows of Hell's eternity.
Like sun-warm'd snakes, rose on his head a storm of golden hair,
Tangled: And thus on Miriam fell hot breathings of despair:—

XII.

"Perish the breasts that gave me milk! yea, in thy mouldering heart,
Good thrifty roots I'll plant, to stay, next time, my hunger's smart:
Red-vein'd derived apples I shall eat with savage haste,
And see thy life-blood blushing through, and glory in the taste!"—
"Peace!" Miriam cried; "thou bitter fiend! 'tis thou, and not my son, That speaks. Demon accursed! I know, I scorn thee, thou dark One!"

XIII.

"Glory beyond thy power, dark One! Him in the end of days—
My son redeem'd from thee—to Heaven my father's God will raise;

Whilst thou—ha! outcast from that God!—forth shalt be driven to dwell
With horned flames and Blasphemy, in the red range of Hell:
There prey the old Cares; the Furies there whirl their salt whips for aye,
And faces faded in the fire look upward with dismay.

XIV.

"And sighs are there, and doleful cries, and tongues with anguish dumb;
And through that glaring fierce abyss of years, no hope can come.—
Fiend! leave my child—God's child!—Avaunt! down to thy chambers blue
Of sulphur go! the palaces of Sodom yawn for you."—
"Amen, Amen, Amen!" the fiend with yelling laughter cried;
And like an arrow from the bow, her Herman left her side.

XV.

"Stay!" she exclaim'd; "hear me, my son; I spake not thus to you!"
Swift o'er the desert shore he ran; she hasted to pursue:
Crushing the salt-surf samphire weeds, and many a crusted cake
Of salt, stumbling o'er pits, she went: she saw Gomorrah's lake:
She saw her son plunge in the waves; but fast-descending night,
Mingled with storms, fell on the deep, and hid him from her sight.

XVI.

And she by the dark waters of great confusion stood;
Call'd on her son, pray'd to her God, to save him from the flood.
She beat her breast, she cursed her tongue which to the demon gave Suggestion thus to drown her boy. She met the lashing wave;
And, bending forward, listen'd in each pause of the storm's sweep,
And thought she heard her Herman cry for help from out the deep.

XVII.

Then how!d the wind its wildest staves: she turn'd, intensely gazed,
And seem'd to see his arms above the flashing waters raised.
She felt at length that she was mock'd: Along the barren shore
Far did she wander, and sate down when she could go no more.
The storm was now o'erblown; the moon rose o'er the lulled sea.
She look'd behind her—murky crags rose beetling awfully.

XVIII.

Strange heads came stretching from the clefts of people shelter'd there,— Wild tenants of the rock, waked by the cries of her despair,
Or by the tempest roused: With threats, they bade her thence be gone,
Nor vex their drowsy caves of night with her untimely moan.
"What creature of the shore art thou?" they cried. "Thee hence betake!
A woman? And hast dared to meet the storm-blast of the Lake?"

XIX.

"To hear the smother'd voices rack the Sodomitish sea,
Of Spirits pent in the whelm'd rooms? Whence may thy sorrows be?
Seek'st thou the apples fair and false?" Thence, back did Miriam run,
Less from her dread of violence, than haste to seek her son.
She sought till dawn; but found him not: Homeward she turn'd her then;
And as she went, sobbing, she cried, "God help the poor drown'd men!"

CHAPTER III.

MIRIAM FOLLOWS HERMAN TO THE SEPULCHRES.

I.

DEEP in the hollow night, a voice to Miriam's slumbering ear
Seem'd thus to say, "Sleep'st thou, when I can sleep not, mother dear?"
She started—listen'd—all was still:—" 'Tis but a dream's wild freak;
These haggard fancies vex me so, since grief has made me weak!"

Yet, yet in that dark hour of storms, from out the wa'ry waste, Unseen by me, he might have come." She rose with trembling haste ;

II.

Quickly attired, she look'd abroad : The clouds away were gone ;
Blue ether, as if newly wash'd, with dewy gleams far shone ;
The stars were very lustrous ; and in the abyss of night
The moon was set, severely pure, a well of living light.
Deep peace lay in the shadowy vales : the solemn woods were still :
And nought was heard, save oft the bark of wild fox on the hill.

III.

Again upon her bed she lay, sleep hover'd o'er her eyes ;
Again unto her lattice came that voice, and call'd her twice.
" 'Tis but the tempter-fiend ! " she cried : She wept ; call'd on her God ;
Yet still from hope and changeless love again she look'd abroad ;
She heard a cry—she knew that voice ! with beating heart she ran,
And follow'd through the glimmering trees the figure of a man.

IV.

His form was hid : " Heaven help," she cried, " a mother's weary side !
No farther can I go ! " Again his shadow she espied ;
And fast forgot her weariness ; half wish'd to have the speed
Of demons too, to overtake—it is her son indeed !
But now she came unto the place of the white sepulchres ;
And paused—shall she pursue him there ? Deep fear her bosom stirs.

V.

For deepening clouds came o'er the moon : darkness fell all around ;
A shuddering wind grieved in the trees, skirting the charnel ground.
Then birds obscene clamour'd : and yells as from lean hounds of blood, Mix'd with careering laughter rose : choked shrieks as from the flood ;
And gallowing cries, like grappled fiends' clinch'd with the last despair,
And hurried through Hell's fire-wrought gates, thicken'd the midnight air.

VI.

And Miriam saw white wispy fires dance, warp'd with vapours close,
Like exhalations kindled from the rotten churchyard gross.
She fear'd the vex'd fiend, fear'd the ghosts of milky babes to brave,
And fretted age that cannot rest within the wormy grave.
Yet there she heard oft Herman's voice : and morning soon shall rise :
Beneath a tree she sat to watch ; but sleep o'ertook her eyes.

CHAPTER IV.

HERMAN'S SICKNESS.

I.

'Twas now the time, when stepping down from her ethereal bowers,
The touch of Spring's dew-sandall'd feet kindles the earth with flowers.
Fair rose the morn on Judah's hills. And Miriam waked : a band
Of earnest men drew nigh ; there Christ led Herman by the hand.
" Woman, thy son's restored to thee," the blessed Jesus said ;
And with a shriek of joy she clasp'd, she kiss'd, her Herman's head !

II.

And he, too, wept, like one in whom pride is o'er-master'd last.
Meanwhile, with modesty divine, Jesus away had pass'd.
Then Miriam took her Herman's hand, and led him to her home.
Quiet days pass'd : he lived like one by some strange blight o'ercome :
Day was to him as night's ghost : with austere serenity
He bow'd his doom'd head, and prepared himself quickly to die.

III.

His spirit pined, his days declined. His mother watch'd the while
 With silent grief, as if herself and him she could beguile :
 From morn to night watch'd : if he sigh'd, she rose at midnight oft,
 Stoop'd o'er his head, and touch'd his cheek with hers so kind and soft :
 And brought him food, true as the bird, that plies its little quest
 Around the hedges all day long, to still its yearning nest.

CHAPTER V.

HERMAN'S BLESSING.

I.

'Twas now the golden autumn-tide. Herman lay on his bed :
 Through a small lattice on his face the yellow light was shed :—
 "Is it the matin hour, mother?"—for she was near at hand.
 "No, my dear boy; the setting sun shines sweetly o'er our land :
 With songs unto the fountains go the maids in a long train ;
 Why loiterest thou, dear idle one ? Up, list to them again.

II.

"Loved wert thou by them all.—I see th' illumined hills of oak ;
 Valleys, where bow the cumber'd trees 'neath autumn's mellow yoke ;
 The glitt'ring streams ; the upstay'd heavens of glory o'er our head.
 The barley-harvest days are come,—I see the reapers spread.
 Be up, my boy ! be up, fair boy ! and make thy mother glad :
 Sure health is dawning on thy face ; and we shall ne'er be sad."

III.

He raised his head with fearful haste ; but drooping nature fail'd :
 Feebly he groan'd. Yet, yet with might his filial heart prevail'd ;
 Again he rose ; he took her hand ;—"Eternal God above,
 Keep this tried mother when I die, and recompense her love !
 Her very love has almost been my cursing minister,
 So solemn has it made my life, so full of cares for her.

IV.

"Keen as the wild wolf's following o'er the glazed wintry waste,
 Biting the blast, whetting his fangs, upon the prey to haste,
 She hunted my distemper'd life—her heart could ne'er stand still !—
 Even where the sun unseals the snows, high on the perilous hill.
 Of whom but thee ? of none but thee, thou mother, dearest, best !
 Speak I : Beneath thy weight of love my spirit lies oppress'd.

V.

"I die from thee : I soon must go : my days are a swift stream :
 Thy fond hopes must be shatter'd like the frailty of a dream.
 Yet fear not ; He that heal'd thy son, shall soothe thee o'er my dust ;
 And thou shalt raise thy forehead crown'd with an immortal trust ;
 And, with salvation beautified, to thee it shall be given
 To walk, with the redeem'd on high, the starry floor of Heaven.

VI.

"What shall I say, that when I die my mother may not weep ?
 My blood, my life, would I could frame into one blessing deep !
 Spring, and dew-dropping heaven, each star of goodliest influence,
 Trees weeping balms, all precious things—O ! I would not go hence,
 If I could bless thee with all things ! Hear me yet—"
 "Nay ; cease, cease !
 I love thee so ! I love thee so ! I cannot be at peace !

VII.

"But to the Holy City I this night, this hour, will haste :
 Jesus is there: mercy I'll have." Beside his bed she placed Food—would not hear his kind reproof—hasted away—paused—turn'd—
 Again bent o'er him, and with love unutterable burn'd—
 Pray'd leave to go—staid not to hear denial or assent :
 And all the night led by the moon, wide o'er the hills she went.

CHAPTER VI.

MIRIAM AT THE HILL OF CALVARY.

I.

At dawn she reach'd Jerusalem. But Jesus was not there ;
 For he was gone to Galilee : She turn'd with mute despair ;
 With weary limbs retraced her path. Months slowly roll'd away ;
 Yet Herman lived, passing through each gradation of decay.
 Then Miriam was assured that Christ was in Jerusalem,
 And through the silent night again she went in quest of him.

II.

The morn arose. And Miriam heard the sound of camel bells.
 Another step—before her far a whiten'd valley swells :
 For from wide lands, and distant isles, the Passover could still Bring up the scatter'd tribes of God unto his holy hill :
 With tents the gorgeous vale was fill'd ; but all deserted stood,
 Save that some slaves went here and there to give the camels food.

III.

To Miriam's question they replied that men were gone to see
 A strange impostor crucified with thieves on Calvary.
 Then went she on until she saw, above the city fair,
 The Temple like a snowy mount far up in the clear air.
 Around its upward-circling courts, she saw the forms of men,
 That bending westward look'd as if some distant thing to ken.

IV.

Still was the sky. At once on them a mighty whirlwind fell,
 And toss'd their garments seen afar ; and brought with many a swell
 The city's din tumultuous. A blind and smothering fear
 On Miriam came ; with breathless haste she to the gates drew near,
 Pass'd through the hurrying streets, and gain'd the foot of Calvary.
 She turn'd—a pomp processional, and shouting crowds, were nigh.

V.

She saw—blind to all else, she saw Him whom she came to seek,
 Bearing his cross : and thorns were crush'd around that brow so meek !
 Immortal anguish held his face ; yet temper'd with a look
 That seem'd prepared, no shame, no pain, from mortal man to brook ;
 Ready to burst all bands, to flash, put indignation on,
 To shake—to thunder-strike—to quell his foes as from a throne.

VI.

This was his majesty. Yet still patience his aspect bound.
 How can she ask, in such an hour, his help ? He turn'd half round ;
 She felt that he read all her heart, when on her face was stay'd
 That eye, like an abyss of love : With clasped hands she pray'd, Mute lips, eyes veil'd with reverent hope. He turn'd from her again
 Yet left her to believe, with joy, her prayer had not been vain.

VII.

How can she selfish be ? How dare she leave that hill ? She burn'd
With holy gratitude to Christ : Upward she slowly turn'd ;
She saw the throngs go closing up ; the winding pomp before
A lustre all unnatural upon its ensigns bore,
Beneath a burning sun that smote the summit of the hill.
An ominous cloud, behind, o'erhung the City dark and still.

VIII.

Softly she join'd a company of women. And they stood Afar, and oft with quick short look the glancing summit view'd.
They pass'd not what was done,—from this the greater was their fear.
Mute, with white lips, forward they bent as if some shriek to hear.
Horror on Miriam fell : she thought of Herman, and was glad
That in his sickness a just cause to haste away she had.

IX.

She went ; yet oft look'd back : She saw th' uplifted cross at last,
And shriek'd, and faster went till she the gates of Zion pass'd.
She pass'd the silent vale of tents, the camels grazing wide ;
The glittering streams shone in the sun, and shone the mountain side ;
A forest near, when she its first outstanding trees had won,
A horror of great darkness fell : the quenched day was done.

X.

She went into the night-lock'd wood. Silence reign'd, like th' old sleep
That watch'd life's gates, ere God call'd up Being from the hoar deep.
Then a sound shook the mountain bars, as when some fallen pile
Of ages sends a dull far voice o'er sea and sounding isle.
Without a breath the forest shook ; and then the earth was rock'd ;
And trees fell crashing all around ; and birds of night were shock'd

XI.

From out their rifted nests : screaming, with helpless wings they beat
The ground, and came and fiercely peck'd, fluttering o'er Miriam's feet.
Steps, as if shod with thunder, ran. Through the infested wood,
Slowly had Miriam groped her way, and in its skirts she stood,
When all at once burst forth the day from out the folds of night ;
And with rebounding glory flash'd along the heavens of light.

XII.

Wedges of terror clove her heart : stumbling she hasted on
With dazzled eyes, she reach'd her home—her Herman's life was gone !
Reeling she turn'd—rush'd blindly forth—wildly her sorrow burst—
Back to her couch she flew—she kiss'd his dead lips : then she cursed
Her journey, cursed that darkness strange, and beat her breast, and cried, “ Had I not gone—had I been here, my Herman had not died ! ”

CHAPTER VII.

MIRIAM'S INTERVIEW WITH HER SAINTED DAUGHTER, JUDITH.

I.

The “ bread of men,”* and “ cup”† were o'er, the minstrels‡ forth were gone ;
And in the middle watch of night sate Miriam all alone,
Sleepless, in silent sorrow rock'd, with fixed gaze intense
On him dress'd for the grave, her last, still dear, inheritance.

* Ezekiel, xxiv. 17.

† Jeremiah, xxvi. 7.

‡ Matthew, ix. 23.

"Peace!" said a voice, like the far-off whisper of a soft wave;
She started, turn'd, she saw—"My child! my Judith from the grave!"

II.

With lips apart, with heaving heart, gazed Miriam on a form,
Lovely beyond the power of death, the grave's polluting worm.
A lucid air enswathed her head. How excellent are they,
Dear God, thy ransom'd ones! On her consummate forehead lay
The moonlight of eternal peace, solemn and very sweet.
A snowy vesture beautiful came flowing o'er her feet.

III.

"I see! I do! methinks I see my dear immortal child!
Come near me, God-given! Be not these the garments undefiled?
Those eyes, the spirit's sainted wells, o'erflowing still with love,
I know them! Ever look on me, my own celestial dove!
Art thou not come to take me hence, the awful worlds to see?
I long to go—I long to go, to dwell in Heaven with thee!

IV.

"Ah! no, 'tis but a dream!"—"Fear not, for I am ever thine!"
With beautiful tranquillity, with majesty divine,
Forth stepp'd th' unblemish'd Child of Life, and with a meek embrace, Folded her mother's crowding heart, and kiss'd her breathing face:—
"Fear not: trust thou in Christ, who died this day mankind to save,
By whose dear leave I come to thee, redeem'd from out the grave.

V.

"Many have been, greatly beloved! thy days of trial sore,
Bereavement, grief, wanderings, and pain; but these shall soon be o'er:
And loss, woe, weariness, all pain, each want, each earthly load,
Work the strange fiercely-linked chain that draws earth up to God.
But look to Christ, th' assured One, and thou for aye shalt stand
In the Lord's palaces of Life, in th' uncorrupted land.

VI.

O! it is well with me, mother! No sin is there, no night;
There be the bliss-enamell'd flowers bathed with the showers of light;
Rivers of crystal, shaded with the nations' healing trees,
Whose fadeless leaves, life-spungled, shake in the eternal breeze;
The shining, shining multitudes; the angels' burning tiers;
And there God's face ineffable lights the perpetual years!"

VII.

"Speak of thy father, holy Babe! my youth's spouse, where is he?
Thy brother—he has left me too—O! are they saved like thee?
Then with great joy would I rejoice, and calmly wait the time
To join you all in Heaven. But speak, child of th' unfailing prime!
Thy mother's yet on earth—how lone? Shall they not also rise,
And come this night anew to bless these old o'erwearied eyes?"

VIII.

"Fear not: rest thou in hope and peace. To thee, on earth below,
More of the Spirits' hidden world 'tis not allow'd to know.
Now let me see my brother's face; night's mid watch passes fleet,
And in the Holy City I the risen saints must meet,
To pass with them into the Heavens." Silent, with trembling hands, Miriam from Herman's face slowly undid the linen bands:—

IX.

"Judith, draw near and see his face; upon thy brother look."
And she drew near. Her glistering stole one moment ruffled shook;

Like light in tremulous water gleam'd her eyes divine, as they Gazed on young Herman's face as he in his bloodless beauty lay.
 With earth's dear frailty temper'd still—Heaven's great and perfect years
 Not yet attain'd—her eyes' sweet cups ran o'er with silver tears.

X.

She parted on his lofty brow his locks of yellow hair ;
 She kiss'd his forehead and his lips ; then with a sister's care,
 Around his imaged face serene, the grave's white folds she tied ;
 She took her mother by the hand, and led her from his side ;
 Then stood th' ethereal creature clothed with waveless peace :—" Thy leave, Sweet mother, let me go ; and say, dear one ! thou wilt not grieve."

XI.

" I shall not grieve ; I will not grieve. But come, through the dark woods
 Thy mortal mother shall thee guide, and o'er the crossing floods.
 O ! I am greatly glad for thee, my young lamb of the fold !
 Come near, and let me lead thee thus : thy mother gently hold !
 For thou art wash'd in our Christ's blood ! For thou art passing fair !
 The very Spirit of God's Heavens has breathed upon thy hair !

XII.

" Now let me guide thee forth. Nay, nay, the thought is foolish all,
 That thou canst wandering err, that aught of ill can thee befall.
 Young dweller of the Heavens ! mine own ! the angels pure that be,
 Primæval creatures of God's hand, in light excel not thee !
 Those vivid eyes can look through night ! No monster of the wild,
 Demon, or bandit of the cave, dares harm my sealed child !

XIII.

" In dazzling globes those angels wait, to bear thee with swift might,
 O'er the bow'd tops of tufted woods to Zion's holy height.
 Go then—Ah ! thou must go indeed !" She smiled—she turn'd to go ;
 But Miriam caught her shining skirts with a mother's parting woe,
 And knelt, and clasp'd her hands : Then turn'd the daughter of the skies,
 Raised—led the mourner to a couch, and breathed upon her eyes.

XIV.

Deep sleep on Miriam fell. With face meek as the moon of night,
 Far down in waveless water seen, a sleeping pearl of light,
 A moment gazed that child on her ; then brightening went. At morn,
 With hope through sorrow, Miriam saw to dust her Herman borne.
 Her faith was perfect now in Him whose blood for men had flow'd.
 Calm shone her evening life, and set in the bosom of her God.

END OF THE DEMONIC.

OPENING OF THE LIVERPOOL AND MANCHESTER RAILROAD.

THE papers have amply done their duty in detailing minutely the various proceedings of that ever-memorable day, the 15th of September, the opening of the railroad,—a day, I will venture to say, speaking numerically, which has made a greater impression upon a local population than any other within memory of man. But still, as every individual who was present to witness that extraordinary exhibition, had his own little private catalogue of observations, perhaps a few “epæa pteroenta” written “currente calamo,” of one amongst the multitudinous eye-witnesses, may prove acceptable; winged words, written with running pens, are, in truth, the best adapted to the temper of the times, when the heads of thousands are in a whirl; when time and space are fast hiding their diminished heads, and universal ubiquity, by universal suffrage, is announced to be the order of the day.

Happy he who could find a lodging of any kind in the town of Liverpool; but whether on beds of board, or beds of down, or beds of roses, I doubt much whether on that night any of the morrow’s favoured spectators indulged in their average quantum of sleep. There was a feverish conspiracy of pleasure, of curiosity, and perhaps, beyond what many chose to express or encourage, of solemn forebodings, of secret presentiments, of those qualms and misgivings of all sorts and sizes, which are wont to haunt timid minds when placed in situations to which they are unused. “I would give the world for a seat in the locomotives,” said one; “I would not venture the sole of my foot in them, as I value my life,” said another; such was the antipodal extent and scale of opinion. About four o’clock in the morning our slumbers were disturbed by a bleak autumnal whistling of wind, accompanied with driving showers pattering against the window. The sky looked dismally lowering, and the scud, as it flew by, gave but poor hope of the goodly day so ardently wished for. The rain did, however, cease; and the scud melting away disclosed patches of blue sky, gradually enlarging; in which the best of omens appeared, in the form of some ten or a dozen swallows soaring in the air. In short, by seven o’clock, all were up, and all in spirits, literally speaking, basking in the full sunshine of hope, as its rays glanced upon the early breakfast-table. — Proceeding towards the scene of action, the whole country seemed alive; every lane was filled; every field was sprinkled with multitudes in their best and brightest apparel; some moving to the right, some to the left, crossing each other, as a seaman would say, on different tacks; but all nevertheless in motion for the same end; each hastening to take his station in the point selected in his judgment as the best, to witness the opening of the railroad. On reaching the more immediate suburbs of Liverpool, the plot began to thicken tenfold; avenues of approach were partially blocked up; streets assumed a choking inaccessible aspect; while roofs, ridges, and pinnacles, wherever they commanded a view of the line of operation, were thickly studded with spectators, often in the most perilous situations. Near the entrance of the great tunnel, two lofty insulated chimneys, in the form of beautifully proportioned columns, had been erected, for the steam engines destined to draw waggons up the long inclined plane, undermining the whole length of the town. From the orifice of these spiry shafts, about half-a-dozen gallant fellows thrust their figures, having, by perseveringly burrowing their way through the draft bore, fully entitled themselves to unquestionably the very best seat that could be imagined. Not far from these chimneys stood a windmill, in which, as all labour was suspended, the sails were furled, and the machinery at rest, and from the radiating lattice-work one individual, whose head must have been hard and immovable as Memnon’s, had very coolly laid himself out; and there, with folded arms, in perfect composure, sat through the morning on the narrow ledge of one of the skeleton arms, where a squirrel might have been excused for manifesting nervous symptoms, looking down from his airy seat on the busy world below, with as little apprehension as a jackdaw on the weathercock of a cathedral. After shewing our tickets, the scene was changed. In a sort of area, surrounded by offices and high walls, were drawn up two ranges of carriages of every shape and quality, from the gorgeous car of triumph, decorated with gold and crimson, to plain homely unadorned butter-and-egg sort of market carts—much the kind of collection that might be made from a compound of the Lord Mayor's show and Epsom races. Here was just such a procession, as my readers may recollect on old Chinese screens, smart figures, gay dresses, musicians, wheeled carriages, all jostled together, with the characteristic ornaments (after the Chinese fashion) of a profusion of little flags, red, blue, brown, yellow, and green, all flapping and fluttering in the wind. All the world seemed collected in the same spot; not only nine-tenths of those I knew in the neighbouring counties were there, but three-fourths, at least, of my whole circle of friends, from Peking, westward to the Pacific. Nay more, some few persons crossed me whom I had long ceased to consider as tenants of this world; but there they were, all alive, with happy, smiling, merry looks, like every body else about them. The ill-humoured had, for the time being, put their ill-humour into their pockets; the frightened lost sight of their fears; the fretful had neither time nor inclination to be peevish. It was like the jubilee of the Jews, when all grievances were forgotten; enmities and heart-burnings evaporated like smoke, and the very Quakers, throwing aside their gravity, looked as gay as larks, and joined in the general joyousness.

This was our state. Alas! who could have surmised, at such a moment, that within the short space of another hour, this all-pervading joy should be exchanged for one pervading gloom—under a solemn lesson of man's mortality, and the frail tenure upon which his existence is held.

All had, at length, taken their seats, all, like the Gilpin family, "agog to dash through thick and thin," when the main-spring of the day's work, the Duke of Wellington, was announced, walking down the vacant space between the carriages; his keen penetrating eye seemed, at the same identical moment, to recognise every individual, while, with a hearty laugh of surprise, he testified his satisfaction at the strange situation in which he, like the rest of the world, found himself so suddenly placed. To every carriage, or set of carriages, a trumpeter was appointed; in addition to which, a full military band was stationed at the head of the procession. On his entrance, each performer, in succession, burst into action, with lungs inflated and cheeks ready to crack, as he caught sight of the Great Captain of the age. Accordingly, by the time the foremost had well established himself in his part, the next had taken up the wondrous note, and so on through the line, till bar, time, and tune, were inextricably intermingled; all, however, having one and the same object in view, viz. to give full effect to "See the Conquering Hero Comes!" In the midst of this din of harmony, a gun was fired within a few yards; at the sound of which, as its smoke curled above the walls, the leading carriages were slowly launched away, each set following at short intervals, till the whole, gliding from the area, entered the smaller tunnel, with a low rumbling sound, as the iron wheels revolved on their iron beds. This minor tunnel, of 100 yards or thereabouts, in length, was, whether accidentally or intentionally, (for the sake of effect,) I know not, almost dark; the little light, at least, there was, not being more than sufficient to make the darkness visible. If intentional, nothing could have been devised in better taste, giving double effect to the scene that awaited our emerging into broad daylight—a scene which few, if any, can ever hope to see equalled. The deep valley, cut out of the precipitous solid bank of rock, into which the two tunnels opened, was commanded by positions, from whence, I am sure I speak within compass, above twenty thousand eyes riveted upon one procession, now assembled, for the first time, on the true line of railway; preparing for actual flight, as fast as eight fine engines could be harnessed; all emitting columns of vapour, all steaming, puffing, and blowing, as if every boiler and bar within or about them, would burst, or rive asunder. All ready! The signal was repeated, and away we flew, amidst clouds of steam, while the rocks re-echoed with the deafening shouts of the myriads above and about us. I have said before that the papers have told all that can be told of sundry particulars, which it would be unnecessary again to notice. But no words of theirs or mine can convey an adequate notion of the magnificence (I cannot use a smaller word) of our progress. At first it was comparatively slow; but soon we felt that we were indeed going, and then it was that every person to whom the conveyance was new, must have been sensible that the adaptation of locomotive power was establishing a fresh era in the state of society; the final results of which it is impossible to contemplate. On looking over the side, the earth, with its iron stripes on which we shot along, seemed like a vast riband unrolling itself rapidly as we went. At one maximum of speed, the pebbles scarcely caught the eye; before the sight was fairly fixed upon them, they were far away and lost in the rear. The shouts of joy which greeted those in front, fell in their full gladness on us, who rapidly filled up the intervening space; while those which hailed us as we passed, were destined to be the compliment to others, who in another instant occupied our place. At times it was difficult to recognise or distinguish the countenances of the long continuous lines of spectators, as they seemed to glide away, like painted figures swiftly drawn through the tubes of a magic lantern. One engine (for what reason I could not exactly ascertain, unless left free to exhibit its unfettered powers) was placed on the corresponding parallel line of railway, so that, without interruption, it could move to and fro at pleasure. When we were at full speed, its coming was announced; far behind, I saw it as a speck in the distance, but rapidly increasing in size, it became, if I may use the expression, in a few seconds, largely visible, and shot by us, as though we were jogging on quietly in a farmer's market cart. In a trice, having reached the head of the column, it retrograded, and then exhibited what may be termed a frightful display of velocity, compounded not as before, when overtaking us, of our velocity to be deducted, but to be added. There was a loud whiz and a rattling of wheels; I could scarcely discern its form, as it bore down as if to crush all before it—a glance was all—it came and was gone—with a comparative speed (taking ours at twenty, and its own at about double) of nearly sixty miles an hour!

In the rapid movement of these engines, there is an optical deception worth noticing. A spectator observing their approach, when at extreme speed, can scarcely divest himself of the idea, that they are not enlarging and increasing in size rather than moving. I know not how to explain my meaning better, than by referring to the enlargement of objects in a phantasmagoria. At first the image is barely discernible, but as it advances from the focal point, it seems to increase beyond all limit. Thus an engine, as it draws near, appears to become rapidly magnified, and as if it would fill up the entire space between the banks, and absorb every thing within its vortex.

Hitherto all had gone on to admiration, when a trifling accident occurred, rather of a satisfactory nature than otherwise, inasmuch as it proved that, what might theoretically be considered perilous, may, practically speaking, be of no consequence whatever. One of our engine wheels, how I know not, contrived to bolt from the course—in plain words, it escaped from the rail, and ploughed along upon the clay, with no other inconvenience than an increase of friction, which damped our speed, and with the additional application of the break, soon brought us to an anchor. The engine, however, behind us, not being aware of our mishap, came pelting on at a smart pace, without receiving its signal for checking motion in time. Accordingly, those on the look-out hastily called on their fellow-passengers to be on their guard, and prepare for a jolt, which took place with a crash upon our rear, sufficiently loud and forcible to give an idea of what would happen, if by any strange chance it had charged us with the unrestrained impetuosity of its powers.

It is not necessary to describe how we were hailed in our progress with the enthusiastic cheers of wondering multitudes, rather let me mention the one exception. In passing by a dense mass of people, I observed, a few hundred yards distant from the road, a solitary being pursuing his daily work with as much indifference to what was going on as if he had been Robinson Crusoe on his desert island. He was in a field of oats; and there, with measured step, he slowly and leisurely followed the stroke of his scythe without a moment's pause; the broad flap of his hat was slouched over his face, and neither head was raised, nor eye turned upward, to cast a single look upon the helter-skelter party flying by him on the wings of the wind. He continued his work with a dogged indifference and imperturbability, which, could it in charity have been attributed solely to steady and industrious habits, would go far to make one hate steadiness and industry for the rest of one's life.

The time for taking in water was now at hand. Each set of carriages was either stopping or slowly proceeding to their respective tanks. On looking out, I observed the Duke's train drawn up parallel to another train, with a considerable number of persons on foot assembled in the intervening space; and, at the same time, I perceived an appearance of hustling, and stooping, and crowding together for which I could not well account. In another moment, a gentleman rushed forth, and came running up the line towards us; as he neared, I saw evidently that he was much agitated, and pale, and breathless—in short, that something dreadful had happened was obvious. At length he stopped, and fifty voices exclaimed, "Has any thing happened? What is the matter?" In a state of distracted nervousness, and in broken unconnected words, he at last broke silence—"Oh God! he is dead! He is killed! he is killed!"—"Who, and when, and how?" burst from every mouth; the first passing thought on my own, and probably every other mind, being, that some desperate and successful attempt had been made on the Duke's life. The truth, however, soon spread like wildfire to the right and left, acting, as it fell upon every ear, like a spell. Smiles and cheerful countenances were changed for one general gloom. Amongst those who were near the fatal spot, the first feeling was one of thankfulness, that their own immediate relative was not the victim; the next, and most permanent, was sympathy with the unhappy lady who saw her husband stretched, lacerated and bleeding, on the ground. A further sympathy was, I am sure, as generally and as sincerely felt—a sympathy with those gentlemen, who, as directors, had for so long devoted themselves to the accommodation of the public, and looked forward to this day as a gratifying and auspicious termination of their labours; conscious, too, as they were, that had their printed directions, issued with the tickets, been adhered to, no such accident could by any possibility have occurred.

During the long interval spent in a state of uncertainty, individual feelings were vented in a variety of ways. Some were in tears, some retired from the crowd and paced hastily up and down the road, some seated themselves by the side in silence. Some stood absorbed, while others discussed the accident in little knots and parties—some were gesticulating, while others were looking on speechless and motionless.

The final decision being in favour of advancing, seats were resumed, and we moved on; but the buoyant exhilaration of the morning was past, and the whole now wore the sombre aspect of a funeral procession. The military band was left to return as it could; I saw them, crest-fallen, picking their way homeward through the mud and mire; our trumpeters, who had hitherto rather overpowered us with their efforts, were ordered to keep silence, and no responsive greetings met the shouts of spectators, as yet in ignorance of the sad event. The weather, too, began to assume a cheerless aspect, and the lively face of a well-cultivated country was soon exchanged for the dreary wilds of Chatmoss, that Paradise of Will o' the Wispes, snipes, and blue devils.

Speaking of snipes reminds me of an anecdote which occurred not long since in this very place. One of the engineers, hurrying across the moss upon his locomotive, started a couple of these birds, which accidentally took the same line of course. As races with snipes are of rare occurrence in a man's life, he availed himself of the opportunity, and forthwith putting forth his whole physical powers, determined on trying the speed of his winged competitors. According to his own account, the contest, which continued neck and neck for some distance at the rate of thirty miles an hour, terminated in his favour; the birds then wheeling off for the interior of the moss. I have, however, very considerable doubts as to the conclusion drawn by the engineer, being perfectly confident that if by accident he did gain an advantage, the snipes most assuredly were not at their high pressure speed; for the flight of some of the slowest birds, the sparrow, the crow, and starling, for instance, averages thirty miles an hour; while others double, treble, and in some cases, as for example the swift, even quadruple that velocity.

A heavy shower, with distant thunder, tended little to raise our spirits in crossing this irreclaimable wilderness of nearly six miles in extent, continuing with more or less intermission till the end of our journey.

The population, which had for a time been thinly assembled, now, as we approached Manchester, became dense in a geometrical ratio. Straggling parties were succeeded by lines deeper and more closely packed every yard we proceeded.

Up to this point, an organized police had kept a passage open, and little or no inconvenience or obstruction was experienced; but now we were entering upon a world bidding defiance to order, and closing in upon the carriages on every side.

To have proceeded with even moderate speed, must have caused the inevitable death of hundreds. It was no longer in detached masses, however large, that human beings were now crowded to suffocation, but as far as the eye could reach, on points commanding any thing like a view, was one vast sea of people, on whom it was impossible to look without sensations of apprehension, or to reflect without dread on the probable consequences, had we returned to Liverpool, and disappointed a mob already primed for explosion.

Malicious incendiaries were at hand, ready to fan any thing into a flame. It was well known, that for some days previous to the 15th, evil-disposed persons had been busy.—One wretch had, it was said, prepared some thousands of tri-color cockades for gratuitous distribution; but to what extent they were really issued, or where they were displayed, I know not, it so happening that four instances only came under my immediate observation; three consisting merely of short scraps of blue, white, and red ribbon, pinned to the button-holes of fellows of the very lowest description; the fourth, however, decorated a personage of such eminent consequence in his own estimation, that it would be an act of injustice to pass over unnoticed so perfect a pattern, the very beau-ideal of that class of deputy candle-snuffers to Hunt and Cobbett, here and there to be met with in our provincial towns. He had succeeded, by good luck, in establishing himself on a little insulated mound of hardened mud or rubbish, somewhat apart from the rest of his fraternity. There he stood, sole monarch of the soil, with arms a-kinbo, upholding his squab, broad-faced, and broad-bodied, coarse figure, by the assistance of a stout stick, which propped him up on the right side, with the evident intent of attracting notice, arrayed, as he was, with a profusion of collars, cockades, bunches, and bows of tricolor ribbon, fluttering from every band and button-hole; and affecting to look with sovereign contempt on the aristocratical pageantry, and, no doubt, convinced within himself, that the noble Duke and his party were quailing beneath the gaze of so important a representative of Radicalism; and, in good truth, if physiognomy may be taken as a test of intention, they had good reason so to do, were there the slightest prospect of he and his worthy associates having ever the power of putting the said intentions into execution. That coadjutors might be found was likely enough, from a very transient inspection of the unsightly rabble, who, having broken all bounds, and filled up the road, actually compelled us to force a passage, at the risk, in spite of the utmost caution and skill, of playing the part of the Jaggernaut car, and crushing human beings at every step. How different, in all respects, from the crowds we had left in the morning!

In or near Liverpool but one sentiment seemed to prevail, that of doing honour to the day by a display of honest, loyal feeling. Clothed in their Sunday best, the Liverpool, and other assembled crowds along the road, cheered us with repetitions of those hearty, sailor-like shouts, which come home at once to the heart, and admit of no misconstruction. Here, on the other hand, thousands pressed about us, "shewing no sign," but watching us pass with looks of sullen or insolent indifference. A slovenly, ragged set, with hair uncombed and beards unshaven, with waistcoats open, exhibiting unwashed skin, dirty linen, and bare necks, they presented the same character of "a rude people," as old Strype the Chronicler described them some hundred years ago.

But as the eye wandered over this vast ocean of human beings, other trains of thought passed across the mind. Some serious enough, acquiring weight from the recent and prominent feature of the day. What a congregated mass of life! How, and where, was each individual portion to be classed hereafter? and by what unerring fiat of justice, tempered with mercy, was the fate of each to be for ever fixed? How many had treasured up, or duly analysed, the talent committed to his care; how many had cast it aside with the indifference of the brute that perisheth! Then came considerations as to the quantum of benefit derived by the world from this accumulation of bodies and brains. What per centage of good or evil was in store from the march of intellect amongst them? In the midst of these and similar reveries, the speech of an orator in London suddenly came to my recollection, who, immediately after the king's accession, in moralising upon the numbers he had seen collected, took occasion to wonder that earth should ever be found wherein to bury them. At the time, I must confess that his observation and his wonder seemed very unnecessary; for even now, where the numbers were ten, if not twentyfold greater, there appeared to me no manner of difficulty in the case. We had just passed a burying-ground sufficiently spacious and deep for the population of the whole United Kingdom. Chatmoss would at any moment swallow the whole of such an assemblage at a meal, and digest every man, woman, and child of them in a month. Following up the idea, however, and shifting it to other worldly requisites, I could not help marvelling at the quantity of beds such a host would require, how many acres of mattresses must be laid to provide a suitable dormitory. Then as to their commissariat—what droves of oxen to be boiled, roasted, or salted down, for a simple dinner; and what an infinity of cultivated lands to afford for each but one single loaf of bread!—The gross amount assembled on that day has been variously estimated; my own idea, on the following data, is, that it could not have been less than four hundred thousand. Liverpool, with its adjoining villages and seafaring population, say 150,000

Manchester parish, including Salford, say 187,000

Making an aggregate of about 337,000

From this we must, however, make a certain deduction for servants and others of necessity left at home; but these again may be fairly balanced by the extraordinary accession of strangers flocking from all parts of the world into those towns. The additional numbers may, without difficulty, be brought up from the thickly inhabited manufacturing districts, and numerous large towns within easy distance of the railroad, which poured forth indefinite numbers, placing every coach, cart, waggon, and horse, in requisition on this memorable day.—Another mode of computation, collected from observation, would yield a still larger amount. Calling the whole distance, in rough numbers, thirty miles, and allowing a sufficiency of space per head, we shall have a continuous single line on either side the railway, of about 8000 for every mile; but as, with the exception of Chatmoss, the crowds, if drawn out, would, I think, have far exceeded that number, probably forming a double, and, in many parts, a treble rank for miles, the total amount of four hundred thousand (they were estimated by many at five) will appear to be far from overrated. To form some idea of the curiosity excited, and avidity for satisfying it, a reference might be made to the number of stands erected in every eligible position on the line; one, for instance, near the great viaduct and embankment at Sankey, was advertised to accommodate no less than a thousand persons; and, in order to command respectability, tickets were issued at ten shillings and sixpence, including conveyance to and from certain places, and a handsome collation. We passed it before the sad catastrophe, all in the highest spirits, preparing to fill up the time till our return by a ball. The musicians had taken their seats, and dancing had commenced, when such was the paralyzing effect of the accident, so general the sympathy, that the moment the news was received, by a simultaneous wish, the music was ordered away, and every symptom of festivity suspended.

The morning, so joyously spent at the western end of the line, had not been idly passed at its eastern termination. If Liverpool arose with the lark to witness our departure, Manchester had taken an early breakfast to be in readiness for our arrival. Large warehouses had been appropriated for our accommodation, and tables amply provided for a luxurious repast. In addition to these, an extensive platform, in an adjacent warehouse, had been reserved for a respectable selection of spectators, anxious to hail the first appearance of the procession. Unfortunately for them, no precaution had been taken to guard against the weather, and as the lowering clouds from the westward had bestowed their contents upon them at an earlier hour, caps, bonnets, pelisses, and patience, were beginning to be the worse for the wear, even before the time appointed for our approach. But that time passed, and still we came not—another hour passed, and still no tidings.

In the absence of certainty rumour began to be busy. Apprehension had before been excited by the sight of a troop of dragoons in full trot, defiling over a bridge, in the direction of Liverpool, summoned, it was said, to disperse a mob at Eccles, who had collected in force, and were tearing up the railway. This alarm was in due time relieved by the return of the dragoons, rather angry from their fruitless errand, having found the railroad perfectly safe—no mob at all, and nothing damaged but their own best jackets and pantaloons, by the drenching rain. However, that something had happened, that the progress had been interrupted, was obvious; and the clattering of thunder over head, added to the nervous excitement of the situation, and the presentiments and forebodings of those who had friends en route, soon rose to their utmost height. At this moment the signal-gun fired, a distant cheer was heard along the line, and the cloudy vapour of an engine was seen above the houses. Umbrellas were lowered, every head stretched to the utmost, when the cheer gradually died away, as the Northumbrian, the Duke's engine, with a single car attached to it, dashed through the line of soldiers, appointed to guard the railway, to the front of the great warehouse: and in another moment the cry of "A surgeon!" "Lord Wilton wants a surgeon!" spread through the crowd.

One of the most eminent was within call. While he went off for his instruments, the engine hurried back to Eccles to replenish its boiler. In an incredibly short time both again met on the same spot. The boiler had been filled, the instruments procured, and away again flew the Northumbrian on its painful mission. In about another hour the train arrived, and all excepting the Duke descended to take refreshment; but this fatal event had not only cast insuperable gloom over all and every thing, but disorganized the admirably arranged plans of the day. We were expected in Liverpool at four. It was now past that hour and we were still at Manchester—evening was setting in—the sky was overcast—heavy dark clouds threatened a settled downfall—but the majority of the engines were absent taking in water. Hints had reached the police, that the populace in the suburbs had evinced symptoms of impatience and turbulence; earlier in the day, respectable people, walking amongst them, had found it unpleasant, and latterly they had taken to the practical joke, so well suited to their character and taste, of bespattering the more decently dressed who came within reach, with clay and mud. Under such circumstances, it was decided that the Duke's train of carriages should move off with the engines already arrived, leaving the remainder, consisting of about twenty vehicles, containing upwards of six hundred passengers, to follow as soon as the other engines arrived. Five o'clock came, but none appeared, when word was brought that the ducal train had unluckily taken the same line as the returning engines; and that, as they could not pass each other, there was no alternative but for the Duke to retrace his steps to Manchester, through the now unmanageable mob, or drive our engines on before him to Liverpool. Of course the former was deemed the most advisable, and we had nothing for it but to wait in patience for their return, employing our leisure in pondering upon how and where the night was to be passed if they did not return at all, an event considered to be by no means improbable. Soon after five o'clock, however, our hopes were revived by the unexpected appearance of three engines, which had, it appeared, not been caught up with the rest, and with these, at a quarter after five, the whole remaining train commenced its retreat. Whether, that in the person of the Duke, the main attraction had been withdrawn, or that the rain from above, or the sloppiness from below, had damped their ardour, I cannot say, but we met with comparatively little obstruction, and finally cleared the suburbs without running over or being assailed by a single radical. Over-weighted as our three engines were, they evinced their power, by dragging us on with considerable speed, particularly over Chatmoss, which we passed (I believe, in great measure, because it has a fall from the dead level of one in about 1200)* at the smart rate of from eighteen to twenty miles an hour. But as frequent delays, from various causes, occurred, our progress was, on the whole, tedious, and we were in darkness before we had completed half our journey; about nine o'clock, a cry was raised that two other engines were bearing down upon us, and with these harnessed on to the rest, we hoped for a speedy termination of the remainder. But all their united efforts were found incompetent to the task of taking such a load up the inclined plane near Sutton, and the gentlemen accordingly dismounted, in number about 400, to walk this ascending mile. There was something more striking perhaps than agreeable in this part of the day's work. The five engines throwing out jets of sparks into the air, which were carried far away by the wind, while the roadway was sprinkled with fiery particles falling from the furnace grates, the flames casting a bright golden light on the clouds of condensing steam which were constantly escaping—all combined to produce a strange but sombre illumination, gleaming partially on the long train of carriages, succeeded by such a numerous escort. Little more remains to be told. Suffice it to add, that about half past ten, the whole train defiled through the large tunnel, landing its six hundred and odd passengers, in a pitch-dark night, in a remote part of the town, far distant from the inns and hotels with which they were acquainted, hurrying about in confusion, in search of carriages which had driven off, or separated friends whom they were destined not to find. Many, never dreaming of such a delay, having secured no beds, and, therefore, in a state of utter uncertainty where they were to procure house room for the night; with the further conviction, that horses to take them away were not to be got on any terms. Strange adventures must have fallen to the lot of some, in such a scene of confusion, unpalatable enough at the time, though now, when nought is left but retrospection, leaving pleasant as well as painful reminiscences of a day whose counterpart they can never expect to see again.

[*This is a distich by wise old Phocylides,
An ancient who wrote crabbed Greek in no silly days ;
Meaning, " 'Tis right for good winebibbing people,
Not to let the jug pace round the board like a cripple ;
But gaily to chat while discussing their tipples."*
*An excellent rule of the hearty old cock 'tis—
And a very fit motto to put to our Noctes.*]

SCENE—Blue Parlour ;—Time, eight o'clock ;—North, Shepherd, and Jug.

SHEPHERD.

Which o' us three, I wunner, looks best at the settin' in o' another wunter ? I suspect it's me—for to say naething o' the jug, wha has lost his nose, you're getting mair and mair spinuleshankit, sir, ilka year—as for your hauns, ane may see through them—and a'thegither you're an interesting atomy o' the auld school—I fear we're gaun to lose you, sir, during the season. But dinna mind, sir—ye sall hae a moniment erected to you by a grateful nation on the Calton-hill—and ships comin' up the Firth—steamers, smacks, and ither—amang them now and then a man o' war—will never notice the Parthenon, a' glowerin' through telescopes at the mausoleum o' Christopher North.

NORTH.

I desire no other moniment, James, than a bound set of the Magazine in the library of every subscriber. Yes—my immortal ambition is to live in the libraries and liberties of my native land.

SHEPHERD.

A noble sentiment, sir, beautifully expressed. Oh ! but you're a curious cretur—a Great Man !

NORTH.

James, I KNOW MYSELF. I am neither a great nor a small—but a middle-sized man——

SHEPHERD.

What the deevil ! dinna ye belang to the Sax Feet Club ?

NORTH.

No. The Fine Fellows invite me to their Feasts and Festivals—and I am proud to be their guest. But my stature is deficient the eighth part of an inch ; and I could not submit to sit at any board below either the Standard or the Salt.

SHEPHERD.

A noble sentiment, sir, beautifully expressed. Oh ! but you're a curious cretur—a Great Man !

NORTH.

I am not a curious creature, James, but a commonplace Christian. As to my intellectual stature—and of that I spoke when I said that I am but a middle-sized man—it is, I am satisfied, the stature best adapted for the enjoyment of tranquil happiness in this world. I look along the many levels of life—and lo! they seem to form one immense amphitheatre. Below me are rows, and rows, and rows of well-apparelled people—remember I speak figuratively of the mind—who sometimes look up—ungrudgingly and unenvyingly—to where I am sitting—smiling on me as on one belonging to their own order, though placed by Providence—august Master of these august Ceremonies—a little loftier in the range of seats in a half-moon circling the horizon, and crowded to overflowing with the whole human race.

SHEPHERD.

A noble sentiment, sir, beautifully expressed. Oh! but you're a curious creetur—a Great Man!

NORTH.

I beg your pardon—but I did not hear you, James—will you repeat that again?

SHEPHERD.

Na. I makes a pint o' never sayin' the same thing twice owre for ony man—except a deaf aue—and only to him gin he uses a lug-trumpet.

NORTH.

Then looking right and left, James, I behold an immense multitude sitting, seemingly on the same altitude with myself—somewhat more richly-robed than our brethren beneath—till, lifting up my eyes, lo! the Magnates, and Potentates, and Princes, and Kings of all the shadowy worlds of mind, magnificently arrayed, and belounging rather to the heavens than to the earth!

SHEPHERD.

A noble sentiment, sir, beautifully expressed. Oh! but you're a curious creetur—a Great Man! (Aside.) I micht din thae words until his lug fifty times without his catchin' their meanin'—for whan the auld doited body begins haveriu' about himsell, he's deaf to a' things else in the creawtion.

NORTH.

Monuments! Some men have been so glorious, James, that to build up something in stone to perpetuate that glory, seems of all futile attempts the most futile, and either to betray a sinful distrust of their immortality, or a wretched ignorance of the “Power divine of sacred memories,” which will reign on earth, in eternal youth, ages and ages and ages after the elements have dissolved the brass or marble, on which were vainly engraven the consecrated and undying names!

SHEPHERD.

A noble sentiment, beau———

NORTH.

A monument to Newton! a monument to Shakspeare! Look up to Heaven—look into the Human Heart. Till the planets and the passions—the affections and the fixed stars are extinguished—their names cannot die.

SHEPHERD (starting up.)

A moniment to Sir William Wallace! A moniment to William Tell! Look at the mountains of Scotland and Switzerland—listen to their cataracts—look to the light on the foreheads—listen to the music on the lips of the Free—

“Kings of the Desert, ~~men~~ whose stately tread Brings from the dust ~~the~~ sound of Liberty!”

NORTH.

A noble sentiment, James, beautifully expressed. Oh! but you're a curious cretur—a Great Man!

SHEPHERD.

What! You've been sookin' in my flattery a' the time, ye auld sinner—and noo turn intil a banter on mysell the compliment I paid you fra the verra bottom o' my heart? You're a queer deevil.—Hoo hae ye stood the weather this season, sir?

NORTH.

Weather ! It never deserved the name of weather, James, even during that muddy and mizzly misnomer—Summer ; while the Autumn——

SHEPHERD.

Weel, do ye ken, sir, that I never saw in a' my born days, what I cou'd wi' a safe conscience hae ca'd—bad weather ? The warst has aye had some redeemin' quality about it that enabled me to thole it without yawmerin'. Though we mayna be able to see, we can aye think o' the clear blue lift. Weather, sir, ablin's no to speak very scientially in the way o' meteorological observation—but rather in a poetical, that is, religious spirit—~~may~~ be defined, I jalouse, “ the expression o' the fluctuations and modifications o' feeling in the heart o' the heevens, made audible, and visible, and tangible on their face and bosom.” That's weather.

NORTH.

Something very beautiful might be written about weather—climate.

SHEPHERD.

But no by you—by me. Oh ! heavens and earth ! O God and man ! what I—a shepherd—hae felt in a spring-shower ! The dry waird a' at ance made dewy—dewy—dewy as the licht in the Angel o' Mercy's een, beheld by contrite sinner in a midnight dream !

NORTH.

James, your paw.

SHEPHERD.

A saft, fresh, silent change has been wrocht a' ower the ootward creation—and a congenial change—as saft, as fresh, as silent, has likewise been wrocht within your ain heart. Music is unist harmonious—but not mair harmonious nor licht ; for licht wears a coat o' many colours—and lo ! yonder is the web from which it was cut—hung aloft in the skies.

NORTH.

There spake at once the Ettrick Shepherd and the Tailor of Yarrow-Ford !

SHEPHERD.

The Rainbow ! Is she not the Lady o' Licht, the Queen o' Colour, the Princess of Prisms, the Heiress Apparent o' Air, and her Royal Highness of Heaven ? O Thou ! who bendest Beauty like a bridge across the valley—on which imagination's eye may ken celestial shapes moving to and fro along the braided battlements—Sun-begotten, Cloud-born Angel ! Emblem, sign, and symbol of mercy and of peace ! Storm-seeker and storm-subduer ! Pathway—so sacred Superstition sings—between Heaven and Earth ! Alike beautiful is thy coming and thy going—and no soul so savage as not for a while to saften, as thy Apparition comes gradually breathing and blushing out of the sky ! Immortal art thou in thy evanescence ! The sole light, either in heaven or on earth, of which the soul may not sicken when overcome with the agonies of grief or guilt ! O that on my death-bed I may behold a Rainbow !

NORTH.

Nay, James, the jug is empty ; and at that moment, with the sudden jerk of your arm, expecting a heavier load on the way to your mouth, you had nearly given yourself a bloody nose. Be more cautious in future—but replenish.

SHEPHERD.

In a single instant, a' the earth is green as emerald, and covered wi' a glorious glitter o' its ain, sic as never shone—or cou'd shine, over the bricht but barren sea. A's joy : The ~~knives~~ ^{hedges}, the banks, the braes, the lawns, the hedges, the woods, the single ~~trees~~ ^{groves}, the saughs, the heather, the broom, the bit bushes, the whins, the fern, the gerss, the flowers, the weeds—sic as dockens, nettles, aye, the verra hemlock—are a' harmless and a' happy ! They seem a' embued wi' a sort o' strange serene spirit o' life, and nought in a' creawtion seems—dead !

NORTH.

Life-embued by a poet's soul !

SHEPHERD.

Then look at the animal creturs. Isna that a bonny bit beastie, cayin' ?

its large-c'ed gracefu' head in the air, frae the elastic turf liftin' up and lettin' down again its lang thin legs sae elegantly, its tail a' the while a perfect streamer—in many a winding ring it gallops round its dam—and then, half frolicsome half afraid, returns rapidly to her side, and keeps gazing on the stranger. Some day or ither that bit silly foal will be winning a king's plate or a gold cup; for you see the Aurab bluid in his fine fetlocks, and erelong that neck, like his sire's, will be clothed with thunder.

NORTH.

You must ride him yourself, James, next year at Musselburgh.

SHEPHERD.

Fling your crutch, sir, intil a rose-bush, till a' the blossoms flee intil separate leaves, and a' the leaves gang careerin' in air owt-ower the lea, and that would be an ecmage o' the sudden slicht o' a heap o' snaw-white lambs, a' broken up in a moument as they lay amang the sunshine, and scattered far and wide o'er the greensward—sune to be regathered on the Startin'-Knoll; but there the ecmage wull na laud, for rose-leaves ance dissipated die like love-kisses lavished in dreams.

NORTH.

Rose-leaves and rose-lips—lambs and lasses—and love-kisses lavished in dreams! And all these images suggested in a shepherd's recollection of a Spring-Shower! Prevailing pastoral Poet, complete thy picture.

SHEPHERD.

See how the trooties are loupin' in the pools—for a shower o' insects hae come winnowing their way on the wings o' the western-wind, frae the weel-watered wavings o' Elibauk's whisperin' woods.

NORTH.

No such imitative melodies in Homer! The sentence is like a sigh.

SHEPHERD.

'Twas nae fawte o' mine, sir, for na mouth got fou o' double-Ws—and I had to whiff and whistle them oot. But hush and list, sir—list and hush! For that finest, faintest, amaisht evanescent music—merry, or mournful, just as ye may be disposed to think and feel it—but now it is merry—dear me! it's clean gane—there—there it is heard again—like the dying tone o' the sma'est chord o' the harp o' an angel happy in the heart o' the highest heavens—and what may it be—since our ears are too dull to hear seraphic string or strain—but the hymn, to us amaisht hushed by the altitude—although still poorin' and poorin' out like a torrent—o' the lyrical Laverock, wha, at the first patterin' o' the spring-shower upon the braid about his nest, had shot, wi' short, fast-repeated soarings, a-singing up the sky, as if in the delirium o' his delight he wou'd hae forsaken the earth for ever—but wha, noo that he has reached at last the pinnacle o' his aerial ambition, wull sune he heard descendin', as if he were naething but a sang—and then seem a musical speck in the sky—till again ring a' the lower regions wi' his still loud, but far tenderer strains—for soarin' he pours, but sinkin' he breathes his voice, till it ceases suddenly in a flutter and a murmur owre the head o' his brooding mate—lifted lovingly up wi' its large saft een to welcome her lover-husband to their blessed nest!

NORTH.

My dear James, you have illustrated your definition of weather by an exquisite example—

SHEPHERD.

But I'm no half dune yet—

NORTH.

For the present, if you please, James.

SHEPHERD.

But I dinna please—and I insist on being alloo'd to feenish my Spring-Shower.

NORTH.

Well, if it must be so—first tell me what you meant by averring that there is no such thing in nature as bad weather. I am rather disposed to believe that—whatever may have been the case once—now there is no such thing as good. Why, James, you might as well seek to prove by a definition that there is no such thing in nature as an ugly woman.

SHEPHERD.

• Neither there is, sir. There are different degrees o' beauty, Mr Tickler, frae the face that ootshines that o' an angel's seen in a dream—doon—doon—doon—ever sae mony hunder thoosan' degrees doon, till you meet that o' the tinkler-raudy, whose looks gar you ratherly incline to the ither side o' the road—but nae ugliness. Sometimes I've kent mysell likely to fa' intil a sair mistak—na, a sair fricht—by stumblin' a' at ance on a lassie gaen far doon in the degrees, and wha really did seem at first sicht unco fearsome;—but then, sir, the mistak arose frae the suddenness, and frae considerin' the face o' her by its ain individual sell, and no as ane o' many on the mysterious scale o' beauty. But then a man o' ony powers o' memory and reflection, and ony experience amang the better half o' creation, soon corrects that error; and fu's, afore he has walked hardly a mile alongside o' the hizzie, that she's verra weel-faured, and has an expression, mair especially about the een and mouth—

NORTH.

James! James!

SHEPHERD.

The truth is, Mr North, that you and the likes o' you, that hae been caved a' your days in toons, like poetry, hae seldom seen ony real weather—and ken but the twa distinctions o' wat and dry. Then, the instant it begins to drap, up wi' the umbrella—and then vanishes the sky. Why, that's affen the verra best time to feel and understaun' the blessed union o' earth and heaven, when the beauty is indeed sae beauteous, that in the perfect joy o' the heart that beats within you, ye wad lauch in an atheist's face, and hae nae mair doubt o' the immortality o' the sowle, than o' the mountaintap that, far up above the vapours, is waiting in its majestic serenity for the reappearance o' the Sun, seen brichtenin' and brichtenin' himsell during the shower, through behind a cloud that every moment seems mair and mair composed o' radiance, till it has melted quite away,—and then, there indeed is the Sun, rejoicing like a giant to run a race—

NORTH.

A race against time, James, which will terminate in a dead heat on the Last Day.

SHEPHERD.

Time will be beat to a stand-still.

NORTH.

And the Sun at the Judge's stand swerve from the course into chaos.

SHEPHERD.

That's queer tauk—though no withouten a wild dash o' the shooblime. But how do you account, sir, for the number o' mad dowgs this summer? And what's your belief about the Heedrofoby?

NORTH.

I have for many years, James, myself, laboured under a confirmed hydrophobia—

SHEPHERD.

Tuts, nae nonsense—I want to hear you speak seriously on canine madness.

NORTH.

Dogs, James, are subject to some strange and severe disease which is popularly called madness; and the question is, can they inoculate the human body with that disease by their bite? Perhaps they can—and I confess I should not much like to try the experiment. But an acute writer in the Westminster Review has declared his conviction, that the disease called hydrophobia in the dog has nothing to do with the disease of the same name in the human species—and I am strongly disposed to agree with him—

SHEPHERD.

What? Believe in a pairodowgs o' that outrageous natur?

NORTH.

Yes, James, to use his own words, that the madness of the biter has no effect on the madness of the bitten, and that a man who has been bitten by a dog in perfect health, is just as likely to have all the symptoms of the hydrophobia as if he had been bitten by a mad one.

SHEPHERD.

A perfect pair-dowgs, sir—a perfect pair-dowgs!

NORTH.

He gives his reasons, James, and they are not easily set aside.

SHEPHERD.

Let's hear them, sir.

NORTH.

He observes, in the first place,—if I remember rightly—and if I forget his words, I have his meaning—that the effects of all poisons, which we are acquainted with, are certain and determinate. Do you grant that, James?

SHEPHERD.

Be it sac.

NORTH.

For example—suppose a thousand persons swallow each the same quantity of arsenic—sufficient to cause death—they either all die, or are all similarly affected, or nearly so, by the poison. No person can use arsenic in his tea instead of sugar—empty half-a-dozen of cups at breakfast, and that evening enjoy the wit and humour of a Noctes Ambrosianæ.

SHEPHERD.

Hardly.

NORTH.

But many persons, hundreds, have been bitten by mad dogs, and well bitten too, who have not been one whit the worse.

SHEPHERD.

But then they have swallowed antidotes.

NORTH.

Which is more than I have been able to do in such cases. But it is admitted on all hands, James, that there are no such antidotes. Can we believe, then, that the saliva of the rabid animal possesses the virulent property which occasions hydrophobia, when we know that so many persons have been inoculated with it without incurring the disease?

SHEPHERD.

That's gaen puzzlin'!

NORTH.

Secondly, my ingenious friend in the Westminster observes, that even on those who have been supposed to have been affected by this saliva, the time at which the symptoms appear is altogether indeterminate—contrary to all that we know of the action of poisons. Why—it is believed, that it may be injected into a wound, and lie there harmless for months, nay years—till all at once it breaks out, and you are more insane than Sirius. A strange sort of saliva indeed this—so capricious and whimsical in its action—whereas all other poisons may be depended on, and do their work subject to certain general regular and acknowledged laws. What say you to all this, James?

SHEPHERD.

Never having received a regular medical education, sir, I'm dumbfounder'd, and haena a word to throw to a dows. But are a' thae fearsome accounts o' the heidro naething but lees?

NORTH.

Many of them most miserably true. But my friend believes that the horrid malady originates in the nature and shape of the wound, and not from any virulent matter injected into it; a nerve has been injured, and tetanus sometimes ensues—direful spasmodic affections terminating in death. Any deeply-punctured wound may produce the disease called hydrophobia in man.

SHEPHERD.

As conclusion to be drawn frae the whole seems to be, that dows are mair dangerous animals than is usually suspected, since a dows that bites you when he's in his perfect senses, is just as likely to gie ye the foby as when he snaps at ye in the licht o' his delirium in tongue-lolling madness.

NORTH.

Accidents will happen—but no very great number of people are bitten by dogs in their perfect senses; and it is only some wounds that occasion tetanus by injuring a nerve. This is certain, that in some of the few authenticated cases of the disease called hydrophobia in man, occasioned by the bite of a dog, there was not the least reason in the world for supposing the dog to have been what is called mad.—But fill your glass, James, to the memory of Bronte.

[It is drunk in solemn silence.]

SHEPHERD.

Let us hae about half an hour's tauk o' politics—and then hae dune wi' them for the rest o' the nicht. What o' France?

NORTH.

James, all men who had visited France with their eyes and ears open since the accession of Charles—now Ex-King—knew that a struggle was going on—only to cease with the overthrow of one of the parties—between the Royalists and the Liberals. Each party strove to change the charter given by Louis XVIII. into so many dead letters. But the Liberals—as they are called—were from the beginning far more unprincipled than the Royalists were even at the end—and had Charles and Polignac not acted as they did, in the matter of the ordonnances, the monarchy had been virtually destroyed by their enemies.

SHEPHERD.

Do you really say sac, sir?

NORTH.

Two courses were open to Charles—to abdicate the throne rather than sit there a shadow—or to support the ordonnances by the sword. That would not have been easy, but it would have been possible; and had Charles been the tenth part a Napoleon, it would have been done—and his enemies having been overawed by the army, the streets of Paris had not been stained with one drop of blood.

SHEPHERD.

Oh! but he was a weak man!

NORTH.

I do not know that he is a weak man, James; but on this emergency—this crisis of his fate—he reckoned without his host—and thence his second visit to Holyrood.

SHEPHERD.

I will ca' on him neist time I come to Embro'; and if he's no at hame, leave me caird.

NORTH.

Liberty, my dear Shepherd, is like the air we breathe—if we have it not, we die. You have heard these words before—and you and I have felt their meaning on the mountain top. Slavery is a living death.

SHEPHERD.

That's a bull——

NORTH.

But of all slaveries the worst is that, which, dancing in chains, supposes itself Freedom.

SHEPHERD.

But didna ye admire, sir, the behaviour o' the Mob o' Paris?

NORTH.

An old man like me, James, is chary of his admiration. In my youth—some forty years ago—I was too prodigal of it—and the sun I worshipped, set in a shower of blood. The French—with many and great defects—are a gallant—a noble people; but the mob that fought—and they fought well—through victorious over but feeble opposition—during what I leave others to call the Three Glorious Days—were not the French People—and I should be ashamed of myself were I to waste any of my enthusiasm on such actors, prepared long beforehand to play their parts—yet, after all, little better than puppets—though the machinery worked well—and was triumphant.

SHEPHERD.

I thocht you wou'dna attend the Meeting.

NORTH.

Had I been a republican, I would; and have declared my delight and exultation at the downfall of a great and ancient monarchy. Probably I should have thought it a despotism, and would have sung odes and hymns of thanksgiving when all its towers and temples toppled into dust. Some such men, I believe, were at the meeting here—and believing them to be conscientious and consistent, they have my respect.

SHEPHERD.

And mine too—and I houp they'll be proud o't.

NORTH.

Other men, again, were at the meeting, James, who love what they call a limited monarchy—and limited the French Monarchy is now to their hearts' content! Till Louis-Philippe began to reign, (to reign!) eyes never saw a cipher.

SHEPHERD.

I hae mair power in the Forest—under the Young Dyuck, I verily believe—though I'm no his greave—than the son of Égalité now has in Paris, under old La Fayette and that sweet innocent invention for preserving freedom, the National Guard.

NORTH.

Good, James. They therefore lifted up their voices on high—like sounding harp and tinkling cymbal, and were applauded to the echo.

SHEPHERD.

Sae far a' seems to hae been richt. Then what hae you to complain o', sir?

NORTH.

I complain of nothing—not I, James—I have left my gout at John-o'-Groat's House—and my complacency and peace of mind are perfect. But oh! the superasinine stupidity of all those sumpls and sumphresses—those Jack and Jeanie donkeys—each row above row, rising up with ears of still-increasing longitude, till those at the acme swept the spiders from the cornice, and crushed the undevoured flies asleep on the ceiling!

SHEPHERD.

Haw! Haw! Haw! Haw! Haw!—What do you mean?

NORTH.

Tories leaning on the bosom of Whigs, and encircled in the arms of Radicals! Church-and-King men shouting their praises of altar-pullers-down, and throne-shatterers, and of all the fierce and ferocious foes of Old Establishments, with mattock and pickaxe razing them all from their very foundations, and howling in each cloud of dust that went darkening up the heavens!

SHEPHERD.

Puir infatuated fules! I'm owre angry to pity them—nor ought leal men and true to accept now the peace-offering o' their humiliation and their shame.

NORTH.

People there are, as you well know, James, who never can move one single step, either backwards or forwards, unless led by a finger and a thumb, gently or rudely pinching their nose. No will of their own have they—for will and reason go together—and only the intelligent are free. More abject slaves never trooped together in a gang before the whip of the overseer to the sugar-canes, than those slaves of both sexes, that sat in our Assembly-rooms, in chains flung over them by masters who despised them too thoroughly to honour them with any portion of their hatred, shouting and bellowing at the prospect of dominion and empire about to be given to them who would trample them into dust.

SHEPHERD.

Oh! the ninnies!

NORTH.

Why—not even though the mob of the Fauxbourg St Antoine had, as if by some seeming miracle, performed their parts like angels—angels of blood at best—and thereby set at defiance all our knowledge, all experience, all history of human mobs, which the Liberty-and-Equality-men, and the old and young Anarchists, have the audacity to ask us to believe—ought they who swear by the BRITISH CONSTITUTION to have uttered one word in eulogy of the “Three Glorious Days,” till they knew something more of what was likely to be the upshot of it all—if indeed ignorance could be supposed so dense as to be impenetrable to the lurid lights already gleaming all round the horizon—

“With fear of change
Perplexing monarchs!”

SHEPHERD.

What’n a face! Dinna fa’ intil a fit. Tak a swig. Na—I didna tell you to drink out o’ the green bottle—that’s spirits—but to kiss the jug. If you speak that way noo that you’re sober—mercy on us, what a fury when you get fou!

NORTH.

Some there were—many—and certainly not the least silly of the set—who held that a demand was made upon their admiration, simply by the bravery and moderation of the Parisian mob—which demand they were bound to answer—without any reference whatever to the past or the future—and even were the Revolution afterwards to turn out the greatest of all evils. They pledged themselves, they said, to no political opinion on the subject—and begged that to be understood clearly by both sides of the whole world. But nothing should prevent them from giving vent to their admiration. No doubt, James, if their admiration were of the nature of a wind-colic, they were right in giving vent to it—time and place duly considered—though roses and lilies forbid that I should have been there to hear! But admiration is not a vice of the stomach, bowels, and intestines, but a virtue of the heart and brain; and so far from seeking to evaporate itself in noisy explosions, it loves to breathe in long-continued and silent incense over the whole actions of a man’s life. A stronger proof of a weak mind cannot be exhibited than an impatient, restless, and feverish anxiety to hail every coming or new-come event, action, or character that seems to be good, with instant applause. In private life they, whose admiration is perpetually bursting out, are always the most frivolous; the shallow rills of their sympathy soon run dry—and when you talk to them a few weeks—say a few days—even a few hours after the unmeasured expression of their enthusiasm, of the cause which excited it, they look at you with a face of blank forgetfulness of all their former feelings, and you discover that they are occupied with some new favourite event or incident, which in its turn is forgotten before next day’s dinner.

SHEPHERD.

Hoo that used to be the case wi’ Sir Walter’s Novelles! Strang minds read them with deep delight—said some sentences to that effect when the taug gaed roun’ the table, and were silent; but they retained all the glorious things impressed unobliterably (that’s a kittle word to pronounce) on the tablets o’ their memories—that is their understandings—that is their hearts—that is their sowles—for they are a’ ane in the lang run, and o’ a composite character. But bits o’ triffin’ laddies and lasses, and auld women o’ baith sexes, used to keep chatterin’ and jabberin’ about each new novelle as it came out, just as if it never had a predecessor, and was never to hae a successor—as if it had been the only byeuk in prent—when lo and behold, in less than sax months, out came anither in four volumms, and then they clean forgot that the ane they had sac lang bothered you about, till you wished yoursell dead, had ever been in the press!

NORTH.

An apt illustration, James. The shallow persons of whom I was speaking had not the small sense to see that it was in the nature of things utterly impossible to pronounce an isolated panegyric on the personal conduct of the actors in a political revolution, that should not include approbation of much, if not all, involved in that revolution. And even for a moment granting that such an isolated panegyric could have been pronounced, they had not the still smaller sense to see that all the opposite party would insist on either dragging them in among their ranks—though, heaven knows, they would be no acquisition to any party—or on representing them thenceforth as lukewarm or milk-and-water adherents to their own—or more probably—say certainly—talking of them in all companies as noodles, and incapable, from sheer ignorance and folly, of forming any opinion at all on political questions of any pith or moment.

SHEPHERD.

You hae treated the subject, sir, wi' your usual masterly discrimination. It's easy noo, on lookin' back at the newspapers, to ken the kind o' cattle that ca'd thae meetings.

NORTH.

Two or three eminent, and some half-dozen able men, attended the meeting here, (which was got up by my friend John Bowring!) but otherwise it was a poor affair, and forgotten sooner than an ineffectual fancy ball. In England such meetings were all of one character. No distinguished or conscientious man of our side, James, attended them,—and even the great Whig leaders stood aloof,—nay, the bulk of the Whig gentlemen. True it is, as is said in the last number of the Quarterly Review,—an admirable one,—that “the meetings and dinners, and subscriptions, set on foot by our old-established disturbers of the public peace, have been countenanced by hardly one person, which any human being will dare to call respectable.”

SHEPHERD.

Why, as to that, sir, there's nae sayin' what some human beings will daur to ca' respectable; and for my ain part, I am no just prepared to gang the length o' that apogthegm. I fear not a few respectable people have shewn owre muckle favour to this new French revolution,—and you and me,—wise as we are, and wise as the world thinks us,—maunna exclude frae the ranks o' respectability a' folk that are sae unfortunate as no to be o' our way o' thinkin'.

NORTH.

I sit corrected, my dear James. I am no bigot.

SHEPHERD.

Arena ye?

NORTH.

Sir Walter's appeal to the people of Edinburgh, in behalf of the “grey dis-crowned head” of the old Ex-King was like himself, generous and gentlemanly; but methinks he must have but a poor opinion of “mine own romantic town,” else had he never doubted that they would sympathise with Fallen Royalty seeking an asylum in Holyrood. Sir Walter reminds us that the highest authority “pronounced us to be a nation of gentlemen!” Let us then behave towards him who was once Charles X. of France, in a way worthy the character bestowed on us by him who was once George The Fourth of England.

SHEPHERD.

Is that his argument? 'Tis but a puir ane.

NORTH.

But so so, no great shakes. But I say, James, that we are not, never were, and I hope never will be, a nation of Gentlemen. And you will allow, whatever Sir Walter may do, that I am a higher than “the highest authority” on the character of our countrymen, and that here, George Guelph must yield to Christopher North.

SHEPHERD.

Oh! ye radical!

NORTH.

George the Fourth—heaven rest his soul!—was the “First Gentleman in Europe,” nor do I know who is his successor, whether king or subject, commoner or peer. But——

SHEPHERD.

I can understaun a man's being the First Fiddle in Europe, but not the First Gentleman; for equality seems to me,—but to be sure I'm but a puir silly shepherd,—to be necessarily involved somehow or ither in our idea o' a Gentleman,—whereas a' competition in accomplishments and manners is out o' the question between subject and king. It might aiblins be mair correct to say that he was the First Gentleman among the Kings o' Europe.

NORTH.

Excellent, James; George the Fourth saw little either of Scotland or Scotchmen; William the Fourth, I hope, will see more; and as he, thank God, is not the First Gentleman in Europe, very far from it indeed, but I hope something many million times better, a Patriot King, he will be delighted to find that so far from being a Nation of Gentlemen, we are, take us on the whole, and on working week-days, for in our Sunday's best we do look very genteel, about as coarse, clownish, commonplace, vulgar, and raw-boned a nation as ever in loyalty encompassed, as with a wall of brass iron and fire, a hereditary throne.

SHEPHERD.

Auld Charley 'll be treated wi' pity and respect—nae fear o' that—as lang's he sojourns amang us in Holyrood. There's something sacred in a' sorts o' sorrow—be it o' the great or the sma'—but imagination, unrebuked either by reason or the heart, is mair profoundly stooned by the misfortunes o' those who have fallen frae a high estate; and och! what nasty politics that co'd abuse Pity for openin' the door o' a Sanctuary, let his errors hae been what they may, to a fugitive and a suppliant King!

NORTH.

It was in the exaltation of victory, and indignation at crime, that the Editor of the Sun newspaper, for example, James—a scholar and a gentleman—used language too, too strong respecting the punishment due to Charles on his fall. A friend of ours rebuked him in Maga; but who always speaks wisely? Surely not I, any more than that worthy Editor; and I doubt not that when he hears that the old man is again in Holyrood, he will feel, that, without any compromise of principle, he may say, "Peace be with him in his retreat!"

SHEPHERD.

And what wud ye think o' askin' him and his suit some nicht to a Noctes Ambrosianæ? I'm perfectly serious in sayin' that we maun ask him; and I'm as perfectly serious in saying that I'm sure that he'll come. Why no him as weel as——

NORTH.

Silence, James, silence—the time has not yet come for divulging that secret.

SHEPHERD.

——Why no him as weel as his LATE MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY GEORGE THE FOURTH?

NORTH (starting up.)

Gurney, expunge!

SHEPHERD (starting up.)

Gurney, restore! O North, I think I see him pechin' incog. up the brae o' Gabriel's road, atween the oxters o' us twa—Tickler acting as guide and pioneer—wi' that wee shachly body the Marquis o' Winchester, and that great big muckle John Bull, Sir William Curtis—and a bit anonyms cretur belongin' to the nobility, in the rear—a' sax o' us, such was the royal pleasure, in kilts—and hoo Awmrose took us for a deputation o' the Celtic Society, and persisted, a' the nicht through, in ca'in' the King, Francis Maximus Macuab, him that wrote the Universe! O but it was a gran' play! and may we soon see sic anither in the Saloon!

NORTH.

Well, well, James—let your daft nonsense go forth to the world. Nobody will credit it.

SHEPHERD.

Mony a lee-lookin' tale's true, howsomever, and that amang the number. But let's change the soobject.—When think ye, sir, is Mr Mure's second volumm o' Lord Byron's Life comin' oot? You maun review it in a splendid style. What for didna ye notice the first volumm?

NORTH.

What the devil do you mean, you Incubus? Did I not write two articles on it, each thirty pages long,—full of the——

SHEPHERD.

If I read them at the time, I hae clean forgotten them,—ane seldom remembers what he reads in a maggazin.

NORTH.

If he does not, then one seldom remembers what he reads anywhere else, James. True, that the wit and wisdom of one month succeeding the wit and wisdom of another in endless succession, mankind must often forget when and where, and from what source, they have derived such infinite amusement and instruction. But the amusement and instruction themselves do not perish on that account, but go into a million treasuries. People are manifestly growing wiser and better every day; and I humbly confess that I think myself one of the great instruments, in the hands of Providence, of the amelioration of the human race. I am not dead to the voice of fame,—but believe me that my chief, if not sole object in writing for Maga, is the diffusion of knowledge, virtue, and happiness all over the world. What is it to me if the names of my articles are often forgotten, not by a thankless but a restless generation, too much agog after novelties, and too much enamoured of change? The contents of any one of my good articles cannot possibly be forgotten by all the thousands who have told me that they once delighted in them,—some fair or bright image—some tender or pure feeling—some high or solemn thought must survive,—and enough for me—James—if in hours of gay or serious memories, some mirthful or melancholy emanation from my mind be restored to being, even though the dreamer knows not that it was mine,—but believes it to have arisen then for the first time in his own imagination. Did I choose to write books, I believe they would find readers. But a book is a formal concern,—and to read it one must shut himself up for hours from society, and sit down to what may indeed be a pleasant task,—but still it is a task,—and in the most interesting volume that ever was written, alas! there are many yawns. But a good article,—such as many of mine that shall be nameless,—may be read from beginning to end under the alternate influence of smiles and tears;—and what if it be laid aside, and perhaps never meets more the fair face that bedewed or illumined it? yet methinks, James, that the maiden who walks along the spring-braes is the better and the happier of the sights scents and sounds she enjoys there, though in a month she remembers not the primrose-bank, on which, cheered by the sky-lark's song, she sat and smiled to see her long dishevelled tresses reflected in the Fairy's pool.

SHEPHERD.

That's no unbonny.

NORTH.

I believe that all my words are not wasted, each succeeding month, on the idle air. Some simple melodies, at least, if no solemn harmonies, are sometimes heard, mayhap from my lyre, floating along the lonely valleys, and the cheerful villages, and even not undistinguishable amid the din of towns and cities. What if, once heard, they are heard no more? They may have touched a string, a chord, James, in some innocent, simple, but not unthoughtful heart; and that string, that chord, James, as well thou knowest, for thou art one of nature's own poets,—I but a prosier—and an old grey-haired prosier too—may thenceforth of itself “warble melody,” while, if untouched by me or you, or other lovers of their kind, it might have lain mute for ever! If so, verily I have had my reward.

SHEPHERD.

What for do you never try to write verses, sir? Ca' and they'll come.

NORTH.

An old poet is an old fool, James.

SHEPHERD.

But then you see, sir, you're sic a fule already in sae many things, that the world 'll no think ae grain the waur o' you gin you'll play the fule in that too—he a poet, sir, and fling yoursell for food to the hungry critics, for they're in a state o' starvation, and, for want o' something to devoor, wull sune a' dee o' hunger and thrust.

NORTH.

There, James, is an exceedingly graceful, elegant, and pathetic little poem “The Arrow and the Rose.”

SHEPHERD.

What is't about, and wha's the Owther?

NORTH.

Mr William Kennedy, and the subject is the story of the loves of Henry of Navarre, when Prince of Bearne, and Fleurette, the gardener's daughter—a story traditional in Gascony, and preserved by M. De Jouy.

SHEPHERD.

Wi' your leave, I'll put it in my pouch.

NORTH.

The Captive of Fez—James—is a powerful performance. The versification often reminds one of Dryden and Byron—strong passion pervades the tale—and the descriptions of scenery are at once poetical and picturesque. But I must review it one of these days—and a few magnificent extracts will shew that Mr Aird is a man of true genius.

SHEPHERD.

He is that, sir—and I ken few men that impresses you in conversation wi' a higher opinion o' their powers than Mr Aird. Sometimes I hae considerable difficulty in followin' him—for he takes awfu' loup's frae premise to conclusion, clearin' chasms dizzy to look down on—and often announces as self-evident truths, positions that appear to me unco problematical. But he does, at times, flash fine fancies, half out o' his lips, and half out o' his een; and afore I kent he wrote verses, I saw he was a poet.

NORTH.

He's a man of strong intellect and strong imagination—and his mind dwells in a lofty sphere.

SHEPHERD.

Hae you read Byron's Life o' Galt, sir?

NORTH.

I have, James. His Lordship used John somewhat scurvily—on one or two occasions—but our friend pays him back in his own coin—and we thus have a couple of rather forbidding portraits.

SHEPHERD.

Disagreeable likenesses—eh?

NORTH.

Mr Galt is a man of genius, and some of his happiest productions will live in the literature of his country. His humour is rich, rare, and racy, and peculiar withal, entitling him to the character of originality—a charm that never fadeth away—he has great power in the humble, the homely pathetic—and he is conversant, not only with many modes and manners of life, but with much of its hidden and more mysterious spirit.

SHEPHERD.

He's aften unco coorse——

NORTH.

True, James, he is not so uniformly delicate and refined as you are in your prose compositions; but lend me your ear, my beloved Shepherd—despise to degrade yourself, even for one moment, by seeming to join the whelps who have been lately snarling at his heels. Let the best of the puppy pack produce any thing half as good as the worst of his Tales—and then we shall listen to their barking with less disgust.

SHEPHERD.

Wha do you mean, sir?

NORTH.

Our inferior periodical literature is much infested by a set of pert puppies, conceited curs, and heavy hounds, on whose hides and hurdies, James, it might not be amiss to try the application of whip-cord. We know how they snarl, suppose they should be made to let us hear how they howl?

SHEPHERD.

Tak care, sir, they dinna bite you, and gie you the tetanus.

NORTH.

They are a set of mangy mongrels, James, and fit but to be flung into some old tan-pit. Their disease originates in the spleen, and in the gall-bladder. In other words, the envy of impotence consumes them, like a cancer in the stomach, or a liver-complaint. Their lean, lank, leathern jaws soon become of a loathsome and leprous yellow—they suffer hideously from the mumps, and the yaws, and the gum-scurvy—these, and several other kindred complaints, being all comprehended under the generic name of—the Criticals.

SHEPHERD.

They maun be a bonny and a happy set!

NORTH.

To leave off metaphor—I must say, James, that these gentry have given me, lately, great disgust.

SHEPHERD.

They are beneath your notice, sir. Scorn to kill them, and leave them to die a natural death.

NORTH.

The whole pack, as I said, are now yelping at the heels of Mr Galt. The small, insignificant, snotty-nosed, tick-bitten, blear-eyed beagles, were the game they are pursuing so eagerly to turn round upon them, would flee like a frightened flock of sheep.

SHEPHERD.

I agree with you, sir, Galt's genius is great.

NORTH.

But, for the life of me, I cannot see the drift of his Life of Byron. I have read it through, James—and the volume, which is far from being a dull one, throws much more light on the personal character of Mr Galt himself than on that of the Noble Child. Somehow or other, I felt all along, sometimes a painful—sometimes a pleasant inclination to laughter, at the bonhomie of the author of the “Annals of the Parish.” It seems never for one moment to have occurred to him that he was in all things—mind, manner, body, and estate—immeasurably inferior to the mighty creature of whom he keeps scribbling away, sometimes with an approving smirk on his countenance, and sometimes with a condemning scowl—both alike ludicrous in a man so little distinguished either by moral or intellectual majesty as Mr Galt.

SHEPHERD.

You see, sir, Byron was a Lord, and our freen' Galt only a supercargo, a step below a skipper—and low-born and low-bred folk, especially in the mercantile line, are, for the maist part, unco upsetting when they chance, by any accident, to forgather wi' nobility. It's no the case wi' me, for I was born, thank God, in the Forest, and was familiar frae my youth up wi' the faces o' three successive Dyucks. But our freen' Galt, whan he first fand himself in the same ship wi' a Lord, maun either hae swarfed wi' fear, or keipit himself frae swarfin' by pure impidence—and wha can blame him for haen adopted the latter expedient? Yet tak my word for't, sir, he was no sae impident in the packet-ship as in the pocket-volumm, and writes about Byron in a very different style, now that he is dead, than he ever daured till speak to him then when he was leevin', wi' that patrician scowl on his brow, that patrician curl on his lip, before which John Galt must have quailed, as bolder men did, to say naething o' that transcendent genius which must have laid its commands on him, to be silent if not servile, just as a king does to his subjects, I will not say a master to his slaves.

NORTH.

Perhaps, James, you are stating the case somewhat too strongly; yet, as Byron's rank no doubt protected him, when living, from the possibility of any impertinence from Mr Galt, it, if nothing else, should have been his safeguard also in the grave. People in the humble condition of Mr Galt,—and when he first met Lord Byron, it was most humble,—are not, by the rules of society, permitted to approach nobility but in a deferential attitude, and within what is called a respectful distance. This is so universally understood, that no man of proper spirit ever dreams of becoming very familiar with "lords, and dukes, and mighty earls," without possessing some peculiar privilege or title to do so, such as at that time does not seem to have belonged to our ingenious westcountryman. Now—he is Somebody—for his genius has distinguished him above the common herd—and genius in Britain, if it does not level all distinctions, elevates its possessor in the scale of society, and justifies cordial acquaintanceship, though it rarely fosters brotherly friendship, between a lout and a lord. But then—he was Nobody, or rather less than nobody; for it appears from his own statement that he had no profession—and therefore, James, you are mistaken in supposing him to have been a supercargo;—he had not been so fortunate as to receive a classical education, a want which, in Byron's eyes, must have seemed almost incompatible with the condition, if not the character, of a gentleman;—he possessed no personal accomplishments peculiarly calculated to win the regard of Childe Harold: but was, in short, merely a passenger in the same packet. Under such circumstances, the courtesy and affability with which Lord Byron seems to have behaved to Mr Galt, showed the native kindness and goodness of his heart; and we are sorry now to know, that the condescension of the illustrious peer, so far from being properly appreciated by the obscure commoner—

SHEPHERD.

Hoo?

NORTH.

Mr Galt, in recording the slight incidents that accompanied the formation of their acquaintanceship, does not scruple, after the lapse of so many years, to speak haughtily of Byron's haughtiness, and of his unbecoming aristocratical airs in issuing orders about his luggage!

SHEPHERD.

I see warrant that John himself was far fiercer and fussier about his ain leather trunks and deal chests than his lordship, and far mair domineerin' owre his inferiors, if any such there were on board o' the Gibraltar Packet.

NORTH.

No doubt. For Mr Galt tells us that he was very hypochondriacal, and seems to say, that he was voyaging for no other purpose than to raise his spirits. Well for him that he could afford to do so—but whatever might have been the tone of his temper then, it says little in favour of it now, that he should have given such a colour to the trifling infirmities or caprices of temper exhibited, as he says, by an illustrious young nobleman, at the very time he was receiving from him the most amiable condescensions.

SHEPHERD.

Was Galt, think ye, ever very intimate wi' Byron?

NORTH.

Never. Still he saw something of him; and it might not have been much amiss to tell us what were his impressions. But—James—it was his sacred duty, before doing so, to sift his own soul, and see that no mean—or paltry feeling or motive was lurking there—that he was not wincing under the wound of mortified vanity—

SHEPHERD.

Ay, sir, there's the rub. Vanity o' vanities! A' is vanity!

NORTH.

It seems that his lordship occasionally, in his letters, laughed at Mr Galt; and that, on one occasion, he expressed himself somewhat contemptuously of our friend's literary achievements. One or two harmless gibes of this kind appear in Moore's Life of Byron; and, though far from bitter, they seem to have enfixed themselves, "inextricable as the gored lion's bite." Mr Galt tries to hide his deep and sincere mortification under a shallow and assumed magnanimity; but it will not do—no, James and John, it will not do—and the recollection of a single splenetic sentence throws a shadow over almost every page of the Biography, and induces Mr Galt, sometimes, we daresay, unconsciously and unawares, to wind up almost every paragraph with some assertion or limitation slightly or severely injurious to the personal character of the Illustrious Unfortunate.

SHEPHERD.

I wunna ca' that wicked—for that's a strang word—but it was weak—weak—weak—and will be seen through by the saum-blin'.

NORTH.

I wish to set my friend Galt right upon this point. At the time Byron spoke of his being "the last person in the world on whom he could wish to commit plagiarism," not one of our excellent and ingenious friend's many admirable tales had been even imagined—and the few attempts he had then made in literature—though bearing clear and even bright marks of genius—had been rather unfortunate. Mr Galt stood, and deserved to stand, very low as an author. We can sympathize with Byron's horror at being charged with plagiarism from such tragedies. But Galt came to know at last where his strength lay—and his genius has been crowned with fame. All his contemporaries now acknowledge his extraordinary powers; and though at no time can we imagine that the author of Childe Harold and Manfred would have stolen jewels for his crown from that of the author of the Annals of the Parish, the Ayrshire Legatees, the Provost, and the Entail; yet there can be no doubt that he must have recognised the rare, singular, and original genius conspicuously displayed throughout all these admirable productions. Why then should Mr Galt's "fundamental features" have been thrown off their hinges by so slight a shock?

SHEPHERD.

Isna the book clever?

NORTH.

It is. Some absurd expressions occur here and there, on which dolts and dunces have indulged in the most lugubrious merriment—and which one man of genius has whiled away an idle hour with cramming into a copy of no very amusing verses; and I am sorry to say, that there is much obscure, and more false criticism, obvious to the meanest capacities—and, with the exception of Mr Moore, none but the meanest capacities have been employed in ridiculing or vilifying the book. But sins such as these could easily have been pardoned, had there been the redeeming spirit of the pure and high love of truth. "That amber immortalization," (the expression of a man of genius,) is, alas! wanting—and, therefore, there is much corrupt matter, and "instead of a sweet savour a stench."

SHEPHERD.

I've some thochts, sir, o' writin' a life o' Lord Byron mysell—for though I ne'er saw him atween the een, I've had many kind letters frae him—and I think there's as loud a ca' on me to produce ma contribution to his beco-graphy as there was on Mr Galt.

NORTH.

But you must wait, my dear James, till a year or two after the publication of Mr Moore's Life of Byron. Any interference with him at present would be unkind and unhandsome—and would look like an attempt to hustle and jostle him out of the market.

SHEPHERD.

What for no me as weel's Galt?

NORTH.

There ought to be as fine a sense of honour, James, between author and author, publisher and publisher—

SHEPHERD.

As among thieves.

NORTH.

Or other gentlemen, in the affairs and intercourse of life. Mr Galt should have scorned to prepare, and Mr Colburn to publish, a Life of Byron, till Moore's and Murray's had had its run. That's poz.

SHEPHERD.

Poz enough.

NORTH.

But instead of having had its run, one half of it is yet unpublished—and the other half yet in quarto. Silver against gold—shillings against guineas—is hardly fair play.

SHEPHERD.

But canna Mure's gold beat Galt's silver, or rather brass, sir?

NORTH.

You misunderstand me, James—Moore costs as many guineas as Galt shillings.

SHEPHERD.

Galt and Colburn sou'd hae waited—as I sall do—if they wished the public to look on them—I will not say as honest—but as highly honourable men.

NORTH.

One half of Mr Galt's volume may be said to be borrowed.

SHEPHERD.

Say stow'n—

NORTH.

From Mr Moore—

SHEPHERD.

Too—hoo; or whare else cou'd he hae got the facts about his boyhood and youth—and mony o' them about his manhood?

NORTH.

Nowhere else—as well observed the Monthly Review.

SHEPHERD.

Fair play's a jewel, foul's paste. But the Public ee sunc kens the difference; the jewel she fixes on her breast or forehead, the paste finds its way into the Jakes.

NORTH.

The volume is the first number of the NATIONAL Library. But I trust that the spirit in which it has been hatched, and huddled to market, is not National on either side of the Tweed. Number second is—the BIBLE! The contents of the Bible, and not its history, as its senseless title would indicate. Now, James, what a bound from Byron to the Bible! Does the Rev. Mr Gleig think it decorous for a divine to put into the one hand of a young christian lady a book containing a pretty picture and panegyric of Lord Byron's kept-mistress, and in the other the History of the Bible? He thinks so,—and that he may be able to do it, he plunders Stackhouse as prodigally as Mr Galt plunders Moore. Messrs Galt and Gleig are both Scotchmen,—so are we,—and we must again enter our protest against the Nationality of a library conducted on such principles.

SHEPHERD.

Heaven preserve us, hoo mony Lee'bries are there gann to be at this ye-poch! The march o' Intellect will be stopped by stumblin' outoure so mony bales o' prented paper thrawn in its way as stepping-stanes to expedite its approach to perfectability! The people will be literally pressed till death. Is that a pun?

NORTH.

I presume, since there is such a supply, that there is a demand. But as I cannot say that in the stillest night of a quick spring, I ever heard the grass growing, so—

SHEPHERD.

What! never a bit thin, sic rustle, sound and nae sound, that tauld o' the gradual expansion of some sweet germ gainin' in licht about the thousand part o' a hair's breadth in ae dewy moment, and thus waxin' in the coorse o' March, April, May, and June, intill gerss that in wadin' thro't in the first week o' July, afore mawin', would reach up to the waistband o' your breeks?

NORTH.

The people appear to me to want bread rather than books.

SHEPHERD.

Let them hae baith.

NORTH.

But bread first, James.

SHEPHERD.

Shurely—for wha can read to ony purpose on an empty stomach? For, suppose they were to swallow some pages o' paragraphs oot o' a byuck, hoo the deevil in that state could they derjeest it? They wou'd bock the best byuck that ever was bun'.

NORTH.

But the Libraries I allude to are not for the poor, James, but the "well-off," the wealthy, or the rich.

SHEPHERD.

That's a' richt enough. I'm for every thing cheap. Yet, sir, observe hoo the human mind comes to despise every thing cheap. There's port wine. A' at ance, some years sin syne, port wine tumbled doon ever sae mony shillens the bottle—and I drank some at the Harrow last night at half-a-croon, o' the famous veantage o' the year wan—and better black-strap never touched a wizen. I remember hoo a' the middle-classes—includin', in a genteel town like Embro', nine tenths o' the poppilation—at the first doonfa' o' the article, clapped their hauns, and swore to substitute port in place o' porter, and Cape-wine (a bad exchange) for sma' yill. Mony o' them did sae; and you saw citizens smellin' at corks, and heard them taukin' o' auld port, and crust, and the like, wha used to be content wi' their tippenny. But the passion for port was sune satiated—for port itself, however cheap, was vulgar—or even if no vulgar—it was common, and in the power o' the said multifawrious middle-classes, baith in the New and the Auld Town. So the boddies tyeuck to the toddy again—wi' het water and broon sugar—which, though cheap too, was the drink that had been lang natural to their condition. There—ye hae baith argument and illustration.

NORTH.

A sort of imaginative reasoning that is apt to lead a weak or incautious mind astray. I am, however, far from entirely dissenting from your opinion; and therefore, a truce to philosophizing about the Spirit of the Age—and let me whisper into your ear, that the whole is a Speculation of the Booksellers. Now the Spirit of the Age is one thing, and the Spirit of the Trade is another; and therefore the question is, are the Trade (the term is collective) ruining themselves—or, if not so, destroying their profits—by competition?

SHEPHERD.

Just as wi' steam-boats on the river Clyde—there being now some saxty, I understaun, a' plyin' 'tween Glasgow, Greenock, and the Isles.

NORTH.

Now, James, I hope all the Libraries will prosper. But I fear some will dwine and die. The best will endure, and enduring flourish; the worst will become bankrupt; and the various go-betweens the best and worst will never enrich either the pockets of the publishers, or the perieraniums of their purchasers, and expire, one after another, like so many candles, some farthing, some half a dozen to the pound, and some "lang-twas." Next Noctes I shall rip up the merits and demerits of them all—meanwhile pass the Jug.

SHEPHERD.

You hae been rather ponderous on that pint, sir. But to return to Galt—like the dog to his vo—

NORTH.

James—James—James!

SHEPHERD.

They tell me that Mr Mure has been quizzin' Galt in some sateirical lines—Are they just uncommon facetious, sir?

NORTH.

Why, but so so, James—not much amiss—the merest trifle—airy and ingenious enough—but without gall towards Galt; and, since I love to be candid, fribbleish and feeble. But oh, James! Heaven have mercy on my old bones! when I think on the cruel load laid upon them by what Mr Galt, or some friend of Mr Galt's, has supposed to be the Retort Courteous, or Quip Modest, to Mr Thomas's jeu d'esprit!—Poor as that jeu d'esprit is, it makes no pretensions, and no doubt was thrown off by Mr Moore with the same ease as an answer to an invitation to dinner; but the answer of the anser is indeed like the gabbling of ever so many geese disturbed in their green-mantled pool by a few pebbles shied at them by some sportive passenger, who wishes not to hurt a hair of their head—I beg their pardon—a feather; and who, in spite of his previous knowledge of the character of the animal, is amazed at the multitudinous din of their protracted clamour, so utterly disproportionate to the original cause of offence—itself so slight and evanescent. In this case, there is an additional absurdity in the behaviour of the geese. For Mr Galt, at whom Mr Moore threw the small polished pebbles, harmless as peas out of a pop-gun, so far from being a goose, is a swan—though of late he has, contrary both to reason and instinct, associated with a flock of those noisy waddlers, and by people at some distance, who may not be very sharp or long-sighted, must lay his account with being taken—mistaken—for a prodigious gander—within a few stone-weight of that greatest of all ganders—the Glasgow gander—who ought to have his long neck broken for hissing at Sir Walter Scott. The geese in whose company he was walking at the time of the assault, could not stomach in their mighty hearts the affront of being insulted in the person of him their sultan—and instantanously stretching themselves all up on their splay-feet that love the mud, and all at once flapping with their wings the oozy shallows, they gave vent to their heroic indignation in more ways than it would be pleasant or proper to describe—to the disturbed wonder of the neighbourhood, and, if the truth were known, to their own astonishment.

SHEPHERD.

Do you ken, sir, that I admire guses—tame guses—far mair nor wild anes. A wild guse, to be sure, is no bad catin', shot in season—oot o' season, and after a lang flicht, what is he but a rickle o' banes? But a tame guse, aff the stubble, sirs—(and what'n a hairst this'll be for guses, the stooks hae been sae sair shucken!)—roasted afore a clear fire to the swirl o' a worsted string—stuffed as fou's he can haud frae neck to doup wi' yerbs—and devoord'd wi' about equal proportions o' mashed potawties, and a clash o' nipple sass—the creeshy briest o' him shinin' out owre a' its braid beautifu' rotundity, wi' a broonish and yellowish licht, seemin' to be the verra concentrated essence o' tastefu' suppiness, the bare idea o' which, at any distance o' time and place, brings a gush o' water out o' the pallet—his theeghs slightly crisped by the smokeless fire to the preceese pint best fitted for crunchin'—and, in short, the toot-an-sammal o' the Bird, a perfect specimen o' the beau-ideal o' the true Bird o' Paradise—for sic a guse, sir—(but oh! may I never be sae sairly tempted)—wad a man sell his kintira or his conscience—and neist day strive to stifle his remorse by gobblin' up the giblet-pie.

NORTH.

To hear you speak, James, the world would take you for an epicure and glutton, who bowed down five times a-day in fond idolatry before the belly-god. What a delusion!

SHEPHERD.

What does the silly senseless world ken about the real character o' the puir Ettrick Shepherd, ony mair than about that o' puir Lord Byron. But you, sir, ken baith his by metafeesical intuitions, that see intil a man's sowle through the works o' his inspired genic, and the acts o' his destrackit life—though fate and fortune, doom and destiny, keepit ye twa far assunder a' the time that the noble Childe was driven along existence like the rack flyin' overhead on the stormy skies—and mine by that intercommunin' o' a' high thochts and high feelings, sir, that far far apairt frae a' fun and frolic, and wut, and humour and glee—(yet they, too, are in their season suitable, and tell tales affen no safe to be repeated o' secrets slumberin' anang sorrows deep doon in that expression beautiful, wi' its gently undulating sea o' hills, greener than ony water-sea that ever rolled in sunshine, and aften, in glorious blinks, also purpler far, when the heather-heights, suddenly light-smitten, coloured all the day with the lustre beaming from their gorgeous mantle—and the ither, as we lay like sleepers on the sward—dreamers but no sleepers we—with half-shut eyes undrowsily watching the slow passing-by of the drowsy clouds, and drinkin' in, wi' nae impatient thirst, but wi' a tranquil appetite divine, the blue liquid beauty o' the stainless ether—the ither, North, seeming, indeed, to deserve the holy name of heaven, whither, had I had wings of a dove, I wou'd have flown away and been at rest, for thou, my friend, knowest, even as I know, that except in those regions, rest is there none for us “poor sons of a day,” and that thoct, sir, that keeps ebbing and flowing for ever in the silence and the solitude o' our sowles, gies a sanctity to the great sky-bow that bends over us, when it is strung in peacefu' beauty that changes a' creation into ae vast Place o' Worship.

NORTH.

Mere painted air !

SHEPHERD.

Weel do I ken, sir, that it's naething else ! Yet holy in my eyes has ever been what in Scotland we ca' “the lift,” even as the Bible lyin' open, during the hour of service, on my father's knee ! Nae senses have we to penetrate into infinitude and eternity. Frae such ideas do not our sowles recoil back on space and time, feeble and forlorn, and sore afraid ! But God has given us imaginations, sir, wherewith to beautify and glorify into celestial and abiding tabernacles, terrestrial vapours in their ain nature evanescent as dreams !

NORTH.

James, give me your hand, our friendship is strong and sacred.

SHEPHERD.

The shews o' natur, sir, are a' mere types ; but there's nae sin, sir—be assured there's nae sin, sir, in looking on the type even as if it were the thing—the thought typified ; for such seems to be the natur o' the human sowle, weak, weak, weak, sir, even in its greatest strength, and relying on the senses for support even in its maist spiritual communings, and maist holy worship o' Him that inhabiteth Eternity.

NORTH.

Poetry—Philosophy—Religion.

SHEPHERD.

I canna conceive a mair sacred, a mair holy task, than that which a man taks upon himsell, when he sits doon to write the life and character of his brither man. Afore he begins to write the capital letter at the beginnin' o' the first word, he ocht to hae sat mony a lang hour, a' by himsell, in his study, and to hae walked at eventide mony a lang hour, a' by himsell along the flowings of some river, (hoo life-like !)—and to hae lain awake during mony a lang hour o' the night watches, and especially then a' by himsell—meditating on the duty he has undertaken to perform, and comparin' or contrastin', as it may be, what he may conjecture to hae been the character o' his brither, whom God has called to judgment, wi' what he must ken to be the character o' his ain sell, whom God next moment may call to his dread account. A' men hae mair nor an inklin' o' their warst evil propensities, and their ain warst sins. When religion and philosophy speak o' the diffeculty o' kennin' ane's ain heart, they mean anither thing a'thegether ; an' though an awfu' and a fearfu' thing, not to my present purpose, and to be haunled by me anither nicht, in anither discourse.

“Why, you are giving us a sermon, James.

SHEPHERD.

An' pray, sir, is there ony reason in the natur o' things why you should hae a' the preachin' to yoursell ? Noo, sir, I say that the beeographer wha acts thus will never cease hearing a solemn whisper, as if direct frae Heaven—and it is frae Heaven—fillin', but no disturbin' his ear—“Do unto others that which thou wou'dst they should do unto thee !” O, sir ! hoo universal is the application—at a' times—at a' seasons—to a' the meeserable race o' man—o' thae divine words! 'Hoo are they forgotten! In the passion o' action, gin I may sae speak, there seems amaisht some excuse, drawn frae the constitution o' our natur, for the sound o' that heavenly voice being droon'd amang the waves. But when a's cawm abune and aroun'—naething nor naeboddy troublin' us—and yet the sense o' our ain sins as prevalent in our privacy as our sense o' the mercy o' the Most High towards us sinners—by what mysterious agency comes it about, that even then, wi' the cawnle twinklin' peacefully afore us, like a bit starnie, through the glimmer o' our midnight chawmer, and

and not a foot stirrin' in a' the house, but the four feet o' some hungry, yet no' unhappy moosie, gliding cannily alang the carpet in search o' some crumbs that may hae fa'n ahint a chair—O, sir! whence comes the thoct or the feelin' o' evil in the heart o' a man at sic an hour as this, when, if ever guardian angels may be permitted to leave their celestial bowers for homes of earth, weel micht we houp to lie aneath the shadow o' the wings o' sic holy visitants! Yet, nae door flies open—nae wa' sinks—nor enter in, in visille troops, the Fiends and the Furies. But what ca' ye Envy, and Jealousy, and Malice, and Anger, and a' the rest of the Evil Passions, that, as if gifted wi' ubiquity and perpetual presence, clutch our verra conscience by the hair o' the head, and bendin' back its neck, break its very spine, till it's murdered or maimed, in death or dwaum—and oh! mercy! what a hubbub noo amang a' the desperate Distractions! But when we first got on this topic, some hour or sae sin syne, at the commencement o' this jug—What's this I was intendin' to say? Ou aye. It was, that you ken ma character by havin' aften studied it in sic moods and seasons. Noo, I was a few minutes ago describin' a roasted guse—wi' a' the zest o' a glutton whose imagination was kindled by his pallet. And at that moument as sincere was I as ever you beheld me when standin' by the side o' some great loch, and gazing on the sun sinking behind the mountains. But what care I, sir, for a' the guses that ever was roasted? No ae single strae. Gie me a bit cheese and bread when I am hungry, and I will say grace oure't, sittin' by some spring amang the hills, wi' as gratefu' a heart as ever yearned in a puir sinner's breast towards the Giver o' a' mercies. Nae objections hae I—why sud I?—to a jug o' toddy, especially, sir, sittin' cheek by jowl wi' auld Christopher. But mony and mony a day o' drivin' rain and blashin' sleet and driftin' sna' hae I been out frae morn till nicht amang the hills—aye, sir, frae nicht till morn—a' thro' the wild wughing hours o' the mirk nichts o' winter, without ever thinkin' o' spirits in the shape o' whisky any mair than if in this weary world there never had been ae single still! Sumphs—base insolent sumphs—say I, sir, that dare to insult the shepherd at his Glenlivat with the king of men. Has the aipple o' my eye, sir, tint ae huc o' its brichtness, or shews it one blood-shot streak or stain o'

Hatred o' hypocrisy sets my blood in a low, and converts it, for a space, "brief as the lightning in a collied night," into liquid fire. Oh! weel ken you, sir, my auld wise freen,' that genius yearns for glory mair passionately even than ever love yearned for beauty, and that to him disappointment is despair, and despair is death! A sueer, sir, on your face, might drive some bricht-hoped laddie mad, while he was seekin', and findin', and losin' his flowery way in the wilderness o' the imagination, day after day, and night after night, for years, and years, and years, mistakin' dreams for realities, and believin' a' things to be in natur verily as beautifu' as his ain thochts!

NORTH.

Rather would I die, James.

SHEPHERD.

Sir, ye ken, and I ken, but aiblins I better nor you, for I was born, as Burns says, in an "auld clay biggin'," and had little or nae assistance and support to my sowle when it was beginnin' to work like barm within me, or rather, if you'll no think the eemage ovre gran' for the occasion, when it was beginnin' to trummle, and crummle, and sigh, and groan, and heave, and hotch, like what ane reads about the earlier stages o' the proceedings o' some earthquake,—I say, sir, that I was then left amaist cutirely to my ain silly sell, wi' naebody to tell me what a' that disturbance within me micht mean, whether it was for gude or for evil, frae heaven or hell—ye maun pardon me, sir, for sic strong expressions, but aften and aften did I shudder to think that I had fa'n intil the power o' Satan—sae black, sir, at times were the thochts that suddenly assailed me in solitude, till, wad you believe me, they took the shape o' great langshadows lying threateningly on the sward afore me, when not a cloud was in heaven, and the sun shining like a god in his ain undivided sky. the beauty o' the heavens and the earth, in a trance that passes away, sir, as ye ken, aneath the presence and the pressure o' cares and anxieties, and duties—often a weary wecht—but ever and anon returns, a renewed revelation by natur, to them who keep holy the Covenant sworn at her altar amang the mysteries that haunted the world of eye and ear in the morn of life.—Nae yawning, if you please, sir. Better that you should at ance cowp owre in a drawm o' sleep.

NORTH.

I could cut with a blunt knife the throat of any man who yawns while I am speaking to him—especially if he attempts to conceal his crime, by putting his hand to his mouth; yet, such a bundle of inconsistencies is man, that confound me if I could listen for five minutes to the angel Raphael himself—or Gabriel either—without experiencing that sensation about the jaws which precedes and produces that sin. The truth is, that admiration soon makes me yawn—and I fear that Sir Walter, and Coleridge, and Wordsworth, and Bowles, and others, may sometimes have felt queer at the frequent, if not incessant, opening and shutting of the folding doors of my mouth, during their most amusing or instructive, reasoning or imaginative harangues. I wish I could find some way of letting them know, that so far from any offence being meant, or weariness experienced by me, I was in fact repaying them for the delight they gave me, by the most sincere, if not the most delicate tribute of applause, which it was in my power to render, or rather out of my power to withhold from genius and wisdom.

SHEPHERD.

I never in a' my born days, and I'm noo just the age o' Sir Walter, and, had he been leevin', o' Bonnypratt, met a perfectly pleasant—that is a' thegither enchantin' man in a party—and I have lang thoct there's nae sic thing in existence as poors o' conversation. There's Sir Walter wi' his everlastin' anecdotes, nine out o' ten meanin' naethin', and the tenth itself as auld as the Eildon hills, but not, like them, cleft in three, which would be a great relief to the listener, and aiblins alloo a nap atween—yet hoo the coofs o' a' ages, sexes, and ranks, belabour your lugs with their lauchter at every clause—and baser than ony slaves that ever swept the dust with their faces from the floors of Eastern despots, swallow his stalest stories as if they were manna dropping fresh frae the heaven o' imagination! Yet you see the crust often sticks in their throats—and they narrowly escape chokin'. Yet I love and venerate Sir Walter abune a' ither leevin' men except yourself, sir, and for that reason try to thole his discourse. As to his ever hearin' richt ae single syllable o' what ye may be sayin' to him, wi' the maist freendly intent o' enlichtenin' his weak mind, you maun never indulge ony howp o' that kind—for o' a' the absent men when anither's speakin', that ever glowered in a body's face, without seemin' to ken even wha he's lookin' at, Sir Walter is the foremost—and gin he behaves in that gate to a man o' original genius like me, you may conceive his treatment o' the sumphs and sumphesses that compose fashionable society.

NORTH.

James—be civil.

SHEPHERD.

Yet tak up ony trash o' travels by ony outlandish foreigner through our kintra, and turn to the chapter, "Visit to Abbotsford," and be he frog-eatin' Frenchman, sneevin' through his nose—

NORTH.

Or gross guttural German, groaning about Goethe—

SHEPHERD.

—or girnin' and grimacin' Italian, wi' his music and his macaroni, fiddlin' and fumblin' his way aiblins into marriage wi' some deluded lassie o' condition wi' the best o' Scottish bluid in her veins—

NORTH.

Sarcastic dog!

SHEPHERD.

—and one and all alike—each with the peculiar loathsomeness belonging to the mode of adulation practised in his ain kintra—begin jabberin' and slimin' the illustrious baronet frae head to feet, till he is all over slaver. Hoo he maun scunner!

NORTH.

Perhaps not.

²¹
SHEPHERD.

He maun. Then each Tramp begins to ring the same changes on his fool's bells about Sir Walter's poors o' conversation, his endless stores o' information, his inexhaustible mines o' intellectual treasures——

NORTH.

Stop, James—lay your hand on your heart, and tell me—we are quite alone, and you need not look at the screen, for there is nobody behind it—are you not jealous?

SHEPHERD.

Me jealous! and o' Sir Walter! As I shall answer to God at the great day of judgment, I am not! I glory in my country for his sake. But say—sir—unseal your lips and speak—should he, who of all men I ever kent is the least o' a tyrant, be thus served by slaves?

NORTH.

No great man of any age, James, during his mortal lifetime, ever so lived, by the peaceful power of genius, in the world's eye, and in the world's minds, and the world's heart, as Sir Walter Scott.

SHEPHERD.

None whatsoever.

NORTH.

Why? Because never before had genius such as his dealt with subjects of such universal and instant interest.

SHEPHERD.

What! No Shakspeer?

NORTH.

No; not Shakespeare.

SHEPHERD.

But wull he leeve as lang's Shakspeer?

NORTH.

Why the devil should he not? Why, you and I will live as long as Shakespeare—but it is not mere length of life, James, but intensity and universality of life, that constitutes the immortality of the soul.

SHEPHERD.

Gude—gude. In ae sense, a' that's prented may live for ever; in anither sense, amaiat a' that's prented dies. Common owthers leeve but in their byeucks,—and every time ye shut his byeuck, it may be said that ye put a common owther to death, or imprison him in a cell. He is in oblivion. But aince in ages an owther is born—Homer, Shakspeer, Scott—wha leeve na in their byeucks alone—though edition after edition keeps perpetually poorin' out o' the press—but omnipresent in the regions o' Thocht and Feeling, as sunshine fills the day.

NORTH.

Gude—gude. But when, James, was there ever religion without superstition? worship without idolatry?

SHEPHERD.

Never in the history o' man. I see your drift, sir. Therefore it is—wou'd the auld cunning carle say—that while the wise, the good, and the free unveil their foreheads in manly admiration afore the genius o' Sir Walter,—preserving a' the while the erect attitude o' that being, to whom alone the Latin poet said God gave “a sublime face,” that he might behold the heavens and all their stars,—the wiseacres, the fools, and the slaves, fall down brutishly before him, and lick the dust aff his feet.

NORTH.

James, a peg lower, if you please. Let Sir Walter produce any sort of stuff he chooses, and that set of worshippers swear it is beaten gold. There is his Demonology and Witchcraft—a poor book——

SHEPHERD.

What say ye? a pair byeuck on Demonology and Witchcraft by Sir Walter Scott?

NORTH.

Poor in matter and in manner—in substance and in style. And yet the paid paltry press are at this moment all pawing it with their praise. Two years ago I spake of—PUFFING. One year ago, the Edinburgh Review—following in my wake—did the same; but it scarified and seared the skin of the small sinners, and left that of the great sleek and without a seam. But “a braw time’s comin’”—and not many months shall go by, James, till I flay the Trade.

SHEPHERD (rising from his seat.)

Ha! Mr Tickler, hoo are you—and hoo cam’ you intil the room?

NORTH.

Tickler! James. I see no Tickler.

SHEPHERD (somewhat agitated.)

Mr Tickler, speak—smile—lauch! O lauch—lauch—lauch, sir; I’ll thank ye frae the bottom o’ my sowle to lauch!

NORTH.

Nay—this is like midsummer madness at the end of October. Don’t stare so, I beseech you, my dear Shepherd.

SHEPHERD.

Luk—luk—luk! Fixed een—white cheeks—blue lips—drippin’ hair—a ghastly coontenance, an’ a spectral shape—It’s his wraith—his wraith—and e’er midnicht, we shall be hearin’ a sugh gaun through the city that our freen’ has been droon’d!

NORTH (alarmed.)

I see nothing.

SHEPHERD (coming round to NORTH.)

There—there—richt opposite to us on the wa’!

NORTH.

Shall I ring the bell?

SHEPHERD.

What said ye? See, it lifts its corpse-like hauns! Oh! that it wou’d but speak!

NORTH (recovering his self-possession.)

Your stomach is out of order, James—your bowels—

SHEPHERD.

I wou’d fain houp sae—but I fear no! Mercy on us! it’s liftin’ itsell up, and movin’ like a shadow—noo—noo—thank heaven, it has evaporated, and is gane!

(Enter AMBROSE in violent agitation.)

AMBROSE.

Oh! dear—Oh! dear—Sirs, there’s a rumour flying through the city that the body of Mr Tickler has been found drowned in one of the Leith Docks!

NORTH and SHEPHERD.

Oh! oh! oh! oh! oh! oh! oh! oh!

[Exeunt Omnes distracted.]

WINTER RHAPSODY.

BY CHRISTOPHER NORTH.

FYTTE FIRST.

THANK Heaven! Summer and Autumn are both dead and buried at last, and white lie the snow on their graves! Youth is the season of all sorts of insolence, and therefore we can forgive and forget almost any thing in Spring. He has always been a privileged personage; and we have no doubt that he played his pranks even in Paradise. To-day, he meets you unexpectedly on the hill-side; and was there ever a face in this world so celestialized by smiles! All the features are framed of light. Black eyes are beads—blue eyes are diamonds. Gaze, then, into the blue eyes of Spring, and you feel that in the untroubled lustre, there is something more sublime than in the heights of the cloudless heavens, or in the depths of the waveless seas. More sublime, because essentially spiritual. There stands the young Angel, entranced in the conscious mystery of his own beautiful and blessed being; and the earth which we mortal creatures tread, becomes all at once fit region for the sojourn of the immortal Son of the Morning. So might some great painter image the First-born of the Year, till nations adored the picture. To-morrow you repair, with hermit steps, to the mount of the Vision, and,

“Fierce as ten furies, terrible as Hell,”

Spring clutches you by the hair, with the fingers of frost; slashes a storm of sleet in your face, and finishes, perhaps, by folding you in a winding-sheet of snow, in which you would infallibly perish but for a pocket-pistol of Gilenlivet. The day after to-morrow, you behold him—Spring—walking along the firmament, sad, but not sullen—mournful, but not miserable—disturbed, but not despairing—now coming out towards you in a burst of light—and now fading away from you in a gathering of gloom—even as one might figure in his imagination, a fallen Angel. On Thursday, confound you if you know what the devil to make of his Spring-ship. There he is, stripped to the buff—playing at hide-and-seek, hare-and-hound, with a queer crazy crony of his in a fur-cap, swandown waistcoat, and hairy breeches, Lodbrog or Winter. You turn up the whites of your eyes, and the browns of your hands in amazement, till the Two, by way of change of pastime, cease their mutual vagaries, and, like a couple of hawks diverting themselves with an owl, in conclusion buffet you off the premises. You insert the occurrence, with suitable reflections, in your Meteorological Diary, under the head—Spring. On Friday, nothing is seen of you but the blue tip of your nose, for you are confined to bed by rheumatism, and nobody admitted to your sleepless sanctum but your condoling Mawsey. 'Tis a pity. For never since the flood-greened earth, on her first resurrection-morn, laughed around Ararat, spanned was she by such a Rainbow! By all that is various and vanishing, the arch seems many miles broad, and many, many miles high, and all creation to be gladly and gloriously gathered together—without being crowded—plains, woods, villages, towns, hills, and clouds, beneath the path-way of Spring, once more an Angel—an unfallen Angel! While the tinge that trembles into transcendent hues—fading and fluctuating—deepening and dying—now gone, as if for ever—and now back again in an instant, as if breathing and alive—is felt, during all that wavering visitation, to be of all sights the most evanescent, and yet inspirative of a beauty-born belief, bright as the sun that flung the image on the cloud,—profound as the gloom it illumines—that it shone and is shining there at the bidding of Him who inhabiteth eternity. The grim noon of Saturday, after a moaning morning, and one silent intermediate hour of gravelike stillness, begins to gleam fitfully with lightning like a maniac's eye; and list! is not that

Of thunder heard remote?”

On earth wind there is none—not so much as a breath. But there is a strong wind in heaven—for see how that huge cloud-city, a night within a day, comes moving on along the hidden mountain-tops, and hangs over the loch all at once black as pitch, except that here and there a sort of sullen purple heaves upon the long slow swell, and here and there along the shores—how caused we know not—are seen, but heard not, the white melancholy breakers! Is no one smitten blind? No! Thank God! But ere the thanksgiving has been worded, an airquake has split asunder the cloud-city, the night within the day, and all its towers and temples are disordered along the firmament, to a sound that might waken the dead. Where are ye, ye echo-hunters, that grudge not to purchase gun-powder explosions on Lowood bowling-green, at four shillings the blast? See! there are our artillery-men stalking from battery to battery—all hung up aloft facing the west—or “each standing by his gun,” with lighted match moving or motionless, Shadows-figures, and all clothed in black-blue uniform, with blood-red facings, portentously glancing in the Sun, as he strives to struggle into heaven. The Generalissimo of all the forces, who is he but—Spring?—Hand in hand with Spring, Sabbath descends from heaven unto earth; and are not their feet beautiful on the mountains? Small as is the voice of that tinkling bell from that humble spire, overtopped by its coeval trees, yet is it heard in the heart of infinitude. So is the bleating of these silly sheep on the braes—and so is that voice of psalms, all at once rising so spirit-like, as if the very kirk were animated, and sang a joyous song in the wilderness to the ear of the Most High. For all things are under his care—those that, as we dream, have no life—the flowers, and the herbs, and the trees,—those that some dim scripture seems to say, when they die, utterly perish—and those that all bright scripture, whether written in the book of God, or the book of Nature, declares will live for ever!

If such be the character of Spring, gentle reader, wilt thou not forget and forgive—with us—much occasional conduct on his part that appears not only inexplicable, but incomprehensible? But we cannot extend the same indulgence to Summer and to Autumn. Summer is a season come to the years of discretion, and ought to conduct himself like a staid, sober, sensible, middle-aged man, not past, but passing, his prime. Now, Summer, we are sorry to say it, has lately behaved in a way to make his best friends ashamed of him—in a way absolutely disgraceful to a person of his time of life. Having picked a quarrel with the Sun—his benefactor—nay his father, what else could he expect but that that enlightened Christian would altogether withhold his countenance from so undutiful and ungrateful a child, and leave him to travel along the mire and beneath the clouds? For some weeks Summer was sulky—and sullenly scorned to shed a tear. His eyes were like ice. By and by, like a great school-boy, he began to whine and whimper—and when he found that that would not do, he blubbered like the booby of the lowest form. Still the Sun would not look on him—or if he did, 'twas with a sudden and short half-smile, half-sowl, that froze the ingrate's blood. At last the Summer grew contrite, and the Sun forgiving; the one burst out into a flood of tears, the other into a flood of light. In simple words, the Summer wept and the Sun smiled—and for one broken month there was a perpetual alternation of rain and radiance. How beautiful is penitence! How beautiful forgiveness! For one week the Summer was restored to his pristine peace and old luxuriance, and the desert blossomed like the rose.

Therefore ask we the Summer's pardon for thanking heaven that he is dead. Would that he were alive again, and buried not for ever beneath the yellow forest leaves! O thou first, faint, fair, fine tinge of dawning Light, that streaks the still-sleeping yet just-waking face of the morn, Light and no-Light, a shadowy Something that as we gaze is felt to be growing into an emotion that must be either Innocence or Beauty, or both blending together into devotion before Deity, once more duly visible in the divine colouring that forebodes another day to mortal life,—before Thee what holy bliss to kneel upon the greensward in some forest glade, while every leaf is a-tremble with dewdrops, and the happy little birds are beginning to twitter, yet motionless among the boughs,—before Thee to kneel as at a shrine, and breathe deeper and deeper,—as the lustre waxeth purer and purer, brighter and more bright, till range after range arise of crimson clouds in altitude sublime, and breast above breast expands of yellow woods softly glittering in their far-spread magnificence,—then what holy bliss to breathe deeper and deeper unto Him who holds in the hollow of his hand the heavens and the earth, our high but most humble orisons! But now it is day, and broad-awake seems the whole joyful world. The clouds—lustrous no more—are all anchored on the sky, white as fleets waiting for the wind. Time is not felt—and one might dream that the day was to endure for ever. Yet lo! that great river rolls on in the light—and why will he leave those lovely inland woods for the naked shores! Why—why, responds some voice—hurry we on our own lives—impetuous and passionate far more than he with all his cataracts—as if anxious to forsake the regions of the upper day for the dim place from which we yet recoil in fear—the dim place which imagination sometimes seems to see, even through the sunshine, beyond the bourne of this our unintelligible being, stretching sea-like into a still more mysterious night! Long as a midsummer day is, it has gone by like a Heron's flight. Lo! the sun is setting!—and let him set without being scribbled upon by Christopher North. We took a pen-and-ink sketch of him in a "Day on Windermere." Poor nature is much to be pitied among painters and poets. They are perpetually falling into

"Such perusal of her face
As they would draw it,"

And often must she be sick of the Curious Impertinents. But a Curious Impertinent are not we—if ever there was one beneath the skies—a devout worshipper of Nature; and though we often seem to heed not her shrine—it stands in our imagination, like a temple in a perpetual Sabbath.

It was poetically and piously said by the Ettrick Shepherd, in last month's Noctes, that there was no such thing in nature as bad weather. Take last Summer, which we began this article by abusing in good set terms. Its weather was broken, but not bad; and much various beauty and sublimity is involved in the epithet "broken," when applied to "the season of the year." Common-place people, especially town-dwellers, who fit into the country for a few months, have a silly and absurd idea of Summer, which all the atmospheric phenomena fail to drive out of their foolish fancies. They insist on its remaining with us for half a year at least, and on its being dressed in its Sunday's best every day in the week, as long as they continue in country quarters. The Sun must rise, like a labourer, at the very earliest hour, shine all day, and go to bed late, else they treat him contemptuously, and declare that he is not worth his meat. Should he retire occasionally behind a cloud, which it seems most natural and reasonable for one to do who lives so much in the public eye, why a whole watering-place, uplifting a face of dissatisfied expostulation to heaven, exclaims, "Where is the Sun? Are we never to have any Sun?" They also insist that there shall be no rain of more than an hour's duration in the day-time, but that it shall all fall by night. Yet, when the Sun does exert himself, as if at their bidding, and is shining, as he supposes, to their heart's content, up go a hundred green parasols in his face, enough to startle the celestial steeds in his chariot, while a hundred voices

"Cry, d—n it, how hot we shall be!"

A broken summer for our senses and our soul! Now and then a few continuous days—perhaps a whole week—but, if that be denied, now and then,

"Like angel visits, few and far between," a single Day—blue-spread over heaven, green-spread over earth—no cloud above, no shade below, save that dove-coloured marble lying motionless like the mansions of peace, and that pensive gloom that falls from some old castle or venerable wood—the stillness of a sleeping joy, to our heart profounder than that of death, in the air, in the sky, and resting on our mighty mother's undisturbed breast—no lowing on the hills, no bleating on the braes—the rivers almost silent as lochs, and the lochs, just visible in their aerial purity, floating dream-like between earth and sky, embued with the beauty of both, and seeming to belong to either, as the heart melts to human tenderness, or beyond all mortal loves the imagination soars! Such days seem now to us—as memory and imagination half restore and half create the past into such weather as may have shone over the bridal morn of our first parents in Paradise—to have been frequent—nay, to have lasted all the Summer long—when our boyhood was bright from the hands of God. Each of those days was in itself a life! Yet all those sunny lives melted into one Summer—and all those Summers formed one continuous bliss. Storms and snows vanished out of our ideal year; and then, morning, noon, and night, wherever we breathed, we felt, what now we but know, the inmost meaning of that profound verse of Virgil the Divine—

"Devenere locos lætos, et amœna vireta
Fortunatorum nemorum, sedæque beatas.

Largior hic campos æther et lumine vestit
Purpureo; solemque suum, sua sidera norunt."

Few—no such days as those seem now ever to be born. Sometimes we indeed gaze through the face into the heart of the sky, and for a moment feel that the ancient glory of the heavens has returned on our dream of life. But to the perfect beatitude of the skies, there comes from the soul within us a mournful response, that betokens some wide and deep—some everlasting change. Joy is not now what joy was of yore; like a fine diamond with a flaw is now Imagination's eye; other notes than those that float through ether cross between its orb and the sun; the "fine gold has become dim," with which morning and evening of old embossed the skies; the dew-drops are not now the pearls once they were, left on

"Flowers, and weeds as beautiful as flowers,"

by angels' and by fairies' wings; knowledge, custom, experience, fate, fortune, error, vice, and sin, have dulled, and darkened, and deadened

"All the mysterious world of eye and ear,"

and the soul, unable to bring over the Present the ineffable bliss and beauty of the Past, almost faints

"As coming events cast their shadows before,"

to think what a ghastly thunder-gloom may, by Providence, be reserved for the Future!

Yet think not, gentle reader, that things are altogether so bad with us as this strain—sincere though it be as a stream from the sacred mountains—might seem to declare. We can yet enjoy a broken Summer. It would do your heart good to see us hobbling with our crutch along the Highland hills, sans great-coat or umbrella, in a summer-shower, aiblins cap in hand that our hair may grow, up to the knees in the bonny blooming heather, or clambering, like an old goat, among the cliffs. Nothing so good for gout or rheumatism as to get wet through, while the thermometer keeps ranging between 60° and 70°, three times a-day. What refreshment in the very sound—Soaking! Old bones wax dry—nerves numb—sinews stiff—flesh frail—and there is a sad drawback on the Whole Duty of Man. But a sweet, soft, sou'-wester blows "caller" on our craziness, and all our pores instinctively open their mouths at the approach of rain. Oh! look but at those dozen downward showers, all denizens of heaven, how black, and blue, and bright they in their glee are streaming, and gleaming athwart the sunny mountain-gloom, while ever as they descend on earth, lift up the streams along the wilderness louder and louder a choral song! Look now at the heather—and smile whenever henceforth you hear people talk of purple. You have been wont to call a gold guinea or a sovereign yellow—but if you have got one in your pocket, place it on your palm and in the light of that broom, is it not a dirty brown? You have read Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," and remember the lines,

"While ice, mast-high, came floating by,
As green as emerald."

Nay, you have an emerald ring on your finger—but how grey it looks beside the green of those brackens, that pasture, that wood! Purple, yellow, and green, you have now seen, sir, for the first time in your life. Widening and widening over your head, all the while you have been gazing on the heather, the broom, the bracken, the pastures, and the woods, have the eternal heavens been preparing for you a vision of the sacred Blue. Is not that an Indigo Divine? Or, if you scorn that mercantile and manufacturing image, steal that blue from the sky, and let the lady of your love tinge but her eyelids with one touch, and a saintlier beauty will be in her upward looks as she beseeches heaven to bless thee in her prayers! Set slowly—slowly—slowly—O Sun of Suns! as may be allowed by the laws of Nature. For not long after Thou hast sunk behind those mountains into the sea, will that celestial ROSE-RED be tabernacled in the heavens!

Meanwhile, three of the dozen showers have so soaked and steeped our old crazy carcass in refreshment, and restoration, and renewal of youth, that we should not be surprised were we to outlive that raven croaking in pure gaieté du cœur on the cliff. Three score and ten years! Poo—'tis a pitiful span. At a hundred we shall cut capers—for twenty years more keep to the Highland fling—and at the close of other twenty, jig it into the grave to that matchless strathspey, the Reel o' Tullochgorum!

Having thus made our peace with last Summer, can we allow the Sun to go down on our wrath towards the Autumn, whose back we yet see on the horizon, before he turn about to bow adieu to our hemisphere? Hollo! meet us half-way in yonder immense field of potatoes, our worthy Season, and among these peace-makers, the Mealies and the Waxies, shall we two smoke together the camulet or cigar of reconciliation. The floods fell, and the folk feared famine. The people whined over the smut in wheat, and pored pale on the monthly agricultural report. Grain grew greener and greener—reapers stood at the crosses of villages, towns, and cities, passing from one to another comfortless quechs o' sma' yill, with their straw-bound sickles hanging idle across their shoulders, and with unbired-looking faces, as ragged a company as if you were to dream of a Symposium of Scarecrows. Alarmed imagination beheld harvest treading on the heels of Christmas,

"And Britain sadden'd at the long delay!"

When, whew! to dash the dismal predictions of foolish and false prophets, came rustling from all the airts, far and wide over the rain-drenched kingdom, the great armament of the Autumnal Winds! Groaned the grain, as in sudden resurrection it lifted up its head, and knew that again the Sun was in Heaven. Death became Life; and the hearts of the husbandmen sang aloud for joy. Like Turks the reapers brandished their sickles in the breezy light, and every field glittered with Christian crescents. Auld wives and bairns o' weans mingled on the rig—kitted to the knees, like the comely cunnymers, and the handsome hizzies, and the lusome lassies wi' their silken snoods—among the heather-legged Highlandmen and the bandy Irishers, brawny all, and with hook, scythe, or flail, inferior to none of the children of men. The scene lies in Scotland—but now, too, is England “Merry England” indeed, and outside passengers on a thousand coaches see stooks rising like stacks, and far and wide, over the tree-spreckled champagne, rejoice in the sun-given promise of a glorious harvest-home. Intervenes the rest of two sunny Sabbaths sent to dry the brows of labour, and give the last ripeness to the overladen stalks that, top-heavy with alimment, fall over, in their yellowy whiteness, into the fast reaper’s hands. Few fields now—but one here and there—thin and greenish, of cold, unclean, or stony soil—are waving in the shadowy winds—for all is reapt, or stooked stubble from which the stooks are fast disappearing, as the huge wains seem to halt for a moment, impeded by the gates they hide, and then, crested, perhaps, with laughing boys and girls,

“Down the rough slope the ponderous waggon rings,”

no—not rings—for Beattie, in that admirable line, lets us hear a cart going out empty in the morning—but with a cheerful dull sound, ploughing along the black soil, the clean dirt almost up to the axletree, and then, as the wheels, rimmed you might almost think with silver, reach the road macadamised till it acts like a rail-way, how glides along down-hill the moving mountain! And see now the growing Stack glittering with a charge of pitchforks! The trams fly up from Dobbin’s back, and a shoal of sheaves overflows the mire. Up they go, tost from sinewy arms like feathers, and the Stack grows before your eyes, fairly proportioned as a bee-hive, without line or measure, but shaped by the look and the feel, true almost as the spring-instinct of the nest-building bird. And are we not heartily ashamed of ourselves, amidst this general din of working mirthfulness, for having, not many hours ago, abused the jovial and generous Autumn, and thanked Heaven that he was dead? Let us retire into the byre with Shoosy, and hide our blushes.

Comparisons are odoriferous, and therefore, for one paragraph, let us compare Autumn with Spring. Suppose ourselves sitting beneath the SYCAMORE. Oh! may we be buried in Bowness churchyard, by the banks of Windermere! Why comes the thought of death on such a life-like day? Poets call Spring Green-Mantle—and true it is that the ground-work of his garb is green—even like that of the proud peacock’s changeful neck, when the creature treads in the circle of his own boauteous glory, and the scholar who may have forgotten his classics, has yet a dream of Juno and of her watchful Argus with his hundred, his thousand eyes. But the coat of Spring, like that of Joseph, is a coat of many colours. Call it patchwork if you choose, the Tailor who wrote the Age. Many females, too, look on nature with a milliner’s or a mantua-maker’s eye—arraying her in furbelows and flounces. But use your own eyes and mine, and from beneath THE SYCAMORE let us two, sitting together in amity, look lovingly on the Spring. Felt ever your heart before, with such an emotion of harmonious beauty, the exquisitely delicate distinctions of character among the lovely tribes of trees! That is BELLE-ISLE. Earliest to salute the vernal rainbow, with a glow of green gentle as its own, is the lake-loving Alder, whose home, too, is by the flowings of all the streams. Just one degree fainter in its hue—or shall we rather say brighter—for we feel the difference without knowing in what it lies—stands, by the alder’s rounded softness, the spiral Larch, all hung over its limber sprays, were you near enough to admire them, with cones of the Tyrian dye. That stem, white as silver, and smooth as silk, seen so straight in the green sylvan light, and there airily overarching the coppice with lambent tresses, such as fancy might picture for the mermaid’s hair, pleasant as is her life on that Fortunate Isle, is yet said by us, who vainly attribute our own sadness to ununsorrowing things—to belong to a Tree that weeps;—though a weight of joy it is, and of exceeding gladness, that thus depresses her pendent beauty, till it droops—as we think—like that of a being overcome with grief! Seen standing all along by themselves, with something of a foreign air and an exotic expression, yet not unwelcome or obtrusive among our indigenous fair forest trees, twinkling to the touch of every wandering wind, and restless even amidst what seemeth now to be everlasting rest, we cannot choose but admire that somewhat darker grove of columnar Lombardy Poplars. How comes it that some Sycamores so much sooner than others salute the Spring? Yonder are some, but budding, as if yet the frost lay on the honey-dew that protects the balmy germs. There are others warming into expansion, half-budded and half-leaved, with a various light of colour visible in that sun-glint distinctly from afar. And in that nook of the still sunnier south trending eastward, lo! a few are almost in their full summer foliage, and soon will the bees be swarming among their flowers. A Horse Chestnut has a grand oriental air, and like a satrap, uplifts his green banner—yellowing in the light—that shows he belongs to the line of the prophet. Elms are then most magnificent—witness Christ-Church walk—when they hang over head in heaven like the chancel of a cathedral. Yet here, too, are they august—and methinks “a dim religious light” is in that vault of branches just vivifying to the Spring, and though almost bare, tinged with a coming hue that ere long will be majestic brightness. Those old Oaks seem sullen in the sunshine, and slow to put forth their power, like the Spirit of the Land their emblem. But they, too, are relaxing from their wonted sternness—soon will that faint green be a glorious yellow—and while the gold-laden boughs stoop boldly to the storms with which they love to dally, bounds not the heart of every Briton to the music of his national anthem,

“And be yourself the great sublime you draw,”

“Rule, Britannia,
Britannia rule the waves!”

The Ash is a manly tree, but “dreigh and dour” in the leafing; and yonder stands an Ash-grove like a forest of ships with bare poles like the docks of Liverpool. Yet, like the town of Kilkenny,

“It shines well where it stands;”

and the bare grey-blue of the branches, spart but not repulsive, like some cunning discord in music, deepens the harmony of the Isle of Groves. Contrast is one of the finest of all the laws of association, as every philosopher, poet, and peasant knows. At this moment, it brings, by the bonds of beauty, though many glades intervene, close beside that pale grey-blue leafless Ash-Clump, that bright, black-green Pine-Clan, whose “leaf fadeth never,” a glorious Scottish tartan triumphing in the English woods. Though many glades intervene, we said; for thou seest that BELLE ISLE is not all one various flush of wood, but bedropt, all over—bedropt and besprinkled with grass-gems, some cloud-shadowed, some tree-shaded, some mist-bedimmed, and some luminous as small soil-suns, on which, as the eye alights, it feels soothed and strengthened, and gifted with a profounder power to see into the mystery of the beauty of nature. But what are those living Hills of snow, or of some substance purer in its brightness even than any snow that falls and fades in one night on the mountain-top! Trees are they—fruit-trees—The Wild Cherry that grows stately and wide-spreading even as the monarch of the wood—and can that be a load of blossoms! Fairer never grew before poet’s eye of old in the fabled Hesperides. See how what we called snow brightens into pink—yet still the whole glory is white, and fadeth not away the purity of the balmy snow-blush. Aye, balmy as the bliss breathing from virgin lips, when moving in the beauty left by her morning prayers, a glad fond daughter steals towards him on feet of light, and as his arms open to receive and return the blessing, lays her innocence with smiles that are almost tears, within her father’s bosom. Milton!

“As when to those who sail
Beyond the Cape of Hope, and now are past
Mozambique, off at sea north-east winds blow
Sabeen odours from the spicy shore
Of Araby the Blest; with such delay
Well pleased they slack their course, and many a league,
Cheer’d with the grateful smell, old Ocean smiles.”

Shut your eyes—suppose six months gone—and lo! BELLE ISLE, in Autumn, like a scene in another hemisphere of our globe. There is a slight frost in the air, in the sky, on the lake, and midday is as still as midnight. But, though still, it is cheerful; for close at hand Robin Red-breast, God bless him, is warbling on the cope-stone of that old barn gabel; and though Millar-Ground Bay is half a mile off, how distinct the clank of the two oars, like one, accompanying that large wood-boat on its slow voyage from Ambleside to Bowness, the metropolitan port of the Queen of the Lakes. The water has lost, you see, its summer sunniness, yet it is as transparent as ever it was in summer; and how close together seem, with their almost meeting shadows, the two opposite shores! But we wish you to look at BELLIS ISLE, though we ourselves are almost afraid to do so, so transcendently glorious is the sight, that we know will disturb us with an emotion too deep to be endured. Could you not think that a splendid sunset had fallen down in fragments on the Isle called Beautiful, and set it all a-blaze! The woods are on fire, yet they burn not; beauty subdues while it fosters the flame; and there, as in a many-tented tabernacle, has Colour pitched his royal residence, and reigns in glory beyond that of any Oriental king. What are all the canopies, and balconies, and galleries of human state, all hung with the richest drapery that e'er the skill of Art, that Wizard, drew forth in gorgeous folds from his enchanted loom, if ideally suspended in the air of imagination, beside the sun-and-storm-stained furniture of these palaces of Autumn, framed by the Spirit of the Season, of her own living umbrage, for his own last delight, ere he move in annual migration, with all his Court, to some foreign clime, far beyond the seas! No names of trees are remembered—a glorious confusion comprehends in one the whole leafy race—orange, and purple, and scarlet, and crimson, are all seen to be there, and interfused through the silent splendour is aye felt the presence of that terrestrial green, native and unextinguishable in earth's bosom, as that celestial blue is in that of the sky. That trance goes by, and the spirit, gradually filled with a stiller delight, takes down all those tents into pieces, and contemplates the encampment with less of imagination, and with more of love. It knows and blesses each one of those many glorious groves, each becoming, as it gazes, less and less glorious, more and more beautiful; till memory revives all the happiest and holiest hours of the Summer and the Spring, and re-peoples the melancholy umbrage with a thousand visions of joy, that may return never more! Images, it may be, of forms and faces now mouldering in the dust! For all human hearts have felt—and all human lips have declared—melancholy making poets of us all—aye, even prophets, till the pensive air of Autumn has been filled with the music of elegiac and foreboding hymns—that, as is the Race of Leaves—now old Homer speaks—so is the Race of Men! Nor, till time shall have an end, insensate will be any soul endowed “with discourse of reason” to those mysterious misgivings, alternating with triumphant aspirations more mysterious still, when the Religion of Nature leans in awe on the Religion of God, and we hear the voice of both in such strains as these—the earthly, in its sadness, momentarily deadening the divine:—

But when shall Spring visit the mouldering urn?

O! when shall it dawn on the night of the grave!

The observant reader will not have failed to notice, that throughout this Fytte we have spoken of all the Seasons as belonging to the masculine gender. They are generally, we believe, in this country, painted in petticoats, apparently by bagmen, as may be daily seen in the pretty prints that bedeck the paper-walls of the parlours of inns. Spring is always there represented as a spanker in a blue symar, very pertly exposing her budding breast, and her limbs from feet to fork, in a style that must be very offensive to the mealy-mouthed members of that shame-faced corporation, the Society for the Suppression of Vice. She holds a flower between her finger and her thumb, crocus, violet, or primrose; and though we verily believe she means no harm, she no doubt does look rather leeringly upon you, like one of the frail sisterhood of the Comeatables. Summer again is an enormous and monstrous mawsey, in puris naturalibus, meant to image Musidora, or the Medicean, or rather the Hottentot Venus.

"So stands the statue that enchants the world!"

She seems, at the very lightest, a good round score heavier than Spring. And when you imagine her plunging into the pool, you think you hear a porpus. May no Damon run away with her clothes, leaving behind in exchange his heart! Gadflies are rife in the dog-days, and should one "imparadise himself in form of that sweet flesh," there will be a cry in the woods that will speedily bring to her assistance Pan and all his Satyrs. Autumn is a motherly matron, evidently enceinte, and, like Love and Charity, who probably are smiling on the opposite wall, she has a brace of bouncing boys at her breast—in her right hand a formidable sickle, like a Turkish scymitar—in her left an extraordinary utensil, bearing, we believe, the heathenish appellation of Cornucopia—on her back a sheaf of wheat—and on her head a gladen—planted there by John Barleycorn. She is a fearsome Dear;—as ugly a customer as a lonely man would wish to encounter beneath the light of a September moon. On her feet are baches—on her legs huggers—and the breadth of her soles, and the thickness of her ankles, we leave to your own conjectures. Her fine bust is conspicuous in an open laced boddice—and her huge hips are set off to the biggest advantage, by a jacket that she seems to have picked up by the wayside, after some jolly tar, on his return from a long voyage, had there been performing his toilet, and, by getting rid of certain encumbrances, was enabled to pursue his inland journey with less resemblance than before to a walking scarecrow. Winter is a withered old beldame, too poor to keep a cat, hunkling on her hunkers over a feeble fire of sticks, extinguished fast as it is beeted, with a fizz in the melted snow which all around that unhoused wretchedness is indurated with frost; while a blue pool close at hand is chained in iciness, and an old stump half-buried in the drift. Poor, old, miserable, cowering crone! One cannot look at her without unconsciously putting one's hand in his pocket, and fumbling for a tester. Yes, there is pathos in the picture, especially while, on turning round your head, you behold a big blockhead of a vulgar bagman, with his coat-tails over his arms, warming his loathsome hideousness at a fire that would roast an ox.

Such are the Seasons! And though we have spoken of them, as mere critics on art, somewhat superciliously, yet there is almost always no inconsiderable merit in all prints, pictures, paintings, poems, or prose-works, that—pardon our tautology—are popular with the people. The emblematical figments now alluded to, have been the creations of persons of genius, but, never having had access to the works of the old masters, though the conception is good, the execution is, in general, far from perfect. Yet many a time, when lying at our ease in a Wayside Inn, stretched on three wooden chairs, with a little round deal-table before us, well laden with oatmeal cakes and cheese and butter, nor, you may be sure, without its "tappit-hen"—have we after a long day's journey—perhaps the Longest Day—

"Through moors and mosses many, O," regarded with no unimaginative spirit—when Joseph and his brethren were wanting—even such symbols of the Seasons as these, till

"Flash'd before that inward eye Which is the bliss of solitude," many as fair an image as ever nature sent from her woods and wildernesses to cheer the heart of her worshipper, who, on his pilgrimage to her loftiest shrines, and most majestic temples, spared not to stoop his head below the lowest lintel, and held all men his equal who earned by honest industry the scanty fare which they never ate without those holy words of supplication and thanksgiving,

"Give us this day our daily bread!"

Our memory is a treasure-house of written and unwritten poetry—the ingots, the gifts of the great bards, and the bars of bullion—much of the coin our own—some of it borrowed, mayhap, but always on good security, and repaid with interest—a legal transaction, of which even a not unwealthy man has no need to be ashamed—none of it stolen, nor yet found where the Highlandman found the tongs. But our riches are like those that encumbered the floor of the Sanctum of the Dey of Algiers, not very tidily arranged; and we are frequently foiled in our efforts to lay our hand, for immediate use or ornament, on a ducat or a diamond, a pistole or a pearl, a sovereign, or only his crown. We feel ourselves at this moment in that predicament, when trying to recollect the genders of Thomson's "Seasons"—

"Come, gentle Spring! ethereal Mildness come,
And from the bosom of you dropping cloud,
While music wakes around, vell'd in a shower
Of shadowing roses, on our plains descend!"

That picture is indistinctly and obscurely beautiful to the imagination, and there is not a syllable about sex—though "ethereal mildness," which is an Impersonation, and hardly an Impersonation, must be, it is felt, a Virgin Goddess, whom all the divinities that dwell between heaven and earth must love. Never to our taste—but our taste is inferior to our feeling and our genius—though you will seldom go far wrong even in trusting it—never had poem a more beautiful beginning. It is not simple—nor ought it to be—it is rich, and even gorgeous—for the Bard came to his subject full of inspiration, and as it was the inspiration, here, not of profound thought, but of passionate emotion, it was right that music at the very first moment should overflow the page, and that it should be literally strewn with roses. An imperfect Impersonation is often proof positive of the highest state of poetical enthusiasm. The forms of nature undergo a half humanizing process under the intensity of our love, yet still retain the character of the inanimate creation, thus affecting us with a sweet, strange, almost bewildering blended emotion, that scarcely belongs to either separately, but to both together—~~as to a phenomenon that only~~ the eye of genius sees, because only the soul of genius can give it a presence—though afterwards all eyes dimly recognise it, on its being shewn to them, as something more vivid than their own faint experience, yet either kindred to it, or virtually one and the same. Almost all human nature can, in some measure, understand and feel the most exquisite and recondite image which only the rarest genius could produce. Were it not so, great poets might break their harps, and go down themselves in Helicon.

"From brightning fields of ether fair disclosed,
Child of the Sun, refulgent SUMMER comes,
In pride of youth, and felt through nature's depth:
He comes, attended by the sultry hour,
And ever-fauning breezes, on his way;
While, from his ardent look, the turning Spring
Averts his blushful face, and earth and skies,
All smiling, to his hot dominion leaves."

Here the Impersonation is stronger—and perhaps the superior strength lies in the words "child of the Sun,"—and in the words describing Spring he too is more of an Impersonation than in the other passage—averting his blushful face from the Summer's ardent look. But the poet having made Summer masculine, makes Spring so too, which we cannot help thinking a flaw in this jewel of a picture. Ladies alone should avert their blushful faces from the ardent looks of gentlemen. Thomson, indeed, elsewhere says of an enamoured youth overpowered by the loving looks of his mistress,—

"From the keen gaze her lover turns away,
Full of the dear ecstatic power, and sick
With sighing languishment."

This, we have heard, from experienced persons of both sexes, is as delicate as it is natural; but for our own simple and single selves, we never remember having got sick on any such occasion. Much agitated, we cannot deny—if we did, the most credulous would not credit us—much agitated we have been—when our lady-love, not contented with fixing upon us her dove-eyes, began billing and cooing in a style from which the cushat might have taken a lesson with advantage, that she might the better perform her innocent part on her first assignation with her affianced in the pine-grove on St Valentine's day—but never in all our long lives got we absolutely sick,—nor even squeamish,—never were we obliged to turn away with our hand to our mouth,—but on the contrary, we were commonly as brisk as a bee at a pot of honey; or, if that be too luscious a simile, as brisk as that same wonderful insect murmuring for a few moments round and round a rose-bush, and then settling himself down seriously to work, as mute as a mouse, among the half-blown petals. However, we are not now writing our Confessions—and what we wished to say about this passage is, that in it the one sex is represented as turning away the face from that of the other, which may be all natural enough, though polite on the gentleman's part we can never call it, and had the female virgin done so, we cannot help thinking it would have read better in poetry. But for Spring to avert his blushful face from the ardent looks of Summer, has on us the effect of making both Seasons seem simpletons. Spring, in the character of “ethereal mildness,” was unquestionably a female, but here she is “unsexed from the crown to the toe,” and changed into an awkward hobbblehoy, who, having passed his boyhood in the country, is a booby who blushes black at the gaze of his own brother, and if brought into the company of the lasses would not fail to faint away in a fit, nor revive till his face felt a pitcher-full of cold water.

“*Crown'd with the sickle and the wheaten sheaf,
While Autumn, nodding o'er the yellow plain,
Comes jovial on, &c.*” is, we think, bad. The Impersonation here is complete, and though the sex of Autumn is not mentioned, it is manifestly meant to be male. So far there is nothing amiss either one way or another. But “nodding o'er the yellow plain” is a mere statement of a fact in nature,—and descriptive of the growing and ripening or ripened harvest,—whereas it is applied here to Autumn, as a figure who “comes jovial on.” This is not obscurity,—or indistinctness,—which, as we have said before, is often a great beauty in Impersonation—but it is an inconsistency and a contradiction,—and therefore indefensible on any ground either of conception or expression.

There are no such essential vices as this in the Castle of Indolence,—for by that time Thomson had subjected his inspiration to thought,—and his poetry, guided and guarded by philosophy, became celestial as an angel's song.

“*See Winter comes to rule the varied year,
Sullen and sad, with all his rising train,
Vapours and clouds and storms. Be these my theme,
These ' that exalt the soul to solemn thought
And heavenly musing. Welcome, kindred glooms!
Congenial horrors, hail ' with frequent foot,
Pleased have I, in my cheerful morn of life,
When pleased with careless solitude I lived,
And sung of nature with unceasing joy,
Pleased have I wander'd through your rough domain,
Trud the pure virgin snows, myself as pure,
Heard the winds roar and the big torrents burst,
Or seen the deep fermenting tempest brow'd
In the grim evening sky. Thus pass'd the time,
Till through the lucid slumbers of the South
Look'd out the joyous Spring, look'd out and smiled !”*

Divine inspiration indeed ! Poetry, that if read by the bedside of a dying lover of nature, might “*Create a soul

Under the ribs of death !”*

Wordsworth—himself a poet of the first, but—strange as it is—a critic of the fourth order—yet not strange—for as a poet, to use his own fine words, he writes as one of the “Sound heathy children of the God of Heaven,”

as a critic, but as one of the dissatisfied sons of earth—labours to prove, in one of his “postliminious prefaces,” that the true spirit of the “Seasons,” till long after their publication, was neither felt nor understood. In the conduct of his argument, he does cut a poor lame figure. That the poem was at once admired, he is forced to admit—but then, according to him, the admiration was false and hollow—and it was regarded but with that wonder which is the “natural product of ignorance.” After having observed that, excepting the Nocturnal Reverie of Lady Winchelsea, and a passage or two in the Windsor Forest of Pope, the poetry of the period intervening between the publication of the Paradise Lost and the Seasons, does not contain a single new image of external nature—he proceeds to call the celebrated verses of Dryden in the Indian Emperor, descriptive of the hush of Night, “vague, bombastic, and senseless,” and Pope’s translation of the celebrated moonlight scene in the Iliad, altogether “absurd,”—and then without ever once dreaming of any necessity of shewing them to be so, or even if he had succeeded in doing so, of the utter illogicality of any argument drawn from their misery and wretchedness to establish the point he hammers at, he all at once says, with the most astounding assumption, “having shewn that much of what his [Thomson’s] biographer deemed genuine admiration, must, in fact, have been blind wonderment—how is the rest to be accounted for?” “Having shewn”!!! Why he has shewn nothing but his own arrogance in supposing that his mere ipse dixit will be taken by the whole world as proof that Dryden and Pope had not the use of their eyes. “Strange to think of an enthusiast,” he says, (alluding to the passage in Pope’s translation of the Iliad,) “as may have been the case with thousands, reciting those verses under the cope of a moonlight sky, without having his raptures in the least disturbed by a suspicion of their absurdity!” We are no enthusiasts—we are far too old for that folly—but we have eyes in our head, though sometimes rather dim and motey, and as good eyes too as Mr Wordsworth, and we often have recited—and hope often will recite them again—Pope’s exquisite lines, not only without any “suspicion of their absurdity,” but with the conviction of a most devout belief, that with some little vagueness, perhaps, and repetition, and a word here and there that might be altered for the better, the Description is at once beautiful and sublime. But grant it miserable—and grant all else Mr Wordsworth has so dictatorially uttered—and what then? Though descriptive poetry may not have flourished during the period between the Paradise Lost and the Seasons, did not mankind enjoy the use of their seven senses? Could they not see and hear without the aid of those oculists and aurists the Poets? Were all the shepherds and agriculturists of England and Scotland blind and deaf to all the sights and sounds of nature, and all the gentlemen and ladies too, from the King and Queen upon the Throne, to the lowest of their subjects? Very like a whale. Causes there were why poetry flowed during that era in another channel than that of the description of natural scenery—and if it flowed too little in that channel then—which is true—equally is it true that it flows now in it too much—especially among the poets of the Lake School, to the neglect—not of sentiments and affections—for there they excel—but of strong direct human passion applied to the stir and tumult—of which the interest is profound and eternal—of all the great affairs of human life. But though the descriptive poets during the period between Milton and Thomson were few and indifferent, no reason is there in this world for imagining with Mr Wordsworth, that men had forgotten both the heavens and the earth. They had not—nor was the wonder with which they must have regarded the great shows of nature, the “natural product of ignorance” then, any more than it is now, or ever was during a civilized age. If we be right in saying so—then neither could the admiration which the “Seasons,” on the first appearance of that glorious poem, excited, be said, with any sense or truth, to have been but a “wonder, the natural produce of ignorance.” Mr Wordsworth having thus signally, and, we may say, shamefully, failed in his attempt to shew that “much of what Thomson’s biographer deemed genuine admiration, must, in fact, have been blind wonderment,” let us accompany him in his still more futile and absurd efforts to shew “how the rest is to be accounted for.” He attempts to do so after this fashion. “Thomson was fortunate in the very title of his poem, which seemed to bring it home to the prepared sympathies of every one; in the next place, notwithstanding his high powers, he writes a vicious style; and his false ornaments are exactly of that kind, which would be most likely to strike the undiscerning. He likewise abounds with sentimental commonplaces, that, from the manner in which they were brought forward, bore an imposing air of novelty. In any well-used copy of the 'Seasons,' the book generally opens of itself with the Rhapsody on Love, or with one of the stories, perhaps of Damon and Musidora. These also are prominent in our Collections of Extracts, and are the parts of his work, which, after all, were probably most efficient in first recommending the author to general notice."

Thomson, in one sense, was fortunate in the title of his poem. But a great poet like Wordsworth might—nay ought, to have chosen another word—or have given of that word a loftier explanation, when applied to Thomson's choice of the Seasons for the subject of his immortal poem. Genius made that choice—not fortune. The "Seasons" are not merely the "title" of his poem, they are his poem, and his poem is the Seasons. But how, pray, can Thomson be said to have been fortunate in the title or the subject either of his poem, in the sense that Mr Wordsworth means? Why, according to him, people knew little, and cared less, about the Seasons! "The art of seeing had in some measure been learned!" That he allows—but that was all—and that all is but little—and surely far from being enough to have disposed people in general to listen to the strains of a poet who painted nature in all her moods, and under all her aspects. Thomson, then, we say, was either most unfortunate in the title of his poem, or there was not that indifference to, and ignorance of, natural scenery in the "wide soul of the world," on which Mr Wordsworth so strenuously insists as part, or rather the whole, of his preceding argument.

The title, Mr Wordsworth says, seemed "to bring the poem home to the prepared sympathies of every one!" What! to the prepared sympathies of those who had merely, in some measure, learned the "art of seeing," and who had "paid," as he says in another sentence, "little accurate attention to the appearances of nature!" Never did the weakest mind ever fall into grosser contradictions, than does here one of the strongest, in vainly labouring to bolster up a bad cause, or rather a silly assertion, which he has desperately ventured on, from a most mistaken imagination, that it was necessary to account for the kind of reception which his own poetry had met with from the present age. The truth is, that had Mr Wordsworth known, when he indited these unlucky and helpless sentences, that his own poetry was, in the best sense of the word, a thousand times more popular than he supposed it to be—and Heaven be praised, for the honour of the age, it was and is so—never had they been written, nor had he here and elsewhere laboured to prove, that, in proportion as poetry was bad, or rather as it was no poetry at all, has it been, and always will be, more and more popular in the age contemporary with the writer. That Thomson, in the Seasons, often writes a vicious style, is true; but it is not true that he always, or generally, does so. His style has its faults, no doubt, and some of them inextricably interwoven with the whole web of his composition. It is a dangerous style to imitate—especially to dunces. But its virtue is divine; and that divine virtue, even in this low world of ours, wins admiration more surely and widely than earthly vice, be it in words, thoughts, feelings, or actions, is a creed that we will not relinquish at the beck or bidding even of the Great Author of the Excursion. That many did—do—and will admire the bad or indifferent passages in the Seasons—won by their false glitter, or commonplace sentimentalism, is no doubt true; but the delight, though as intense as perhaps it may be foolish, with which boys and virgins, woman-mantua-makers, and man-milliners, and "the rest," peruse the rhapsody on Love,—one passage of which we have ventured a little way back to be facetious on,—and hang over the picture of Musidora undressing, while Damon watches the process of disrobing, panting be-him a tree, will never account for the admiration with which the whole world hailed the "Winter," the first of the Seasons published; during which, Thomson had not the barbarity to plunge any young lady naked into the cold bath, nor the ignorance to represent, during such cold weather, any young lady turning her lover sick by the ardour of her looks; and the vehemence of her whole enamoured deportment. The time never was—nor could have been—when such passages were generally esteemed the glory of the poem. Indeed, independently of its own gross absurdity, the assertion is at total variance with that other assertion, equally absurd, that people admired most in the poem what they least understood; for the Rhapsody on Love is certainly very intelligible, nor does there seem much mystery in Musidora going into the water to wash and cool herself on a hot day. Is it not melancholy, then, to hear such a man as Mr Wordsworth, earnestly, and even somewhat angrily, trying to prove that "these are the parts of the work which, after all, were probably most efficient in first recommending the author to general notice?"

With respect to the "sentimental commonplaces with which Thomson abounds," no doubt they were and are popular; and many of them deserve to be so, for they are on a level with the usual current of human feeling, and many of them are eminently beautiful. Thomson had not the philosophical genius of Mr Wordsworth, but he had a warm human heart, and its generous feelings overflow all his poem. Those are not the most poetical parts of the "Seasons" certainly, where such effusions prevail; but still, so far from being either vicious or worthless, they have often a virtue and a worth that ought to be felt by all the children of men. There is something not very natural in the situation of the parties in the story of the "lovely young Lavinia," for example, and much of the sentiment is commonplace enough; but will Mr Wordsworth dare to say,—in support of his theory, that the worst poetry is always at first (and at last too, it would seem, from the pleasure with which that tale is still read by all simple minds) the most popular, —that that Story is a bad one? We should like to hear him say so.

Mr Wordsworth, in all the above false and feeble argumentation, is so blinded by his determination to see every thing in but one light, and that a most mistaken one, that he is insensible to the conclusion to which it all leads, or rather, which is involved in it. Why, according to him, even now, when people have not only learned the "art of seeing," a blessing for which they can never be too thankful, but when descriptive poetry has long flourished far beyond its palmiest state in any other era of our poetry, still are we poor common mortals who admire the "Seasons," just as deaf and blind now, or nearly so, to their real merits—allowed to be transcendent—as our unhappy forefathers were, when that poem first appeared, "a glorious apparition." The Rhapsody on Love, and Damon and Musidora, are still, according to him, its chief attractions—its false ornaments—and its sentimental commonplaces—such as those, we presume, on the benefits of early rising, and,

"Oh! little think the gay licentious proud!"

What a nest of ninnies must all man and womankind be in Mr Wordsworth's eyes!—And is the "Excursion" to be placed by the side of "Paradise Lost," only during the Millennium?

Such is the reasoning! of one of the first of our living (or dead) English poets, against not only the people of Britain, but mankind. One other sentence there is which we had forgotten—but now remember—which is to help us to distinguish, in the case of the reception the "Seasons" met with, between "wonder and legitimate admiration!" "The subject of the work is, the changes produced in the appearances of nature, by the revolution of the year; and, undertaking to write in verse, Thomson pledged himself to treat his subject as became a poet!" How original and profound! Thomson redeemed his pledge, and that great pawnbroker, the public, returned to him his poem at the end of a year and a day. Now, what is the "mighty stream of tendency" of that remark? Were the public, or the people, or the world, gulled by this unheard-of pledge of Thomson, to regard his work with that "wonder which is the natural product of ignorance?" If they were so in his case, why not in every other? All poets pledge themselves to be poetical, but too many of them are wretchedly prosaic—die and are buried, or, what is worse, protract a miserable existence, in spite of sentimental commonplaces, false ornaments, and a vicious style. But Thomson, in spite of all these, leapt at once into a glorious life, and a still more glorious immortality.

There is no mystery in the matter—Thomson—a great poet—poured his genius over a subject of universal interest—and the "Seasons" from that hour to this—then, now, and for ever—have been, are, and will be, loved and admired by all the world. Mr Wordsworth ought to know that all over Scotland, "The Seasons" is an household-book. Let the taste and feeling shewn by the Collectors of Elegant Extracts be poor as possible, yet Thomson's countrymen, high and low, rich and poor, have all along not only gloried in his illustrious fame, but have made a very manual of his great work. It lies in many thousand cottages. We have ourselves seen it in the shepherd's shieling, and in the woodsman's bower—small, yellow-leaved, tatter'd, mean, miserable, calf-skin-bound, smoked, stinking copies—let us not fear to utter the word, ugly but true—yet perused, pored, and pondered over by those humble dwellers, by the winter-ingle or on the summer brae, perhaps with as enlightened—certainly with as imagination-overmastering a delight—as ever enchained the spirits of the high-born and highly taught to their splendid copies lying on richly carved tables, and bound in crimson silk or velvet, in which the genius of painting strove to embody that of poetry, and the printer's art to lend its beauty to the very shape of the words in which the bard's immortal spirit was enshrined. "The art of seeing" has flourished for many centuries in Scotland. Men, women, and children, all look up to her loveful blue or wrathful black skies, with a weather-wisdom that keeps growing from the cradle to the grave. Say not that 'tis alone

"The poor Indian, whose untutor'd mind Sees God in clouds, and hears him in the wind!"

In scriptural language, loftier even than that, the same imagery is applied to the sights seen by the true believer. Who is it "that maketh the clouds his chariot?" The Scottish Peasantry—Highland and Lowland—look much and often on nature thus; and of nature they live in the heart of the knowledge and the religion. Therefore do they love Thomson as an inspired Bard—only a little lower than the Prophets. In like manner have the people of Scotland—from time immemorial—enjoyed the use of their ears. Even persons somewhat hard of hearing, are not deaf to her waterfalls. In the sublime invocation to Winter, which we have quoted—we hear Thomson recording his own worship of nature in his boyish days, when he roamed among the hills of his father's parish, far away from the manse. In those strange and stormy delights did not thousands of thousands of the Scottish boyhood familiarly live among the mists and snows? Of all that number he alone had the genius to "here eternize on earth" his joy—but many millions have had souls to join religiously in the hymns he chanted! Yea, his native Land, with one mighty voice, has, nearly for a century, responded,

"These, as they change, Almighty Father, these Are but the varied God!"

FYTTE SECOND.

BELOVED and beautiful Buchanan Lodge, for a few—for four months, farewell! This is the first dim day of November; and for the City we leave thee, not without reluctance, on the first clear day of March, by the blessing of Heaven, once more to creep into thy blooming bourne. Ay, oft and oft ere then, to while away a sunny forenoon among the undecaying evergreens, to breathe the balm of thy Christmas roses, and for one Gentle bosom to cull the earliest crocuses that yellow through the thin snows of Spring.

In truth, we know not well why we should ever leave thee, for thou art the Darling of all the Seasons; and Winter, so churlish elsewhere, is ever bland to thee, and, daily alighting in these gardens, like an angel of heaven, loves to fold and unfold, in the cool sunshine, the stainless splendour of his pale-plumaged wings. But we are no hermit. Dear to us though Nature be, here, hand and hand with Art, walking through this peaceful but not unpeopled paradise, a voice comes to us from the city-heart—a low deep voice, haunting us at midnight, when the thoughtful spirit has a divine disregard of sleep, and winning us away from the stillness of solitude into the stir of human life. Milton speaks of a region and often have we visited it, borne on thy flight, Imagination!—a region of pure, passionless, and profoundest peace. Death will realize that dream! But while yet we pursue the ends of this our mortal being, in the mystery of the brain, whence ideas arise, and in the mystery of the heart, whence emotions flow—kindred and congenial all—thought ever blending with feeling, reason with imagination, and conscience with passion—’tis our duty to draw our delight from intercommunion with the spirit of our kind. Oh! weakest or wickedest of mortals are your soul-sick, life-loathing, world-wearied men! In solitude, the soul is swallowed up in selfishness; and out of selfishness what sins and crimes may not grow!

Which men call Earth;”

At the best, moral stagnation ensues—and the spirit becomes, like “a green-mantled pool,” the abode of reptiles.

Then ever welcome to us be living faces and living voices, the light and the music of reality, dearer far than any mere ideas or emotions hanging or floating aloof by themselves in the atmosphere of imagination! Blest be the cordial grasp of the hand of friendship—blest the tender embrace of the arms of love! Nay, smile not, fair reader, at an old man’s fervour—for Love is a gracious spirit, who deserteth not declining age. That divinity it is who sometimes bringeth One in her hand even fairer than thou—one bright and beautiful as the very Evening Star, who rejoices in a filial joy to shine for a hallowed hour all by herself in the sky-calm of our home. Yes! on the disappearance of thy setting, O daughter of our soul! continues not the room brighter with the prolonged shadow of thy presence, than ever it might be with fairest Phantasy,

“For thou art heavenly, she an empty dream.”

With an affectionate sadness, therefore, if indeed sadness be not too strong a word—over which regret breathes, and scarcely breathes—like a faint haze somewhat obscuring a moonlight night—once more, Buchanan Lodge, do we bid thee no long farewell. The Drosky is at the door—and, my eye! what a figure is Peter! There he sits, like a bear, with the ribands in his paws—no part visible of his human face or form divine, but his small red eyes—and his ruby nose, whose regrown enormity laughs at Liston. One little month ago, the knife of that skilful surgeon pared it down to the dimensions of a Christian proboscis. Again ’tis like a frost-reddened Swedish turnip. Pretty Poll, with small delicate pale features, sits beside him like a snow-drop. How shaggy since he returned from our Highland tour is Filho da Puta! His mane long as his tail—and the hair on his ears like that on his fetlocks. He absolutely reminds us of Hogg’s Bonassus. Aye, bless these patent-steps—on the same principle as those by which we ascend our nightly couch. We are self-deposited in our Drosky. Oh! the lazy luxury of an air-seat! We seem to be sitting on nothing but a voluptuous warmth, restorative as a bath. And then what furry softness envelopes our feet! Yes—Mrs Gentle—Mrs Gentle—thy Cashmere shawl, twined round our bust, feels almost as silken-smooth as thine own, and scented is it with the balm of thy own lips. Boreas blows on it tenderly as a zephyr—and the wintry sunshine seems summery as it plays on the celestial colours. Thy pelisse, too, over our old happy shoulders, purple as the neck of the dove when carkering round his mate. Thy comforter, too, is in our bosom—and the dear, delightful, delicious, wicked worsted thrills through skin and flesh to our very heart. It dirls. Drive away, Peter. Farewell Lodge—and welcome, in a jiffy, Moray-Place.

There we go, twelve miles an hour easy, with long strong light elastic strides illustrative of Arab blood. Ten years ago, and thou, Filho! wert a flyer at a fence. Dost thou remember, old boy, how for a cool five hundred, thou cleared'st yon canal in a style that rivalled that of the red-deer across the chasms of Cairngorm? All we had to do, was to hold hard, and not ride over the hounds when, running breast-high close on the rear of reynard, the savage pack wakened the welkin with the tumultuous hubbub of their death-cry, and whippers-in and huntsman were flogging on their faltering flight in vain, fields and forests behind thy heels that glauced and glittered in the frosty sunshine. What steed in all broad Scotland at a steeple-chase was like thee? Thy hoofs scorned the strong stubble, and skimmed the deep fallows, in which all other horses—heavy there as dragoons—seemed fetlock-bound, or laboured on in staggerings, soil-sunk to the knees. Ditches dwindled beneath thy bounds, and rivers were as rills; or, if, in flood, they rudely overran their banks, into the spate plunged thy sixteen hands and a half height, like a Polar monster leaping from an iceberg into the sea, and then lifting up thy small head and fine neck and high shoulder, like a Draco from the weltering waters, with a few proud pawings to which the recovered greensward rang, thy whole bold bright-brown bulk reappeared on the bank, crested by old Christopher, and after one short snorting pause, over the miry meadows—tantivy, tantivy—away! away! away!

Oh! Son of a Rep! were not those glorious days? But Time has gently laid his fine finger on us both, Filho; and never more must we two be seen by the edge of the cover,

“When first the hunter's starting horn is heard

Upon the golden hills.”

'Tis the last-learned and highest lesson of Wisdom, Filho, in man's studious obedience to Nature's laws—to know when to stop in his career. Pride, Passion, Pleasure—all urge him on; while Prudence, Propriety, and Peace, cry halt! halt! halt! That mandate we have timeously obeyed,—and having, unblamed, we hope, and blameless, carried on the pastimes of youth into manhood, and even through the prime of manhood on to the verge of age—on that verge, after some few farewell vagaries up and down the debateable land, we had the resolution to raise our bridle-hand, to unloosen the spurs from our heels, and to dismount from the stateliest and swiftest steed, Filho, that ever wafted mortal man over moor and mountain, or carried him as on a storm-cloud across the cataracts.

And now, doucely and decently sitting in our Drosky, behold us driven by Peter, proud as Punch, to steer along the staring streets, the great-grandson of the Desert-Born! Yet—yet—couldst thou lead the field, Filho, with old Kit Castor on thy spine! But though our day be not yet quite gone by, we think we see the stealing shades of eve, and a little farther on in the solemn vista, the darkness of night; and, therefore, like wise children of nature, not unproud of the past, not ungrateful for the present, and unafraid of the future, thus do we now skim along the road of life, broad and smooth to our heart's content, able to pay the turnpikes, and willing, when we shall have reached the end of our journey, to lie down, in hope, at the goal.

What pretty, little, low lines of garden-fronted cottages! leading us along out of rural into suburban cheerfulness! till now, over the Bridge, and past the Oriental-looking Oil-Gas Works, with a sweep, we wind into the full view of PITT Street, (what a glorious name!) steep as some straight cliff-glen, and an approach truly majestic—yea, call it at once magnificent—right up to the great city's heart. "There goes old Christopher North!" the bright boys in the play-ground of the New Academy exclaim. God bless you, you little rascals!—We could almost find it in our heart to ask the Rector for a holiday. But, under him, all your days are holidays—for when the precious hours of study are enlightened by a classic spirit, how sweetly do they melt into those of play!

"Gay hope is yours, by fancy fed,
Less pleasing when possess;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast;
Yours buxom health, of rosy hue,
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively cheer, of vigour born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly th' approach of morn."

Descending from our Drosky, we find No. 99, Moray Place, exhibiting throughout all its calm interior the self-same expression it wore the day we left it for the Lodge eight months ago. There is our venerable winter hat—as like ourselves, it is said, as it can stare—sitting on the circular in the Entrance-hall. Every thing has been tenderly dusted as if by hands that touched with a Sabbath-feeling; and though the furniture cannot be said to be new, yet while it is in all sobered, it is in nothing faded. You are at first unaware of its richness on account of its simplicity—its grace is felt gradually to grow out of its comfort—and that which you thought but ease lightens into elegance, while there is but one image in nature which can adequately express its repose—that of a hill-sheltered field by sunset, under a fresh-fallen vest of virgin snow. For then snow blushes with a faint crimson—nay, sometimes when Sol is extraordinarily splendid, not faint, but "beautiful exceedingly" with a gorgeousness of colouring that fears not to face in rivalry the western clouds.

Let no man have two houses with one set of furniture. Home's deepest delight is undisturbance. Some people think no articles fixtures but grates. But sofas, and ottomans, and chairs, and footstools, and screens—and above all beds—all are fixtures in the dwelling of a wise man, cognoscitive and sensitive of the blessings of this life. Each has its own place assigned to it by the taste, tact, and feeling, of the master or mistress (alas! where is she?) of the mansion, where order and elegance minister to comfort, and comfort is but a homely word for happiness. In various moods we vary their arrangement—nor is even the easiest of all easy-chairs secure for life against being gently pushed on its wheels from chimney-nook to window-corner, when the sunshine may have extinguished the fire, and the blue sky tempts the Paterfamilias, or him who is but an uncle, to lie back, with half-shut eyes, and gaze upon the cheerful purity, even like a shepherd on the hill. But these little occasional disarrangements serve but to preserve the spirit of permanent arrangement, without which the very virtue of domesticity dies. What sacrilege, therefore, against the Lares and Penates, to turn a whole house topsyturvy, from garret to cellar, regularly as May flowers deck the zone of the year! Why, a Turkey, or a Persian, or even a Wilton, or a Kidderminster carpet, is as much the garb of the wooden floor inside, as the grass is of the earthen floor outside of your house. Would you lift and lay down the greensward? But without further illustration—be assured the cases are kindred—and so too with sofas and shrubs, tent-beds and trees. Independently, however, of these analogies, not fanciful but lying deep in the nature of things, the inside of one's tabernacle, in town and country, ought ever to be sacred from all radical revolutionary movements, and to lie for ever in a waking dream of graceful repose. All our affections towards lifeless things become tenderer and deeper in the continuous and unbroken flow of domestic habit. The eye gets lovingly familiarized with each object occupying its own peculiar and appropriate place, and feels in a moment when the most insignificant is missing or removed. We say not a word about children, for, fortunately, since we are yet unmarried, we have none; but even they, if brought up Christians, are no dissenters from this creed, and however ractory in the nursery, in an orderly kept parlour or drawing-room how like so many pretty little white mice do they glide cannily along the floor? Let no such horror then as a fitting ever befall us or our friends! O mercy! only look at a long huge train of waggons, heaped up to the windows of the first floors, moving along the dust-driving or mire-choked streets with furniture from a gutted town-house towards one standing in the rural shades with an empty stomach! All is dimmed or destroyed—chairs crushed on the tableland, and four-posted beds lying helplessly with their astonished feet up to heaven—a sight that might make the angels weep!

True wisdom soon accommodates itself even to involuntary or inevitable change—but to that which flows from our own sweet will, however sudden and strong, it instantly moulds itself in a novel delight, with all our familiar and domestic habits. Why, we have not been in at 99, Moray Place, for a week—nay, for two days and nights—till you might swear we had been all our days a Citi, we look so like a Native. The rustic air of the Lodge has entirely left us, and all our movements are entirely metropolitan. You see before you a gentleman of the old school, who knows that the eyes of the town are upon him when he seeks the open air, and who preserves, even in the privacy of the parlour, that dignity of dress and demeanour which, during winter, befits his age, his rank, and his character. Now, we shave every morning; John, who, in his boyish days, served under Barbarossa, lightly passes the comb through our “sable silvered,” and then, in our shawl dressing-gown, we descend about ten to our study, and sit, not unstately, beside the hissing urn, at our protracted breakfast. In one little month or less, “ere our shoes are old,” we feel as if we had belonged to this house, and it to us, from our birth. The Lodge is seen to be standing in its stillness, far, far away, like some scene in a half-forgotten dream, of which the dim glimpses are felt to be delightful, and by strange sympathies through the imagination to affect the heart. Dear memories of the pensive past—and the past is always pensive—now and then come floating upon the cheerful present—like birds of fairest plumage floating far inland from the main. But there is no idle longing—no vain regret. This, we say, is true wisdom. For each scene and season—each pleasure and place, ought to be trusted to itself, in the economy of human life, and to be allowed its own proper power over our spirit. People in the country are often restless to return to town—and people in town unhappy till they rush away into the country—thus cheating their entire existence out of its natural calm and satisfaction. Not so we. We give both their due—and that due is, an almost undivided delight to each, while we live under its reign. For Nature, believe us, is no jealous mistress. She is an affectionate wife, who, being assured of his fidelity, is not afraid to trust her husband out of her sight, and who waits with cheerful patience for his return, duly welcomed with a conjugal shower of tears, smiles, and kisses.

“When still the Town affairs do call him thence,”

What kind of a Winter—we wonder—are we to have in the way of wind and weather? We trust it will be severe. As the last summer set in with his usual severity, the present Winter must not be behindhand with him; but after an occasional week's rain of a commendably boisterous character, come out in full fig of frost. He has two suits which we greatly admire, combining the splendour of a court-dress with the strength of a work-day garb—we mean his garments of black and his garments of white frost. He looks best in the former, we think, on to about Christmas—and the latter become the old gentleman well from that festival season, on to about the day sacred to a class of persons who never read this Magazine.

Of all the months of the year November—in our climate—whether in town or country, bears the worst character. He is almost universally thought to be a sour, sulky, sullen, savage, dim, dull, dark, disconsolate, yet designing month—in fewer words, a month scarcely fit to live. Abhorring all personalities, we have never given in to this national abuse of November. We know him well—and though we admit at once that he is no beauty, and that his manners are at the best bluff, at the worst repulsive, yet on those who choose to cultivate his acquaintance, his character continues so to mellow and ameliorate itself, that they come at last, if not to love, to like him, and even to prefer his company “in the season of the year,” to that of other more brilliant visitors. So true is it both with months and men, that it requires only to know the most unpleasant of them, and to see them during a favourable phasis, in order to regard them with that Christian complacency which a good heart sheds over all its habits. ’Tis unlucky for November—poor fellow—that he follows October. October is a month so much admired by the world, that we often wonder he has not been spoiled. “What a glorious October!” “Why, you will surely not leave us till October comes!” “October is the month of all months—and till you see him, you have not seen the Lakes.” We acknowledge his claims. He is often truly delightful. But like other brilliant persons, he is not only privileged to be at times extremely dull, but his intensest stupidity is panegyricized as wit of the first water—while his not unfrequent rudeness, of which many a common month would be ashamed, passes for the ease of high-birth, or the eccentricity of genius. A very different feeling indeed exists towards unfortunate November. The moment he shews his face, all other faces are glum. We defy month or man, under such a trial, to make himself even tolerably agreeable. He feels that he is no favourite, and that a most sinister misinterpretation will be put on all his motions, manners, thoughts, words, and deeds. A man or a month so circumstanced is much to be pitied. Think, look, speak, act as he will—yea, even more like an angel than a man or a month—every eyebrow arches—every nostril distends—every lip curls towards him in contempt, while blow over the ice that enchains all his feelings and faculties heavy-chill whisperings of “who is that disagreeable fellow?” In such a frozen atmosphere would not cloquence be congealed on the lips of an Ulysses, and poetry prosified on those of an Apollo!

Give then, we say, the devil his due, and November is company for any Christian. Believe us, that the celestial phenomena are now often exceedingly and singularly beautiful.

See! a great City in a mist! All is not shrouded—at intervals something huge is beheld in the sky—what we know not, tower, temple, spire, dome, or a pile of nameless structures—one after the other fading away, or sinking and settling down into the gloom that grows deeper and deeper like a night. The stream of life seems almost hushed in the blind blank—yet you hear, ever and anon, now here, now there, the slow sound of feet moving to their own dull echoes, and lo! the Sun “Looks through the horizontal misty air, Shorn of his beams,”

like some great ghost. Ay, he looks! does he not? straight on your face, as if you two were the only beings there—and were held looking at each other in some strange communion. Surely you must sometimes have felt that emotion, when the Luminary seemed no longer luminous, but a dull-red brazen orb, sick unto the death—obscure the Shedder of Light, and the Giver of Life lifeless!

The Sea has sent a tide-borne wind to the City, and you almost start in wonder to behold all the heavens clear of clouds, (how beautiful was the clearing!) and bending in a mighty blue bow, that brightly over-arches all the brightened habitations of men! The spires shoot up into the sky,—the domes tranquilly rest there,—all the roofs glitter as with diamonds, all the white walls are lustrous, save where, here and there, some loftier range of buildings hangs its steadfast shadow o’er square or street, magnifying the city, by means of separate multitudes of structures, each town-like in itself, and the whole gathered together by the outward eye, and the inward imagination, worthy indeed of the name of Metropolis, and glorifying the nation's grandeur.

"We bid the spirit of our country hail!"

This is such a day. Let us sit down—we two together—for three is bad company—on this bench below the shadow of the Parthenon. It is the first fine frost—and the air is now so rarified, that you can see not indistinctly the figure of a man on Arthur's Seat. Not a flake—or as we say in our Doric—not a pile of snow—and the Calton, though a city hill—is as green as the Carter towering over the Border-forest. Not many years ago, no stone edifice was on his unviolated verdure—he was a true rural Mount, where the lassies bleached their claes, in a pure atmosphere aloof from the city smoke almost as the sides and summit of Arthur's Seat. Flocks of sheep might have grazed here, had there been enclosures, and many milch cows. But in their absence, a pastoral character was given to the Hill, by its green silence, here and there broken by the songs and laughter of these linen-bleaching lassies, and by the arm-in-arm strolling of lovers in the morning light or the evening shade. Here married people used to walk with their children, thinking and feeling themselves to be in the country; and here elderly gentlemen, like ourselves, with gold-headed canes, or simple crutches, mused and meditated on the on-goings of the noisy lower world. Such a Hill, so close to a great City, yet undisturbed by it, and imbued at all times with a feeling of sweeter peace, because of the immediate neighbourhood of the din and stir, of which its green recess high up in the blue air never partook, seems now, in the mingled dream of imagination and memory, to have been indeed a superurban Paradise! But a city cannot, ought not to be, controlled in its growth; the natural beauty of this Hill has had its day; now it is broken all round with wide walks, along which you might drive chariots a-breast; broad flights of stone-stairs lead up along the once elastic brae-turf; and its bosom is laden with towers and temples, monuments and mausoleums. Along one side, where hanging gardens might have been, magnificent as those of the old Babylon, stretches the macadamized Royal Road to London, flanked by one receptacle for the quiet dead, and by another for the unquiet living—a churchyard, and a prison dying away in a bride-well. But, making amends for such hideous deformities, with front nobly looking to the cliffs, over a dell of dwellings seen dimly through the smoke-mist ever there, stands, sacred to the Muses, an Edifice that might have pleased the eye of Pericles. Alas! immediately below one that would have turned the brain of Palladio. Modern Athens indeed! Few are the Grecians among thy architects; those who are not Goths are Picts—and the King himself of the Painted People designed Nelson's Monument.

But who can be querulous on such a day? Weigh all its defects, designed and undesigned, and is not Edinburgh yet a noble city? Arthur's Seat! how like a lion! The magnificent range of Salisbury Craigs, on which a battery might be built, to blow the whole inhabitation to atoms! Our friend here, the Calton, with his mural crown! Our Castle on his Cliff! Gloriously hung round with national histories along all his battlements! Do they not embosom "mine own romantic town" in a style of grandeur worthy, if such it be, of a "City of Palaces?" Call all things by their right names, in heaven and on earth. Palaces they are not—nor are they built of marble; but they are stately houses, framed of stone from Craig-Leith quarry, almost as pale as the Parian; and when the winter sun looks fitfully through the storm, or as now, serenely through the calm, richer than Parian in the tempestuous or the peaceful light. Never beheld we the city wearing such a majestic metropolitan aspect.

"Aye, proudly fling thy white arms to the sea, Queen of the unconquer'd North!"

How near the Frith! Gloriously does it supply the want of a river. It is a river, though seeming, and sweeping into, the sea; but a river that man may never bridge; and though still now as the sky, we wish you saw it in its magnificent madness, when brought on the roarings of the stormful tide,

"Breaks the long wave that at the Pole began!"

Coast-cities alone are Queens. All inland are but Tributaries. Earth's empyr belongs to the Power that sees its shadow in the sea. Two separate Cities, not twins—but one of ancient, and one of modern birth—how harmoniously in spite of form and features characteristically different, do they coalesce into one Capital! This miracle, methinks, is wrought by the Spirit of Nature on the World of Art. Her great features subdue almost into similarity a Whole constructed of such various elements, for it is all felt to be kindred with those guardian cliffs. Those eternal heights hold the Double City together in an amity that breathes over both the same national look—the impression of the same national soul. In the olden time, she gathered herself almost under the very wing of the Castle, for in her heroic heart she ever heard, unalarmed but watchful, the alarms of war, and that cliff, under heaven, was on earth the rock of her salvation. But now the foundation of that rock, whence yet the tranquil burgher hears the morning and the evening bugle, is beautified by gardens that love its pensive shadow, for that it tames the light to flowers by rude feet untrodden, and yielding garlands for the brows of perpetual peace. Thence elegance and grace arose; and though

‘The ancient spirit be not dead,
Old times, methinks, are breathing there,” as now chime the merry music bells from St Giles’s Dome,

“In shape and gesture proudly eminent”
over that wilderness of antique structures picturesquely huddled along the blue line of sky—as Wilkie once finely said, like the spine of some enormous animal—yet all along this side of that unriveted and mound-divided dell, now shines a new world of radiant dwellings, declaring by their regular but not monotonous magnificence, that the same people, whose “perfidious genius” preserved them by war unhumiliated among the nations in days of darkness, have now drawn a strength as invincible, from the beautiful arts which have been cultivated by peace in the days of light.

And is the spirit of the inhabitation there worthy of the place inhabited? We are a Scotchman. And the great English Moralist has asked, where may a Scotchman be found who loves not the honour or the glory of his country better than truth? We are that Scotchman—though for our country would we die. Yet dearer too than life is to us the honour—if not the glory of our country—and had we a thousand lives, proudly would we lay them all down in the dust rather than give—or see given—one single stain on which as yet no stain appears save those glorious weather-stains, that have fallen on its folds from the clouds of war and the storms of battle. Sufficient praise to the spirit of our land, that she knows how to love, admire, and rival—not in vain—the spirit of high-hearted and heroic England. Long as we and that other noble Isle,

“Unto the silver cross, to Scotland dear,”

“Set as an emerald in the casing sea,” in triple union breathe as one,

“Then come against us the whole world in arms,
And we will meet them!”

What is a people without pride! But let them know that its root rests on noble pillars; and in the whole range of strength and stateliness, what pillars are there stronger and statelier than those glorious two—Genius and Liberty? Here valour has fought—here philosophy has meditated—here poetry has sung. Are not our living yet as brave as our dead? All wisdom has not perished with the sages to whom we have built or are building monumental tombs. The muses yet love to breathe the pure mountain-air of Caledon. And have we not amongst us one myriad-minded man, whose name, without offence to that high priest of nature, or his devoutest worshippers, may flow from our lips, even when they utter that of SHAKESPEARE?

Besides all that, did not his most gracious Majesty, the late King, declare, that we were “A nation of gentlemen?”

Edinburgh, during the dead of Summer, is a far more solitary place than Glenetive, Glenevis, or Glen-co. There is not, however, so much danger of being lost in it, as in the moor of Rannoch—for streets and squares, though then utterly tenantless, are useful as landmarks to the pilgrim passing through what seems to be

"A still forsaken City of the Dead!"

But, like a frost-bound river, suddenly dissolved by a strong thaw, and coming down in spate from the mountains to the low lands, about the beginning of November, Life annually re-overflowed our metropolis, with a noise like "the rushing of many chariots." The streets, that for months had been like the stony channels of dried-up streams—only not quite so well paved—are again all a-murmur, and people addicted to the study of political economy, begin to hold

"Each strange tale devoutly true" in the Malthusian theory of population. What swarms keep hovering round the great Northern Hive! Add eke after eke to the skep, and still seems it too small to contain all the insects. Edinburgh is almost as large as London. Nay, don't stare. We never speak positively, you may have noticed, but always comparatively; and as England is somewhere about six times more populous than Scotland, you may, by brushing up your arithmetic, and applying to our intelligent friend Mr Cleland's census, taken a good many years ago, and then allowing for the vast influx since, discover that we are not so far wrong in our apparent paradox.

Were November in himself a far more weariful month than he is, Edinburgh would nevertheless be glad-some, in the midst of all his gloom, even as a wood in May, with the Gathering of the Clans. The country flows into the town—all its life seems to do so—and to leave nothing behind but the bare trees and hedges. Equipages again go glittering along all the streets and squares, circuses and crescents—and one might think that the entire "nation of ladies and gentlemen"—for the King meant to include the sex in his compliment—were moving through their metropolis. Amusement and business walk hand in hand—you hardly know, from their cheerful countenances, which is which—for the Scotch, though a high-cheeked, are not an ill-favoured folk in their features, and though their mouths are somewhat of the widest, their teeth are white as well as sharp, and on the opening of their ruddy lips, their ivory-cases are still farther brightened by hearty smiles. "Twould be false to say that their figures are distinguished by an air of fashion, for we have no court, and our nobles are almost all absentees. But though, in one sense, the men are ugly customers, as Cockneys will find,

"Who chance to tread upon their free-born toe," yet, literally, they are a comely crew, and if formed into battalions in marching order, would make the National Guard in Paris, who now protect the infant liberties of France, and with that antique republican La Fayette at their head, from all scaith and scorn save the monarchy, as represented by a cipher-king on a phantom-throne, look like

"that small infantry

Warr'd on by cranes;"

for the Six-Foot Club might, if thinned by cholera morbus, recruit itself up to the Old Hundred, from one section of every street, and in these, as well as in those days, are there Grants and Giants. Our females have figures that can thaw any frost, and 'tis universally allowed that they walk well, though their style of pedestrianism does not so readily recall to the imagination Virgil's picture of Camilla flying along the heads of corn without touching their ears, as the images of paviours with post-looking mallets driving down dislodged stones into the streets. Intermingling with the lighter and more elastic footsteps of your Southron dames, the on-goings of our native virgins produce a pleasant variety of motion in the forenoon mêlée that along the Street of Princes now goes nodding in the sun-glint.

"Amid the general dance of minstrelsy" who could wear a long face, unless it were in sympathy with his length of ears? A din of multitudinous joy hums in the air, you cannot see the city for the houses, its inhabitants for the people; and, as for finding any one particular acquaintance in the crowd, why, to use an elegant simile, you might as well go search for a needle in a stack of straw.

But hark! a hollow sound, distant, but as yet referred to no distinct place—then a faint mixture of a clear chime that is almost music—now a tune, “that warbles melody”—and, at last, rousing the massy multitude to enthusiasm, a military march, swelling various, profound, and high, with drum, trombone, serpent, trump, clarionet, fife, flute, and cymbal, bringing slowly on (is it the measured tramp of the feet of men, or the confused trampling of horses?) banners floating over the procession, above the glitter of steel, and the golden glow of helmets? ’Tis a regiment of cavalry—hurra! the Carbineers! Lo! the advanced guard.

“There England sends her men, of men the chief,”

still, staid, bold, bronzed faces, with keen eyes, looking straightforward from between sabres; while beneath the equable but haughty motion of their steeds, almost disciplined as their riders, with long black horse hair flowing in martial majesty, nod their high Roman casques. The sweet storm of music has been passing by while we were gazing, and is now somewhat deadened by the retiring distance, and by that mass of buildings, (how the windows are alive, and agaze with faces!) while troop after troop comes on, still moving, it is felt by all, to the motion of the warlike tune, though now across the Waterloo Bridge sounding like an echo, till the glorious war-pageant is all gone by, and the dull day is deadened down again into the stillness and silence of an ignoble peace.

Such a spectacle does not belong, to be sure, peculiarly to November; but ’twas in November that last we saw it, and, at the sight, “Shoulder’d our crutch, and shew’d how fields are won!”

Much more characteristic of November is this mean and miserable day that, while we are now Rhapsodizing on Winter, is drizzling all Edinburgh with the worst of all imaginable Scottish mists—an Easterly Harr. We know that they infest all the year, but they shew their poor spite in its bleakest bitterness in March and in November. Earth and heaven are not only not worth looking at in an Easterly Harr, but the Visible is absolute wretchedness, and people wonder why they were born. The visitation begins with a sort of characterless haze, waxing more and more wetly obscure, till you know not whether it be rain, snow, or sleet, that drenches your clothes in dampness, till you feel it in your skin, then in your flesh, then in your bones, then in your marrow, and then in your mind. Your blinking eyes have it too—and so, shut it as you will, has your moping mouth. Yet the streets, though looking blue, are not puddled, and the dead cat lies dry in the gutter. There is no eavesdropping—no gushing of water-spouts. To say it rained would be no breach of veracity, but a mere mistatement of a melancholy fact. The truth is, that the weather cannot rain, but keeps spit, spit, spitting, in a style sufficient to irritate Socrates—or even Moses himself; and yet true, veritable, sincere, genuine, and authentic Rain could not—or if he could would not—so thoroughly soak you and your whole wardrobe, were you to allow him a day to do it, as that shabby imitation of a tenth-rate shower, in about the time of a usual-sized sermon. So much cold and so much wet, with so little to shew for it, is a disgrace to the atmosphere, which it will take weeks of the sunniest which the weather can afford to wipe off. But the stores of sunniness, which it is in the power of Winter in this northern latitude to accumulate, cannot be immense, and, therefore, we verily believe that it would be too much to expect that it ever can make amends for the hideous horrors of this Easterly Harr. O the Cut-throat!

Is it on such days that suicides rush to judgment? That sin is mysterious as insanity—their graves are unintelligible as the cells in Bedlam. Oh! the brain and the heart of man! Therein is the only Hell. Small these regions in space, and of narrow room—but haunted, may they be, with all the Fiends and all the Furies. A few nerves transmit to the soul despair or bliss. At the touch of something, whence and wherefore sent, who can say—something that serenoes or troubles, soothes or jars—she soars up into life and light, just as you may have seen a dove suddenly cleave the sunshine—or down she dives into death and darkness, like a shot eagle tumbling into the sea!

Materialism! Immaterialism! Oh! why should mortals, whom conscience tells that they are immortals, bewildered and bewildering ponder upon the dust! Do your duty to God and man, and fear not, that when that dust dies, the spirit that breathed by it will live for ever. Feels not that spirit its immortality in each sacred thought? When did ever religious soul fear annihilation? Or shudder to think that, having once known, it could ever forget God? Such forgetfulness is in the idea of eternal death. Therefore is eternal death impossible to us who can hold communion with our Maker. Our knowledge of Him—dim and remote though it be—is a God-given pledge that he will redeem us from the doom of the grave.

Let us, then, and all our friends, believe, with Coleridge, in his beautiful poem of the "Nightingale," that

"In Nature there is nothing melancholy," not even November. The disease of the body may cause disease in the soul; yet not the less trust we in the mercy of the merciful,—not the less strive we to keep feeding and trimming that spiritual lamp which is within us, even when it flickers feebly in the dampy gloom, like an earthly lamp left in a vaulted sepulchre, about to die among the dead. Heaven seems to have placed a power in our will as mighty as it is mysterious. Call it not Liberty, lest you should wax proud; call it not Necessity, lest you should despair. But turn from the oracles of man—still dim, even in their clearest responses—to the Oracles of God, which are never dark; or, if so, but to eyes not constantly accustomed to sustain the celestial splendour. Bury all your books—when you feel the night of scepticism gathering around you—bury them all, powerful though you may have deemed their spells to illuminate the unfathomable—open your Bible, and all the spiritual world will be as bright as day.

"Dark with excessive bright,"

The disease of the body may cause disease to the soul! Aye, madness.

Some rapture in the soul makes the brain numb, and thence sudden or lingering death;—some rapture in the brain makes the soul insane, and thence life worse than death, and haunted by horrors beyond what is dreamt of the grave, and all its corruption. Perhaps the line fullest of meaning that ever was written, is

"Mens sana in corpore sano."

When nature feels the flow of its vital blood pure and unimpeded, what unutterable gladness bathes the spirit in that one feeling of—health! Then the mere consciousness of existence is like that emotion which Milton speaks of as breathed from the bowers of Paradise—

"Vernal delight and joy, able to drive
All sadness but despair!"

It does more—for despair itself cannot prevail against it. What a dawn of bliss rises upon the soul with the dawn of light, when the soul is healthful as the sun! Then

"It feels that it is greater than it knows."

God created the earth and the air beautiful through the senses; and at the uplifting of a little lid, a whole flood of imagery is let in upon the spirit, all of which becomes part of its very self, as if the enjoying and the enjoyed were one. Health flies away like an angel, and her absence disenchant the earth. What shadows then pass over the ethereal surface of the spirit, from the breath of disordered matter!—from the first scarcely-felt breath of despondency, to the last scowling blackness of despair! Often men know not what power placed the fatal fetters upon them—they see even that a link may be open, and that one effort might fling off the bondage; but their souls are in slavery, and will not be free. Till something like a fresh wind, or a sudden sunbeam, comes across them, and in a moment their whole existence is changed, and they see the very vanishing of their most dismal and desperate dream.

"Somewhat too much of this"—so let us strike the chords to a merrier measure—to a "liveller lilt"—as suits the variable spirit of our Winter Rhapsody. Be it observed then, that the sole certain way of getting rid of the blue devils is to drown them in a shower-bath. You would not suppose that we are subject to the blue devils? Yet we are sometimes their very slave. When driven to it by their lash, every occupation, which when free we resort to as pastime, becomes taskwork; nor will these dogged masters suffer us to purchase emancipation with the proceeds of the toil of our groaning genius. But whenever the worst comes to the worst, and we almost wish to die, so that we might escape the galling pressure of our chains, we sport buff, and into the shower-bath. Yet such is the weakness of poor human nature, that, like a criminal on the scaffold, shifting the signal kerchief from hand to hand, much to the irritation of his excellency the hangman—one of the most impatient of men—and more to the satisfaction of the crowd, the most patient of men and women—we often stand shut up in that sentry-looking canvass box, dexterously, and sinistrously fingering the string, perhaps for five shrinking, and shuddering, and grueing minutes, ere we can summon up desperation to pull down upon ourselves the rushing waterfall! Soon as the agony is over, we bounce out the colour of beet-root, and survey ourselves in a five-foot mirror, with an amazement that, on each successive exhibition, is still as fresh as when we first experienced it,

“ In life’s morning march, when our spirits were young.”

By and by, we assume the similitude of an immense boiled lobster, that has leapt out of the pan—and then seeming for a while to be an emblematical, or symbolical representation of the setting Sun, we sober down into a faint pink, like that of the Morn, and finally subside into our own permanent flesh-light, which, as we turn our back upon ourselves, after the fashion of some of his majesty’s ministers, for example Sir Robert Peel, reminds us of that line in Cowper, descriptive of the November Moon,

Resplendent less, but of an ampler round!”

Like that of the eagle, our youth is renewed—we feel strong as the horse in Homer—a divine glow permeates our being, as if it were the subdued spiritual essence of caloric. An intense feeling of self—not self-love, mind ye, and the farthest state imaginable in this wide world from selfishness—elevates us far up above the clouds, into the loftiest regions of the sunny blue, and we seem to breathe an atmosphere, of which every glorious gulp is inspiration. Despondency is thrown to the dogs. Despair appears in his true colours, a more grotesque idiot than Grimaldi, and we treat him with a guffaw. All ante-bath difficulties seem now—what they really are—facilities of which we are by far too much elated to avail ourselves; dangers that used to appear appalling are felt now to be such shameful securities as have been satisfactory to Dr Philpotts;—obstacles, like mountains, lying in our way of life as we walked towards the temple of Apollo or Plutus, we smile at the idea of surmounting, so molehillish do they hythe, and we kick them aside like an old foot-stool. Let the country ask us for a scheme to pay off the national debt—there she has it; do you request us to have the kindness to leap over the moon?—there we go; Mr Blackwood has but to say the word, and lo! a ready-made Leading Article is in his hand, a Rhapsody on Winter, promotive of the sale of countless numbers of “ my Magazine,” and of the happiness of countless numbers of mankind. We feel—and the feeling proves the fact—as bold as Joshua the son of Nun—as brave as David the son of Jesse—as wise as Solomon the son of David—and as proud as Nebuchadnezzar, the son of Nebopolazzar. We survey our image in the mirror—and think of Adam. We put ourselves into the posture of the Belvidere Apollo, “ Then view the Lord of the unerring bow,

The God of life, and poesy, and light,
The Sun in human arms array’d, and brow,

All radiant from his triumph in the fight.
The shaft hath just been shot—the arrow bright

With an immortal vengeance; in his eye
And nostril, beautiful disdain, and might,
And majesty, flash their full lightnings by,
Developing in that one glance the Deity.”

Up four flight of stairs we fly—for the bath is in the double-sunk story—ten steps at a bound—and in five minutes have devoured one quar-

tern loaf, six eggs, and a rizzar, washing all over with a punch-bowl of congo and a tea-bowl of cogniac,

" Enormous breakfast,
Wild without rule or art ! Where nature plays
Her virgins' fancies !"

And then leaning back on our easy-chair, we perform an exploit beyond the reach of Euclid—why, we SQUARE THE CIRCLE, and to the utter demolition of our admirable friend Dr Brewster's diatribe, in the last number of the Quarterly Review, on the indifference of government to men of science, chuckle over our nobly-won order K.C.C.B., Knight Companion of the Cold Bath.

Many analogies between the seasons of the year and the seasons of life, being natural, have been a frequent theme of poetry in all countries. Had the gods made us poetical, we should now have poured forth a few exquisite illustrations of some that are very affecting and impressive. It has, however, often been felt by us, that not a few of those one meets with in the lamentations of whey-faced sentimentalists, are false or fantastic, and do equal violence to all the seasons, both of the year and of life. These gentry have been especially silly upon the similitude of Old Age to Winter. Winter, in external nature, is not the season of decay. An old tree, for example, in the very dead of winter, as it is figuratively called, though bare of leaves, is full of life. The sap, indeed, has sunk down from his bole and branches—down into his toes or roots. But there it is ready, in due time, to reascend. Not so with an old man—the present company always excepted—his sap is not sunk down to his toes, but much of it is gone clean out of the system—therefore, individual natural objects in Winter are not analogically emblematical of people stricken in years. Far less does the Winter itself of the year, considered as a season, resemble the old age of life considered as a season. To what peculiarities, pray, in the character and conduct of aged gentlemen in general, do rain, sleet, hail, frost, ice, snow, winds, blasts, storms, hurricanes, and occasional thunder and lightning, bear analogy ? We pause for a reply. Old men's heads, it is true, are frequently white, though more frequently bald, and their blood is not so hot as when they were springalds. But though there be no great harm in likening a sprinkling of white hair on mine ancient's temples to the appearance of the surface of the earth, flat or mountainous, after a slight fall of snow,—and, indeed, in an impassioned state of mind, we feel a moral beauty in such poetical expression as "sorrow shedding on the head of youth its untimely snows,"—yet, the natural propriety of such an image, so far from justifying the assertion of a general analogy between Winter and Old Age, proves that the analogies between them are in fact very few, and felt to be analogies at all, only when touched upon very seldom, and very slightly, and, for the most part, very vaguely,—the truth being, that they scarcely exist at all in reality, but have an existence given to them by the power of creative passion, which often works like genius. Shakspeare knew this well—as he knew every thing else,—and, accordingly, he gives us Seven Stages of Life—not Four Seasons. But how finely does he sometimes, by the mere use of the names of the Seasons of the Year, intensify to our imagination the state of the soul, to which they are for the moment felt to be analogous !

" Now is the Winter of our discontent
Made glorious Summer by the sun of York !"

That will do. The feeling he wished to inspire, is inspired ; and the farther analogical images which follow, add nothing to our feeling, though they shew the strength and depth of his into whose lips they are put. A bungler would have bored us with ever so many ramifications of the same idea, on one of which, in our weariness, we would have wished to see him hanged by the neck till he was dead.

We are an Old Man, and though single not singular ; yet, without vanity, we think ourselves entitled to say, that we are no more like Winter, in particular, than we are like Spring, Summer, or Autumn. The truth is, that we are much less like any one of the Seasons, than we are like the whole Set. Is not Spring sharp? So are we. Is not Spring snappish? So are we. Is not Spring boisterous? So are we. Is not Spring beautiful? So are we. Is not Spring capricious? So are we. Is not Spring, at times, the gladdest, gayest, gentlest, mildest, meekest, modestest, softest, sweetest, and sunniest of all God's creatures that steal along the face of the earth? So are we. So much for our similitude—a staring and striking one—to Spring. But were you to stop there, what an inadequate idea would you have of our character! For only ask your senses, and they will tell you that we are much liker Summer. Is not Summer often infernally hot? So are we. Is not Summer sometimes cool as its own cucumbers? So are we. Does not Summer love the shade? So do we. Is not Summer, nevertheless, somewhat “too much i’ the sun?” So are we. Is not Summer famous for its thunder and lightning? So are we. Is not Summer, when he chooses, still, silent, and serene as a sleeping seraph? And so too—when Christopher chooses—are not we? Though, with keen remorse we confess it, that, when suddenly awakened, we are too often more like a fury or a fiend—and that completes the likeness—for all who know a Scottish Summer, with one voice exclaim—“So is he!” But our portrait is but half-drawn; you know but a moiety of our character. Is Autumn jovial?—ask Thomson—so are we. Is Autumn melancholy?—ask Alison and Gillespie—so are we. Is Autumn bright?—ask the woods and groves—so are we. Is Autumn rich—ask the whole world—so are we. Does Autumn rejoice in the yellow grain and the golden vintage, that, stored up in his great Magazine of Nature, are lavishly thence dispensed to all that hunger, and quench the thirst of the nations?—So do we. After that, no one can be so pur-and-bat-blind as not see that North is, in very truth Autumn's gracious self, rather than his Likeness, or Eidolon. But—

“Lo, Winter comes to rule th’ inverted year!”

So do we.

“Sullen, and sad, with all his risling train—

Vapours, and clouds, and storms!”

So are we. The great author of the “Seasons” says, that Winter and his train

“exalt the soul to solemn thought
And heavenly musing!”

So do we. And “lest aught less great should stamp us mortal,” here we conclude the comparison, dashed off in few lines, by the hand of a great master, and ask, Is not North, Winter? Thus, reader after our own heart! thou feelest that we are imaged aright in all our attributes neither by Spring, nor Summer, nor Autumn, nor Winter; but that the character of Christopher is shadowed forth and reflected by the Entire Year.

Away then with all false or shallow ideas on the distinctions of season, as on the distinctions of rank! Each condition of the year, and each condition of life, has its own utility and its own beauty; and they who do not know that, perpetually feel it, and act on the knowledge and the feeling, are equally ignorant of the sun and of society.

“Now all the youth of Scotland are on fire!”

All her cities and towns are rejoicing in the welcome Winter; and mind, invigorated by holidays, is now at work, like a giant refreshed, in all professions. The busy bar growls, grumphs, squeaks, like an old sow with a litter of pigs pretending to be quarrelling about straws. Enter the Outer or the Inner House, and you hear eloquence that would have put Cicero to the blush, and reduced Demosthenes to his original stutter. Lo! the wigs of the Judges seem to have been growing during the long vacation, and to have expanded into an ampler wisdom. Seldom have we seen a more solemn set of men! Every one looks more gash than another, and those three in the centre seem to us the embodied spirits of Law, Equity, and Justice. What can be the meaning of all this endless litigation? On what immutable principles in human nature depends the prosperity of the Fee-fund? Life is strife. Inestimable the blessing of the great institution of Property! For without it, how could people go together by the ears, as if they would tear one another to pieces? All the strong, we must not call them bad passions, denied their natural element, would find out some channels to run in, far more destructive to the common weal than lawsuits, and the people would be reduced to the lowest ebb of misery, and raised to the highest flow of crime. Our Parliament House here is a vast safety-valve for the escape of the foul steam that would otherwise explode and shatter the engine of the state, blowing the body and members of society to the deuce or the devil. As it is, how the engine works! There it goes! like Erickson's Novelty, or Stevenson's Rocket, along the rail-road; and though an accident may occur now then, such as an occasional passenger chucked by some uncalculated collision into the distant horizon, to be picked up whole, or in fragments, by the hoers in some turnip field in the adjacent county, yet few or none are likely to be fatal on a great scale, and on goes the Novelty or Rocket, like a thought, with many weighty considerations after it, in the shape of waggons of Christians or cottons, while commerce exults in the cause of liberty and locomotion all over the world.

Yes, utter Idlesse is perfect bliss. But why? Because, like a lull at sea, or loun on land, it is felt to descend from Heaven on man's toilsome lot. The lull and the loun, what are they when most profound, but the transient cessation of the restlessness of winds and waters—a change wrought, for an hour of peace in the heart of the hurricane? Therefore the soul of the sailor enjoys it on the green wave—that of the shepherd on the green-sward; while the memory of mists and storms deepens the enchantment. Even so, Idlesse can be enjoyed but by those who are permitted to indulge it, while enduring the labours of an active or a contemplative life. To use another, and a still livelier image, see the pedlar toiling along the dusty road, with an enormous pack, on his excursion, and when off his aching shoulders slowly falls back on the bank the loosened load, in blessed relief, think ye not that he enjoys, like a very poet, the beauty of the butterflies, that, wavering through the air, settle down on the wild flowers around him that embroider the way-side?

Yet our pedlar is not so much either of an entomologist or a botanist as not to take out his scrip, and eat his bread and cheese with a mute prayer and a munching appetite—not idle, it must be confessed, in that sense—but in every other idle even as the shadow of the sycamore, beneath which, with his eyes half-open—for by hypothesis he is a Scotchman—he finally sinks into a wakeful, but quiet half-sleep. “Hollo! why are you sleeping there, you idle fellow?” bawls some beadle, or some overseer, or some magistrate, or perhaps merely one of those private persons who, out of season and in, are constantly sending the sluggard to the ant to learn wisdom—though the ant, heaven bless her, at proper times, sleeps as sound as a sick-nurse.

We are now the idlest, because once were we the most industrious of men. Up to the time that we engaged to take an occasional glance over the self-growing sheets of this Magazine, we were tied to one of the oars that move along the great vessel of life; and we believe that it was allowed by all the best watermen, that “We feather'd our oars with skill and dexterity.”

But ever since the Chaldee, our repose, bodily and mental, has been like that of a Hindoo-god. Often do we sit whole winter-nights, leaning back on our chair, more like the image of a man than a man himself, with shut eyes that keep seeing in succession all the things that ever happened to us, and all the persons that we ever loved, hated, or despised, embraced, beat, or insulted, since we were a little boy. They too have all an image-like appearance, and 'tis wondrous strange how silent they all are, actors and actresses on the stage of that revived drama, which sometimes seems to be a genteel comedy, and sometimes a broad farce, and then to undergo dreadful transfiguration into a tragedy deep as death.

Idlesse such as ours is, how could we have enjoyed it, had we been a Benedict? A mightier mass of happiness might possibly have been accumulated upon our lives, till we had been buried under it, and groaned beneath the superincumbent weight. But during the progress of accumulation, had we been married, we had often been miserable under what would seem to be the inevitable torments of a numerous family of sons and daughters. Why? Because we should have brought them so wisely up, and they would all have turned out, as men and women, to the filling up even to overflowing of our soul's capacity of divine content and celestial satisfaction, that we should have lived in fitful fears of their withdrawal from earth to heaven, and of the dismal destitution of a home where, had but one beloved voice been mute for ever, the music of all the rest had been but distraction, and the light in their laughing eyes a misery not to be endured on this side of the grave!

Poo—poo—poo—

"Away with melancholy,
Nor doleful changes ring
On life and human folly,
But merrily, merrily sing,
 Fal la !"

We presume that the Public read in her own papers,—we cannot but be hurt that no account of it has appeared in the Court Journal,—that on Thursday the 12th current, No. 99, Moray Place, was illuminated by our annual Soirée, Conversazione, Rout, Ball, and Supper. A Ball! yes—for Christopher North, acting in the spirit of his favourite James Thomson,

"Nor purpose gay,
Amusement, dance, or song he sternly
 scorns;
For happiness and true philosophy
Are of the social, still, and smiling kind."

All the rooms in the house were thrown open, except the cellars and the Sanctum. To the people congregated outside, the building, we have been assured, had all the brilliancy of a Pandemonium. It was like a palace of light, of which the frame-work or skeleton was of white unveined marble. So strong was the reflection on the nocturnal heavens, that a rumour ran through the City that there was a great fire in Moray Place, nor did it subside, till after the arrival and departure of several engines. The alarm of some huge conflagration prevailed during most part of the night all over the kingdom of Fife; while, in the Lo-thians our illumination was much admired as an uncommonly fine specimen of the Aurora Borealis.

"From the arch'd roof,
Pendent by subtle magic, many a row
Of starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
As from a sky. The hasty multitude Admiring enter'd."

We need not say who received the company, and with what grace she did so, standing at the first landing-place of the great staircase in sable stole; for the widow's weeds have not yet been doffed for the robes of saffron,—with a Queen-Mary cap, pointed in the front of her serene and ample forehead, and to please us, a few pearls sprinkled among her hair, still an unfaded auburn, and on her bosom one star-bright diamond. Had the old General himself come to life again, and beheld her then and there, he could not have been offended with such simple ornaments. The weeds he would have felt due to him, and all that his memory was fairly entitled to; but the flowers—to speak figuratively—he would have cheerfully acknowledged were due to us, and that they well became both face and figure of his lovely relict. As she moved from one room to another, showering around her her serene smiles, we felt the dignity of those Virgilian words,

"Incedit Regina."

Surely there is something very poetical in the gradual flowing in of the tide of grace, elegance, and beauty, over the floors of a suite of regal-looking rooms splendidly illuminated. Each party, as it comes on, has its own peculiar picturesqueness, and affects the heart or imagination by some novel charm, gently gliding onward a little while by itself, as if not unconscious of its own attractions, nor unproud of the gaze of perhaps critical admiration that attends its progressive movement. We confess ourselves partial to plumes of feathers above the radiant braidings of the silken tresses on the heads of virgins and matrons—provided they be not "dumpy women,"—tall, white plumes, silent in their wavings as gossamer, and as finely delicate, stirred by your very breath as you bend down to salute their cheeks—not with kisses—for they would be out of order both of time and place—but with words almost as tender as kisses, and awakening almost as tender a return, a few sweet syllables breathed in a silver voice, with blushing cheeks, (oh! but a blush is beautiful!) and downcast eyes, that when again uplifted, are seen to be blue as heaven.

An hour ago, and all the mansion was empty and motionless—with us two alone sitting by each other's side affectionately and respectfully on a sofa. Now it is filled with life, and heard ye ever such a happy murmur? Yet no one in particular looks as if he or she were speaking much above breath, so gentle is true refinement, like a delightful fragrance

"From the calm manners, quietly exhaled."

Oh! the atrocious wickedness of a great, big, hearty, huge, hulking, horse-laugh, in an assemblage of ladies and gentlemen gathered gracefully together to enjoy the courtesies, the amenities, the urbanities, and the humanities of cultivated Christian life! The pagan who perpetuates it should be burnt alive—not at a slow fire—though that would be but justice—but at a quick one, that all remnants of him and his enormity may be speedily extinguished. Lord Chesterfield has been loudly laughed at with leathern lungs for his anathema against laughter. But though often wrong, there his Lordship was right, and for that one single rule of manners, he deserves a monument, as having been one of the benefactors of his species. Let smiles mantle—and that sweet, soft, low sound be heard, the susurrus. Let there be a many-voiced quiet music, like that of the summer moonlight sea, when the stars are in its breast. But laughter—loud peals of laughter—are like breakers—blind breakers on a blind coast, where no verdure grows, except that of tangle, and whatever is made into that vilest of all commodities, kelp.

'Tis not a literary conversation, mind ye, gentle reader, for we leave that to S. T. Coleridge, the Phenomenon, and the Monarch of the Monologue. But all speak—talk—whisper—or smile, of all the speakable, talkable, whisperable, and smileable little interesting affairs, incidents, and occurrences, real or fabulous, of public, private, demi-public, or demi-semi-private life. Topics are as plentiful as snow-flakes, and melt away as fast in the stream of social pleasure,

"A moment white, then gone for ever!"

Not a little scandal—much gossip, we daresay; but as for scandal, it is the vilest error in the world to think, that it either means, or does, any harm to any mortal. It does infinite good. It ventilates the atmosphere, and prevents the "golden fretted vault" from becoming "a foul congregation of vapours." As for gossip, what other vindication does it need, than an order for you to look at a soiree of swallows in September, on a slate-roof, the most innocent and white-breasted creatures, that pay "Their annual visits round the globe, Companions of the sun,"

but such gossipers, that the whole air is a-twitter with their talk about their neighbours' nests—when—whe! off and away they go, winning their way westwards, through the setting sunlight, and all in perfect amity with themselves and their kind, while

"The world is all before them, where to choose,

And Providence their guide."

And, madam, you do not matronise—and, sir, you do not patronise—waltzing? 'Tis very O fie-fieish, you think—and in danger of becoming very, very faux pa-pa-ish!

"Oh! the great goodness of the knights of old," whose mind-inotto was still—

"Honi soit qui mal y pense!"

Judging ourselves 'tis a wicked world we willingly confess; but be not terrified at trifles, we beseech you, and be not gross in your censure of innocent and delicate delights. Byron's exquisitely sensitive modesty was shocked by the sight of waltzing, which he would not have suffered Guiccioli, while she was in his keeping, to have indulged in, even with her own husband. Thus it is that sinners see sin only where it is not—and shut their eyes to it, when it comes upon them open-armed, bare-bosomed, and brazen-faced, and clutches them in a grasp more like the hug of a bear than the embrace of a woman. Away with such mawkish modesty, and mouth-ing morality—for 'tis the slang of the hypocrite. Waltzing does our old eyes good to look on it, when the whole circling flight goes gracefully and airily on its orbit, and we think we see the realisation of that picture, (we are sad misquoters) when the Hours—

“ Knt by the Graces and the Loves in dance,
Lead on the eternal Spring !”

But the Circling Flight breaks into airy fragments, the Instrumental Band is hushed, and so is the whole central Drawing-room—for blushing obedient to the old man's beck, THE STAR OF EVE—so call we her who is our heart's-ease and heart's-delight—the grand-daughter of one whom hopelessly we loved in youth, yet with no unreturned passion—but

“ The course of true love never yet ran smooth”—

comes glidingly to our side, and having heard our wish breathed whisperingly into her ear—a rare feature! when small, thin, and delicate as a leaf—as glidingly she goes in stature that is almost stateliness, towards her harp, and assuming at once a posture that would have charmed Canova, after a few pre-lusive touches that betray the hand of a mistress in the divine art, to the enchantment of the white motions of those graceful arms and fingers fine, awakes a spirit in the strings accordant to the spirit in that voice worthy to have blended with St Cecilia's in her hymning orisons. A Hebrew Melody! And now your heart feels the utter mournfulness of these words,

“ By Babel's streams we sat and wept!”

How sudden, yet how unviolent, the transitions among all our feelings! Under no other power so swift and so soft, as that of Music. The soul that sincerely loves Music, offers at no time the slightest resistance to her sway, but yields itself up entire to all its moods and measures, led captive by each successive strain, through the whole mysterious world of modulated air. Not a smile over all that hush. Entranced in listening, they are all still as images. A sigh—almost a sob—is heard, and there is shedding of tears. The sweet singer's self seems as if she felt all alone at some solitary shrine—

“ Her face, oh! call it fair, not pale!”

Yet pale now it is, as if her heart almost died within her, at the pathos of her own beautiful lament in a foreign land, and lovelier in her captivity never was the fairest of the daughters of Zion!

What a howling in the chimney! What a blattering on the windows, and what a cannonading on the battlements! What can the Night be about? and what has put old Nox into such a most outrageous passion? He has driven our Winter Rhapsody clean out of our noddle—and to-morrow we must be sending for the slater, the plumber, and the glazier. To go to bed in such a hurly-burly, would be to make an Ultra-Toryish acknowledgment, not only of the divine right, but of the divine power, of King Morpheus. But an Ultra-Tory we are not—though Ultra-Knaves try to impose upon themselves that lie among a thousand others; so we shall smoke a cigar, and let sleep go to the dogs, the deuce, the devil, or the radicals.

FYTTES THIRD and FOURTH in our January Number.

THE RAID OF THE KERS.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

TAM KER rode o'er by the Maiden Crag,
And down the Osaway Burn rode he,
With fifty warriors in his train,
A brave and goodly sight to see.

Their armour was light, but their brands were bright,
And their bonnets were steel across the crown;
And whenever they spied an Englishman,
'They gallop'd at him, and put him down.

"Ride light, ride light, my kinsmen true,
Till aince the daylight close her ee;
If we can pass the Biddleston Tower,
A harried warden there shall be!

"He reaved the best of my brother's steeds,
And slew his men on the Five-stane
brae;
I'd lay my head this night in pawn,
To drive his boasted beeves away.*

"For at Thrapton he has a goodly herd,
Just newly come from the low countrye,
And at Rothbury there are a hunder head,
All fat and fair on Kimside lee.

"Mark Ker, ride you by Allanton ford,
As you were riding a race to won;
And aye when the warders challenge give,
Say you are riding to Withrington.

"For he is their boasted warden now,
And his name will bear you on your way,
And mark where the beeves frae the seaside lie,
As lang as there's ony hue o' day.

"And as ye see danger, or ye see nane,
This ye maun do to guide us right,
At every cross that ye come to,
Set up a black clout or a white."

Mark Ker he bit his lip and lough,
When his cousin gave him this queer command;
For Mark never kend what danger meant,
When belted wi' his noble brand.

He had nae black clouts in his pouch,
His kinsmen of their faes to warn;
But he tore his sark frae aff his back,
And hung a rag on every cairn.

A warder at Foxton call'd him stand,
In the names of St George and England's king, Saying, "Saucy Scot, where ride you here,
On this side of the Border ring?"

"To Withrington," Mark Ker replied,
"With words important and express."
"Sir Scot, that will not pass with me.
Your warrant seal'd; I take no less."

"My word's my warrant," Mark Ker replied,
"And passes current where'er I go."
"No, sir, I must be satisfied;
You pass not English yeoman so."

Mark Ker he gave his shoulder a hitch,
As if a wasp had stung him there;
"Then here's my warrant, thou saucy
wight;
Dispute it farther, if you dare!"

Mark Ker pull'd out his noble brand,
'The English loon his falchion keen;
'Two doughty rounds these gallants had,
Ere aught but gleams of fire were seen;

But at the third they cross'd and reel'd,
And, at a fierce and furious turn,
Off flew the English warder's head,
And tottled into Foxton burn.

"Beshrew thy heart," the Scotsman cried,
"For thine was heart and arm of steel;
I never ween'd that an English clown
Could wield his weapon half sae weel!"

"I may thank Heaven for my success,
For I was at my utmost strain;
And had I miss'd that perilous blow,
I'd ne'er seen Faldonside again.

"The Captain of Biddleston, he will trust
To thee this night for gallant deed;
But the Scots will sweep by ford and keep,
For his warder lies without the head."

* This bold and reckless sally of the Kers into the heart of Northumberland, took place on September 29, 1549, and originated in some quarrel and jealousy between the two wardens. But it was without the consent of Sir Andrew Ker, the Scottish warden, as it afterwards satisfactorily appeared, though not without his knowledge.

Mark Ker rode on, and Mark Ker rode on,
But never a hoof or horn saw he,
Till he came to the ford of Larbottle
burn,
Where a dainty drove lay on the lea.

He tether'd his horse at the Auld-wood back,
And down by Park-Elliot he tried to pass;
He tried to speak in the English tongue,
But a most confounded speak it was!

Until he met with a comely May,
Who seemed at his approach full fain;
Says he, "Feagh, dame, I've lwest mee
way,
I pghay thee set me won again."

"Goodman, if thou hast lost thy way,
Sae have I mine, which I may rue,
It's a dangerous place to journey in
For me, and nae less sae for you.

"A hundred warriors, stark and sture,
Surround these fields on Kimside lea;
For a Scottish raid has cross'd the fell,
And a bloody night it is like to be.

"But drop that gruesome, uncouth tongue,
A tongue that's hateful unto me;
For I have been long a captive here,
But love this night has set me free.

"I am come to join the gallant Kers,
I ken you are ane o' their companye;
And if you will take me in thy charge,
I'll play my part as well as thee."

Mark Ker, he clasp'd her by the neck,
And kiss'd her weel frae ear to ear,
"My bonny lass, you will play your part Better at Faldonside than here.

"But now betide me weel or woe,
I'll o'er the Border guide your way;
I'll mount you on my own good steed,
Shift for another as I may."

Then up there came a warrior stern,
A yeoman from the Bamborough town:
"Go, get aloof!" he fiercely cried,
"Thou clod-pate, with thy leman loon!"

"Whoy, mon, thou lackest coghtesye, Thughe wey can dwo thine bwound no ill;
I won't nwot bwodge ane swoot swor thee,
Till I have eworted her my fill."

"Go off! across the river go,
And take thy baggage on thy back!"
The warder said; and, as he spake,
He gave Mark Ker an ugly thwack.

Mark Ker he gave his shoulder a hitch,
A dangerous hitch to friend or foe;
For all his kinsmen mark'd it weel,
And knew it follow'd by a blow.

"Beshrew thy hand, thou saucy knave!
Thou pudding-headed Southron drone!
Darest thou presume to touch a Ker, Orevent the ground his feet stands on?"

"A Ker! a K—!" roar'd the Southron loon;
But, ere a second time 'twas cried,
His head was stotting on the green,
While still the tongue to word it tried.

"Aye, blab it now!" said Ker, "and gang
Raving of Kers unto the deil!
He gets nought but a dunce for aince—
A vulgar, mushroom-headit chiel."

He dress'd the maid in the dead man's claes,
So wide they scarcely would hang on,
And mounted her on the Southron steed,
And away to the Auldwood back they're gone.

One short blast of his bugle horn,
Was answer'd readily and near,
"Aha!" quo he, "now for a stoure,
The wale of all the Border's here.

"But blessings on thee for a dear sweet lass!
For, had I no forgather'd wi' thee,
We had been surrounded every man,
And slaughter'd on the Kimside lea.

"Now we's hac buffing for our lives,
And, lang afore the break of day,
Some brave pock-puddings shall bite the bent,
And growl their murky souls away."

In the lowest dell of Larbottle burn
The Kers their counsel held that night,
Where oft they bless'd the friendly May
Who warn'd them of the English might.

With twenty of the fleetest steeds,
Mounted by gallant gentlemen,
Tam Ker began the deadly fray,
Between the Auldwood and the fen.

But the Kers were aye the deadliest faes
That e'er to Englishmen were known,
For they were all bred left-handed men,
And fence against them there was none.

They hew'd down all that with them met,
Yet would not quit their vantage dell,
But they made a din that shook the hills
With horn, with hallo, and with yell.

Then the English circle gather'd out,
Hasting and puffing to the fray,
When Mark Ker rode round with thirty men,
And slily slipp'd the beeves away.

"Now, fie! lay on, my kinsmen true,
And thresh them on with goad and flail,
We's gar them ply their hooves for aince
Along the links of Coquet-dale!

"Lay on them, lads, and dinna spare!
We maun perforce their mettle try;
If ony lubber lag behind,
E'en cut his neck, and let him lie.

"The English bullocks are ours to win,
The English gowd and gear the same;
And never let's spare a Southron's life,
For the Kers with them are lawfu' game."

Till past the middle of the night
Tam Ker maintain'd th' unequal fray;
But then the halloo rose behind,
That the lusty drove was all away.

"Fie, let us ride," cried Withrington,
"Else we are shamed for evermair;
Let's first regain that lordly prey,
Then fight the Scotsmen if they dare!"

And away and away went the English-
men,
With whip and spur most furiouslye;
The loss of a muckle good fat beef
Was the sairest loss their hearts could dree.

Tam Ker and his men came up behind,
Right sair forespent as men could be;
But every laggard that they came to,
They popp'd him off right caunilye.

As Mark Ker cross'd ower the Foxton
burn,
The headless warder nought could tell:
"Ha, billy!" quo Mark, "had ye been hale,
We hadna cross'd the ford sae well."

There up came the gallant Withrington,
Wi' the foremost of his companye;
"Whoever drives this prey," he cried,
"I charge him yield it up to me."

"It is I, Mark Ker of the Faldonside,
And the drove is mine, as you may see;
And I'll take the drove to the Auldtown-
burn,
In spite of all thy men and thee!"

"Thou rank reaver, thou surly loon,
I have sworn the doom of thee and thine!
And ere thou cross the Border fell, Thou shalt cross above this breast of mine!"

"I'll count little of that, brave Withrington;
But if with me thou'lt wield a brand,
If thou won't my sword, or bring'at me
down,
The drove is thine, by this right hand!"

"Take that right hand, then, in the strife,
And here's my pledge as I shall thrive."
"Ha! The Kers have a right hand of their own,
Which they will not change for man alive.

"And before this, Ker hand as it is,
Brave Withrington, I tell to thee,
I never met with an Englishman
Could stand before it minutes three."

"'Tis false and saucy as thyself!
Wait here but till the peep of day,
Could I but see my weapon's point,
Thou should'st not bear the brag away."

"I'll wait myself 'ave Withrington;
But thus to stave my gallant prey,
I have no right or answer to grant—
So now or never, if you may!"

Then Withrington pull'd out his sword,
And Ker his long and deadly brand;
And such a combat there ensued,
As ne'er was in Northumberland.

And round and round and round they fought,
While fire-flaughts gleam'd in sparkles
sheen,
Till the wan faces of the group
Of eager lookers-on were seen.

And round and round and round they
fought,
Till the blood-drops fell like heavy rain;
And many a haughty word there past,
But the one on the other could not gain.

Full sore it grieveth me to say—
But truth must by a foe be said—
Before the dawning of the day
Mark Ker upon the field lay dead.

His last words were, "War to the hilt;
Though I am foully down, what then?

Let this suffice, that in my life
I've slain a hundred Englishmen!"

By this time Tam o' the Mossburnford
Was pelting on the English rear,
And the thirty men were fresh before,
Who rush'd on without dread or fear.

"Foul play! foul play!" was the rousing word;

"Down with the beef tubs, bluff and blown!

Let their right haffets dree the sword—
Ker and the devil! Down with them!
Down!"

Dreadful and fatal was the strife,
For, when the sun rose o'er the sea,
They were all scatter'd o'er the field,
Oft one to one, or one to three.

There was no rule nor standard there:
Bravery and hatred ruled alone:
For foeman's life was all the strife;
Yielding or quarter there were none.

There were one hundred Englishmen
At night around the Kimside lea,
Now they had vanish'd from the field;
There was not one to fight or flee.

The weary wounded Scots went on,
Still with their drove, full hard bested,
For word had gane to Biddleston tower,
That waken'd the captain from his bed.

He mounted his horse and gallop'd forth,
His troopers gathering at the word;
And the first man that he met with
Was burly Tam of Mossburnford.

"Turn, Captain of Biddleston, turn and flee!
Thy arm was never a match for mine;
I'll hold at bay thy men and thee,
Till I'm across the Border line!"

"There shalt thou never be again,
Thou miscreated burly bear;
I have at thee now, for, fight or feign,
I'll have thy head upon this spear!"

He rade at Tam with furious aim,
Thinking to run his body through;
But little dream'd of the left hand skelp
That nickit the Captain clean in two.

His horse went on with gallant speed—
Still the brave Captain never fell;
Without the right arm and the head,
Lock'd to his horse, he rode full well!

Tam Ker he grant a hollow laugh,
When he saw the Captain scouring on,

And the Scotsmen flying him before,
As if the devil came them upon.

The first three men of the English troop
Tam laid them level with the plain;
But three broad arrows pierced his breast,
And there brave Mossburnford was slain.

"Alas!" quoth John of Borthwickshields,
"Since our two champions both are dead,

Let's quit the strife, and ride for life,
The day is lost without remedie."

But Andrew of Littledean him gainsaid,
And bade fight on, and never fear;
So they held the drove, and flying fought,
Though gall'd by bowmen in the rear.

But still they drove, and still they fought,
And fought and drove full valiantly,
But the fell-men gather'd with the day,
And gall'd their flanks full grievously.

When they came to the Shillmoor-burn,
They lost all hopes the prey to keep,
So they hack'd their neck-sinews in twain,
And left them lying in a heap.

They fought their way by the Blindburn-shiel,
By bowmen gall'd from every brac,
And a remnant wan to the Blackhill Pael
About the noontide of the day.

While darkness wrapt the band around,
The Kers harass'd their foemen sore,
Their left-hand blows could not be borne;
Death spread behind, and dread before:

But in the broad eye of the day,
The little band of kinsmen true
Were all exposed, like other men,
To arrows from each bank and cleuch.

Of one-and-fifty buirdly Kers,
The very prime men of the clan,
There were only seventeen return'd,
And they were wounded every man.

O, many a virgin tear was shed,
And pour'd was many a widow's wail,
But every heart mourn'd for Mark Ker,
The bravest knight of the Border dale!

There were four-and-forty Englishmen
Lay round him dead on Foxton brae,
And Withrington was wounded sore,
And carried from the field away.

And the lovely May, the Scottish muid,
Lay by Mark Ker upon the lea,

While their heart's blood together
stream'd ;

It was a grievous sight to see !

O, never was such a luckless raid,
Or such a rash and reckless plea,
For the Kers were all born gentlemen,
All men of name and high degree !

That raid it fell on Saint Michael's eve,
When the dark harvest nights began :

But the Kers no more o'ercame that day,
While they remained a warlike clan.

Blest be the man who first did plan
The thankless task, when it began ;
And blest Anne Stuart's royal name,
Who join'd our countries into one !

Now we can ride the Border side,
And brethren meet at every turn,
But then the meed was to hang and head,
To ravish, pillage, slay, and burn.

God prosper all the Border dales,
On both sides of our ancient live,
And never may rankling grudge prevail
For the doughty deeds of auld langsyne !

Altrive Lake, 11th Nov. 1830.

HORRIBLE STANZAS.

I.

FEAR haunts me like a sheeted ghost, there comes no rest to me,
The swelling thoughts have sunk and fled which buoy'd my spirit free.
A form of ill, unchanging still, a dark embodied shape
Weighs my crush'd heart, and grimly waits to shut me from escape ;
Dim-seen, as goul by starlight pale, gorged with his hideous fare,
Yet all-distinct upon my soul there comes his wolfish glare.

II.

The heaven is dark, as if a pall were spread upon the sky,
And earth is like a grave to me, with vultures gather'd by ;
And though I breathe, my soul lies dead, and o'er it floats a troop,
Long-bill'd, of birds obscene and vile, prepared for bloody swoop ;
One—fiercer, deadlier than them all—one gloats upon my heart,
And half I laugh in bitter joy, to think no blood will start !

III.

No blood, no blood to wet his maw ! that blessed torrent's flow
Was suck'd by countless beaks and bills,—dried up long years ago !
'Tis thus I dream, yet not in sleep ; for sleep, the torturer, brings Before my closed eyes a train of bright and noble things :
The smiles of maidens fair and young, the glance of beauty bright,
And tones remember'd long ago,—all fill me with delight.

IV.

Then happy—like the Indian chief between his pangs of pain—
I quite forget in present ease the torture and the chain.
A dream is mine. Sweet, mellow, faint, as if from o'er the sea,
Or some calm lake, at evening heard, when hush'd the breezes be,
A strain begins,—and o'er mine ear the blessed music falls,
Bathing my heart, as moonlight bathes some donjon's craggy walls ;

V.

A spell of power—a talisman each anguish to allay—
And memory's wand brings back again the long-departed day,
The proud young time, when, free as air, I walk'd beneath the moon,
And listen'd to one gentle voice that sung its witching tune ;
I bend, in sleep, to kiss her brow, as ends that falling strain—
Gone ! Gone !—The agony comes on !—The fiend is here again !

VI.

Close, close beside me glooms the form that haunts me night and day ;
The phantom stands beside my bed, in morning's twilight grey,
Dim, undefined, and terrible. Ah ! well my thrilling blood Told me that, foe to human kind, a demon near me stood.
It spoke at last : and o'er my soul death's deep'ning shadows flit—
" I takes ye up for debt," it said, " and this here is the writ."

LETTER TO CHRISTOPHER NORTH, ESQUIRE, ON THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE.

BY ONE OF THE DEMOCRACY.

SIR,

THAT which, in the slang of faction, is called the Spirit of the Age, absorbs, at present, the attention of the world. All confess its omnipotence, advise submission to it, and proclaim that it will produce, at the least, a season of chaos and horrors; even its worshippers assert, that it must carry sweeping revolution into every quarter, which can only be prevented from taking the most fatal character by such concessions, as, in the nature of things, are impossible. Whether we look at the prostrate thrones, enslaved governments, and disorganization of society abroad; or at the portentous condition of things at home—we are overwhelmed with proof, that this spirit exists in the colossal and terrific attributes given it by common conviction.

But, if I admit that it is as irresistible as it is stated to be, I must avow my belief that, so far as concerns this country, it is, in its own intrinsic strength, powerless, and owes its irresistibility to the countenance and support of those who are, in name or duty, its opponents. To detail the grounds of this belief, will probably be a very idle matter. For several years, every part of society has thought a revolution, of the worst description, to be rapidly approaching—one, in institution and law, class and property, accomplished through anarchy, blood, rapine, and misery. In every place save the Court, the Cabinet, and the Legislature, the remark has been general. Things cannot go on much longer in their present course; we are hastening to the gulf, and nothing can save us. What gave birth to it? Not newspapers, or parliamentary speeches, or party politics; every man's reason saw that legislation, circumstance, and sentiment, had taken a direction which could lead to no other result—that the waste of property, want, hatred of institutions, contempt of laws, and demoralization they were producing, must end in revolution; it saw this, and extorted the confession from him, even in despite of his party principles. Nevertheless, while all have thus perceived the impending catastrophe and its causes, they have treated it as a thing to be passively submitted to, if not promoted. I may, therefore, reasonably conclude, it will be of small use for me, or any man, to point to the means of averting that which all decide shall happen. Duty, however, forbids silence, and in obeying it, I have the satisfaction of knowing, that if nothing can be done towards saving the innocent, it is yet possible to punish the guilty.

Why am I to follow the counsels of passive submission to the Spirit of the Age, which all sides give me? Its admirers tell me that, at the best, it must destroy things, in which, in my judgment, are comprehended the essentials of social order, good government, and general prosperity. They tell me, farther, that nothing but sacrifices, which cannot be made, can prevent it from realizing its wishes, in every quarter, by physical force. Its censurers, and the neutrals, while they advise submission as the only means of preventing it from triumphing through such force, assert that its projects are fraught with national ruin and misery. They all place me in this difficulty. I must consent to revolution, as an antidote to revolution. I must avert general convulsion, anarchy, carnage, and suffering, by doing that which, in my conviction, will inevitably produce them. Thus, they give me no other reasons and proofs with their counsel, than the most conclusive ones against its adoption.

But I am told that the Spirit is nothing less than "The People;" and that as the sovereignty everywhere belongs to the latter, they ought to be implicitly obeyed. All those arguments of submission really amount to this—you ought to concede and sacrifice, merely because the People will it. These questions necessarily here present themselves. In free countries like our own, ought the will of the People, or the decisions of the regularly constituted authorities, to be followed? Ought these authorities to obey implicitly such will, or to exercise the discretion with which they are clothed by the constitution and laws? I admit the right of the people to the farthest limit which they themselves have given it; if the government usurp the power to make inroads on the Constitution, I hold that this restores to them the sovereignty. I regret as much as any man, that in France power should have been gained by that party which now possesses it; but nevertheless I am one of those who think, that this party acted both justly and meritoriously in defending the Constitution by force of arms. I am not at liberty to look at the motives or the fears of the ex-King and his Ministers; if I believed, which I do not, that what they wished to do was sound in policy, I could not give them the advantage of it; because I know that they did what they were prohibited under the highest penalties from doing; and that while there was no obligation to prevent resistance in the people, there was a sacred duty which enjoined it. I, however, can go no farther. When the People have, through the Constitution, solemnly divested themselves of the sovereignty, I deny that they have any right to resume it at pleasure. Insisting, as I do, that the compact is binding on the ruler, I am compelled to insist that it is equally binding on the subject. The reasons, therefore, which lead me to believe that the French people were justified in defending their charter as they did, also constrain me to believe that they act most unjustifiably in attempting to dictate to the government they have formed: I hold such dictation to be as criminal in its nature, as the conduct was, which caused the expulsion of the late government. So long as the authorities of this country do not abuse their powers, I wholly deny that the sovereignty rests in the people; because I know that they have given it for ever under regulations to these authorities, without reserving any power of resumption, save through defined breach of stipulation in the latter. On looking into the Constitution, I find that while they have retained the right to express their will, they have made it the duty of the ruler to exercise his discretion on it, and to act in direct opposition to it when his discretion tells him to do so; I find also that they have empowered him to treat them as rebels in case they take up arms to compel him to obey it. The compact which they voluntarily entered into, leaves me no alternative to the conviction, that as a matter of right the will of the People may be at all times firmly resisted, on sufficient reason and evidence.

As a member of the Democracy, I might here strain something, if the People had been over-reached in the compact, or if the lapse of time had made it an unjust one to them; but I have proof to the contrary. I know that, by the power they possess in the choice of the House of Commons, they can at all times compel the government to obey their will to the utmost point called for by their good; and that if the House be an improper one, it flows from their own negligence or crimes, and therefore can form no excuse for their violation of the most solemn engagements.

I have here this potent reason for opposing to the utmost the Spirit of the Age. It strikes at the root of all free and good government, by inculcating the doctrine that the People may violate at pleasure the sacred stipulations they enter into with their rulers. If the subject be not bound, how can the ruler be? How can any other than a despotic government of the worst kind exist, if the will of the People be despotic, that is, if the majority govern the minority by tyranny alone, and if the subject be bound by nothing but the brute force of the ruler?

As the right to oppose the will of the People, in a country like this, is demonstrably one of law granted by themselves; let us now consider the expediency of exercising it. The Spirit tells me that they consist almost exclusively of the lower orders; it will not suffer the wealthy to be numbered amidst them. On looking at these orders, I find that their will is commonly a borrowed one, and very frequently one borrowed from the worst sources, without knowledge and judgment, and at the instigation of guilty interests and passions. I perceive that they are little more than a speaking-trumpet to give utterance to the will of certain individuals. I hear the People speak, but notwithstanding its loudness and hoarseness, I find it is in reality the voice of Mr Brougham. A voice of thunder issues from the trumpet, which I clearly distinguish to be that of Mr O'Connell, Mr Cobbett, or Mr

Hunt. Again the trumpet sounds, but I discover that it only sends abroad the accents of Mr Carlile or Mr Taylor. In these cases the will expressed by the People is in essentials not their own; they would never have thought of it, had not their ignorance and passions been worked on by the most profligate arts; it is really the will of these individuals. Of course, implicit submission to it would practically arm these men with despotic power.

Why is it that in a free constitution—even in a republic, deliberative powers, and the right to oppose the will of the People at discretion, are given to the government? Because there can be no freedom without—because it is notorious that the less knowing and more numerous part of the People frequently take their will through delusion from demagogues and traitors; and it must be withstood to prevent the most grievous tyranny. In a republic, the government exists as much to oppose the will of the People, when it is an erroneous one, as to give effect to it when it is the contrary.

The laws of God declare that certain acts constitute crime, and it is very evident that they cannot be annulled by the will of the People. Experience has proved that particular institutions, laws, regulations and conduct are essential for the prosperity and happiness of the People; and in consequence their protection to the last against the will of the latter, is a sacred duty which the People themselves have imposed on the ruler.

Now what are the things which the Spirit of the Age labours to compel us to adopt, on the ground that they are supported by the popular will?

The Spirit declares that its grand object is to establish free and good government in every quarter. I sanction the object with all my heart, but it does not follow that I am to sanction its means. I stand on the stalest of truisms, when I say, that such government must at any rate be based on morals. The ruler must take his character from that of the subject in a free country. Profligate electors must form a profligate legislature, and such a legislature must create a profligate executive.

Profligacy must make a government tyrannical, and render a people incapable of being governed, save through tyranny. Freedom never could obtain being, save through morals, and it never could outlive them! They have made various countries prosperous and happy with a bad form of government, while the want of them has caused others to be distressed and wretched with the best. In proportion as a nation is immoral, its government must, and will, be despotic.

And morals cannot exist without religion.

The Spirit wages eternal war against them. I say not that it openly denounces them, or that it does not occasionally bestow on them vague and extorted commendation; but it regularly encourages and defends their violation. It is not only the apologist of the grosser and meaner vices, but the eulogist of the more grave and dangerous moral crimes. Breach of obligation in the elector—abandonment of principle in the member of the legislature—and violation of pledge, and betrayal of trust, in the minister, are lauded by it as splendid virtues.

But of the sources of morals, it is the open foe. It assails religion in every quarter. The Catholic Church abroad, and the Protestant one at home, are attacked, not to replace them with better systems of faith, but to destroy them as religions. In so far as it professes friendship to any religion, it does so only to use it as an instrument against another; but it allies itself in creed with none, and it speaks of the best as prejudices and evils, to be tolerated, because they cannot be got rid of. The practice of religion it constantly ridicules. It seeks to destroy every law, regulation, and institution for the protection of morals. On the other hand, it is the zealous champion of all the sources of immorality. Sabbath-breaking, that prolific parent of irreligion, vice, and crime—licentious publications—cheap liquor, and other means of drunkenness—in a word, all things calculated to generate profligacy, find in it their constant advocate.

Another of the essentials for forming the basis of free and good government, consists in the proper influence of the superior over the inferior. The wholesome control and guidance of the master, landlord, and other superiors, must exist, or amidst the mass of the people morals cannot; if the lower classes be not kept in order by morals, and the influence of masters, &c. nothing can keep them so but despotism in the ruler. The body of them, from the want of knowledge and understanding, must always be incapable of exercising the elective franchise in a proper manner without counsel; and in consequence, if they be not led by their superiors, they will be by demagogues and traitors; they must follow the former, duly divided into balanced parties for public good, or they will follow the latter in an irresistible whole for public evil.

This influence the Spirit incessantly labours to destroy. It incites the dependent and inferior throughout society, to cast it from him as a thing destructive to both his rights and his well.

And a third essential for forming the basis of free and good government, must be found in the harmony and just feelings towards each other of the different classes and interests which are comprehended in a country. Each must respect the rights of the others, and be as ready to concede the advantages they draw from it, as to take those they yield it. And all must be willing to act disinterestedly together on sound principles for general good.

The Spirit constantly attempts to annihilate this essential. It teaches the poor, the servant, and the inferior, to regard the rich, the master, and the superior, as natural enemies; and it does the same to the different interests. The poor are to seek gain in the loss of the wealthy, and the workman in that of his employer; commerce is to find prosperity in the ruin of agriculture, and the latter is to draw relief from the robbery of the funded interests; the Democracy is to benefit itself by destroying the Aristocracy, and the religious bodies are to flourish through the extermination of each other. All classes and interests are to be engaged in eternal war for separate benefit, and if not for this, for the sake of war. Whether the aristocracy and the rich seek the good, or the contrary, of the democracy and the poor, they are still to be opposed by the latter. Thus the power of the people to govern themselves is perverted into an engine for producing all kinds of mal-government.

Melancholy illustration of the truth of all this may be found in the state of the country. What makes it necessary for Ireland to be always governed by a practical despotism? The want of morals, and the proper control of superiors. What has created the stack-burners of Kent? The same cause, combined with the enmity of classes and interests. What has given to a Scotchman like Mr Hume, looking only at the sentiments he has on different occasions put forth in the legislature touching religion, a seat for an English county? What has enabled men like Long Wellesley to divide the electors of a county? What has sent the O'Connells, Whittle Hervey's, &c. to Parliament? What has given to the House of Commons its present feelings and principles? What has enabled the profligate demagogue to triumph over the virtuous patriot in almost every election contest? The same causes.

What makes the body of the poor on the one hand war against all kinds of property; and the body of the rich, on the other, war against the poor man's bread in every quarter? The want of morals, and the hostility of classes and interests for the sake of separate gain. What has plunged almost every class and interest into suffering, and destroyed all security of property and bread? The same causes.

If the body of the labouring classes practise the feelings they are known to entertain, and imitate the Kent ones, what but despotism can keep them in order? If the House of Commons continue to degenerate as it has long done, what but a despotic government can flow from it?

I therefore find that the Spirit of the Age, under the pretence of wishing to establish free and good government, really seeks to destroy it, through the destruction of the only things on which it can stand. I find that it is practically labouring to establish in every quarter, government of the most tyrannical and savage description. Of course I have no alternative to decided opposition to it: if I am told that it is supported by the will of the people, my reply is—this only forms a reason for opposing it the more openly and sternly; I must sacrifice the will of the people to their rights, interests, duties, and obligations.

Passing from general matters, and looking at my own country only, I find that the Spirit of the Age has, according to common opinion, placed it in imminent danger of revolution—of such revolution as will change the form of government, overthrow institutions, abolish laws, despoil the wealthy of their property, and produce every conceivable national calamity. Without saying that this affords conclusive proof of the detestable character of the Spirit, let me examine the defence it urges for creating such an appalling state of things.

In the first place, it pleads, that it wishes for a republic. Does it then offer any fair evidence that this is the best form of government? No. Its historical evidence, in so far as it produces any, is in the main misrepresentation and invention. The ancient republics had in many respects great advantages, which this country ~~would~~ not possess as one; and, ~~yet they became~~ sources of such profligacy, corruption, licentiousness, and tyranny, as were never known under the British monarchy. Put into the scale against the latter, they kick the beam.

But there is the American republic. Is, then, America in circumstances like those of Britain and Ireland? Is her land over-peopled, is she burdened with an enormous debt, and has she a profusion of rich men? She has comparatively no taxes to pay; but this flows not from her form of government: she has cheap food and dear labour, but she is not indebted for these to her republican institutions. At any rate, she has a cheap government. If I grant all that is claimed on the score of this, what does it amount to? A monarchy costs the poorer part of my countrymen a fraction of a penny per annum more than a republic would do. But even this argument of cheapness is baseless. The American republic draws its cheapness, in a large degree, from its situation;

if it were transferred to England, its expenses of necessity would be much greater than they are. The comparative dearness of the British monarchy is, to a great extent, caused by other things than its form.

As to the charges of corruption, they are in proportion as prevalent in America as in this country. Corruption, waste of the public money, &c., can be as well prevented under one form of government as under the other.

Is there a single right, liberty, or privilege enjoyed by the American, in virtue of his republic, which the Englishman does not, or could not, enjoy through his monarchy? There is not one. If the republican have greater elective privileges than the monarchist, this flows from difference of law, and not of form of government.

But in the republic there is no aristocracy. Well, what is the profit? There is no such foolery as Lord This, and Lady That. There are Esquires, and even Honourables, in America, but I will not plead it; I may be excused for not noticing minds which can concern themselves with such "foolery," and find in empty titles and names a cause of revolution.

Does the Aristocracy in this country enjoy a single privilege as such, which is really injurious to the Democracy? No. All material ones are enjoyed by its members as public servants, for the benefit of the Democracy as well as of themselves. Even the titles which cause such annoyance to the Spirit of the Age, are in a large degree honours and rewards conferred on the Democracy.

Does the House of Peers possess a more injurious portion of power than the Senate of the republic? Its impotence, when opposed to the other House, has been acknowledged by every authority, proved by the whole of history, and placed above question by the events of the last five years.

Do titles give to the boroughmongers their boroughs, or to the peers their county influence? Such boroughs and influence would be with republican equality precisely what they are; they are no more created by a monarchy than by a republic.

Some of the boroughs belong to commoners; and Mr Coke of Norfolk would not find his election influence increased by the gift of a peerage. The House of Commons would be what it is if there were no aristocratic distinctions: whatever may be its defects and abuses, they are not to be charged on the monarchy.

Do the great gain pensions, sinecures, and place, through their titles? They gain them from things wholly different, and which have no more to do with a monarchy than with a republic.

Do the interests of the Democracy suffer in any way, because there is in the form of government an Aristocracy? No. If the members of the latter receive any protection and advantages at the expense of the former, they receive them on account of their property and rights as private individuals, and not of their rank and power as aristocrats. The case would not be altered by republican equality. The corn law is defended as a measure of general good, which gives no more to the peer than is enjoyed by the labourer: its object is to benefit not Peers alone, but half the Democracy. A law precisely similar, in nature and object, exists in the American republic in favour of manufacturers and certain descriptions of agriculturists.

Does the King of this country enjoy greater powers because he is a king, than are enjoyed by the Presidents of the American republic? No; his powers, in every particular, are strictly defined with reference to public good only. Are the Ministers more despotic because they serve under a king? No. Is the general government more tyrannical and less efficient because it is a monarchy? Every kind of evidence proves the contrary.

So far as concerns the form of government, there is not a single advantage drawn from the American republic which is not drawn from the British monarchy. Whatever the American may possess beyond the Englishman, flows from things with which the form of government has nothing to do in either state. I might enlarge on the glaring defects of the republic, and its great inferiority in many particulars to our own monarchy, but it is not necessary.

But there are more republics than one in America, and what are the others? The most corrupt, tyrannical, inefficient, and destructive governments in the civilized world. Compared with them, the most despotic monarchy in Europe is a source of freedom, prosperity, and happiness.

The Spirit thus cannot produce a title of evidence, to shew that the people would gain from the establishment of a republic; on the contrary, it is manifest that they would lose greatly both in making the change, and afterwards. For their sake, I must regard its plea here as a reason for opposing it.

The taxes form another of the Spirit's pleas for revolution. To give it validity, it ought at the very least to be proved that they are levied and expended unjustly; but no such proof is tendered. The Spirit attacks them mainly on account of their existence, but it points out no honest mode of getting rid of them. Whatever difference of opinion may prevail touching the origin of the public debt, there can be none respecting the justice of paying it; therefore, here is a sufficient defence for the principal part of the taxes. As to the remainder, it is demonstrable that the greater portion must be collected, and could not even be abolished with revolution. I can pay no attention to the Spirit's vague assertions, that they are five or ten millions more than they ought to be, because they are unsupported by evidence. Allowing them to be true, what follows? The poor pay each a few shillings per annum more than they ought, and the rich contribute their full proportion. I can find in this no cause for revolution.

Why does the Spirit assail the taxes? It charges on them the want and misery of the people. It is matter of historical fact, that when they were really, taking every thing into consideration, more than double their present amount, they were borne with ease, and the community in every class was wealthy and prosperous. To this triumphant proof of the Spirit's ignorance and error may be added others; looking at every interest separately, it is demonstrable, that the losing prices of the capitalist, and the bad wages of the labourer, have been produced by other things than taxes.

I find, that with revolution the taxes could not be materially reduced, save through the most scandalous robbery, perpetrated as much on the Democracy as on the Aristocracy. I know that, by the laws of God as well as of man, the poor man has not more right to his bread, than the rich one has to his justly-acquired property. I have proof, that the Spirit seeks to perpetrate this robbery on the most baseless reasons. Of course, I must oppose it on this plea, or make myself a party to the darkest villainy.

A third cause of revolution with the Spirit, is formed by pensions and sinecures. If the latter be not granted unworthily and corruptly, it cannot be deserving of notice. Individuals may enjoy pensions, and certain families may receive a large amount of the public money, but if they do so on the ground of public service, it is sanctioned by right and justice. Sinecures have been so far abolished, that the Spirit cannot point to the existence of any important ones; and pensions have been regulated by law on the principle of fair and equitable reward for public service. The families clamoured against for receiving so much of the public money, receive it, without reference to person and birth, as the due remuneration of official toil. If there be fault here, it is this: The offices are not overpaid, but one family can obtain too many of them. Speaking generally, the places and pensions which exist, do so for public benefit—for the good of the poor as well as the rich; and if the Spirit can offer reasonable proof that one of them is unnecessary, this will cause its abolition. If even these wretched allegations were true, it would only follow that the poor pay each a few more half-pence per annum in taxes than they ought. I cannot be other than the enemy of the Spirit when it thus circulates falsehood and error for the purpose of injuring the Democracy as much as the Aristocracy.

The lack of general economy and retrenchment forms a fourth plea with it. It is known to all men, that these are supported in every quarter to the widest extent which the weal of the empire will admit of; and that they are never opposed save on the ground that they will produce public injury. If the Spirit will prove the existence of profusion and waste by fair evidence, I will support it; but I cannot do so when I find its wild assertions refuted by conclusive fact and argument.

The Church and her property form another cause of its discontent. I am one of those who think the State ought to supply the poor man gratuitously with spiritual instruction and consolation—with a religious friend and benefactor; therefore, on democratic notions, I am an advocate for a national religion. The Spirit can allege nothing against the religion of the Church of England; it cannot assert that she forms a burden to the people; and it is manifest that if she were destroyed, the poor would have either no religion, or a much more expensive one. With regard to her property, her right to it is above question. No part of it, save the tithes, can, by any abuse of language, be called a burden; and if they form one, it, at any rate, rests not on the poor, but principally on the aristocrats. I, however, am convinced that they are not one to any man. If this property gave the clergy too great an influence in political matters, I might think it too large; but I have melancholy evidence, that they have too little of such influence. That it is not greater than the fair needs of the Church, as a whole, require, is abundantly obvious.

But the property of the Church is to be taken for the purpose of reducing the taxes. This is open to various fatal objections—it would be flagrant robbery—it would either deprive the lower classes of religious instruction, or make the cost of obtaining it outweigh the remission of taxation—it would, on the one hand, spread infidelity, and, on the other, fanaticism and superstition—and it would strike at the root of liberty and good government, by striking at religion and morals. These, which might be easily multiplied, are met by the Spirit with nothing but fallacious and guilty declamation. I must, therefore, as a democrat oppose it.

The Corn Law is one of the Spirit's great grievances. To what I have said of this law I will add, that it exists through the wish of vast numbers of the democracy; and that its destruction would demonstrably take from them in effect the chief parts of their property, saying nothing of incomes. The Spirit's absurd self-contradictory assertions to prove that such demoniacal confiscation would yield national benefit, are refuted by this historical fact. Putting out of sight years of scarcity, this country, in every class, always prospered the most with general high prices of corn, and was the most distressed with general low ones. It declares that wages must fall in an equal degree with corn, and this is tantamount to a confession that the abolition of the law is not to benefit the labouring classes. When, therefore, on its own shewing, the abolition would only profit a comparatively trifling part of the population, while it would manifestly plunge half of it into ruin and suffering, I cannot be other than its enemy.

The next item in the Spirit's list of grievances is, the want of Parliamentary Reform. To a certain extent, I am friendly to such reform, as has, on former occasions, been avowed in this Magazine. As a member of the democracy, I dissent altogether from the doctrine that the aristocracy ought to possess not only one House of Parliament, but the ascendancy in the other. While the aristocratic boroughs were pretty fairly divided between the Ministry and the Opposition, I never could discover that the democracy could reap any thing but injury from their abolition. They were then so far from giving the ascendancy in the House of Commons to the aristocracy, that, on general questions, they neutralized its influence; half of them not only supported the democratic cause, but gave it infinitely more effectual support than the democratic ones. But long before the House of Commons acted as it did on the Catholic Question, it was stated, more than once, in this Magazine, that if ever the great borough interests should be brought into lasting union, they ought to be destroyed.

In the last six years, I have seen a union take place and continue session after session, giving a destructive ascendency over both Houses of Parliament, at one time to the democracy, and at another to the aristocracy. I have seen the latter use its borough power in the most profligate manner to inflict a vital injury on the constitution—the command of the majority in the House of Commons taken from the democracy in the legitimate sense of the term—and this House completely reversed in its working, divested of its uses, and perverted into a monstrous engine of evil. In addition, I am not blind to the fact, that the question of reform arrays the democracy against not only the aristocracy, but almost all public institutions. I find in all this abundant reason for thinking that the House of Commons needs reforming in various particulars; I cannot think differently without apostatizing from principles which I have always maintained.

But why does the Spirit of the Age call for reform? For several years the House of Commons has followed its principles, and been its obsequious menial in general policy—what more could it be under any system of election? When in all leading matters, the Whigs and Liberals, nay the Radical reformers, have, according to their own boast, led the House, I ask what they could gain from reform?

The Spirit wishes for reform, that the influence of the aristocracy in the House of Commons may be destroyed. Its argument is—the aristocracy returns so many members, ergo it holds the majority in the House. Any one may see that this is worthless, without proof that these members generally act together as one party; what, therefore, is the fact? Previously to late years, they were commonly divided into two hostile parties of nearly equal strength. Did such parties prevent the members elected by the democracy from acting on their own judgment? These members spontaneously followed them: one of them on creed went with the democracy, and it is clear that if it had been elected by the latter, it would not have been more democratic than it was in principle and deed. Since the aristocratic members have acted in union, they have generally supported the democratic cause, and always followed the Spirit; they have acted on the Spirit's own confession, against the wishes of the aristocracy. Its main fact is thus demonstrably a falsehood.

On whom does the Spirit seek to confer the influence which it wishes to take from the aristocracy? On the working classes chiefly. Is there then any evidence that they will use it more purely and beneficially than the aristocracy has done? The evidence is all of a contrary character. If the aristocrat sells his vote for place and pension, the labourer sells his for liquor and money; if the former is ignorant and prejudiced, the latter is more so; if the one labours to injure the democracy, and is hostile to popular freedom, the other wishes to effect the political and pecuniary ruin of the aristocracy, and attacks both the Church and the Monarchy. Whether we look at integrity, intelligence, or feeling, it is clear that the Spirit wishes to transfer power from bad hands to worse.

But, forsooth! the labourer has a right. Where is the proof? The member of a free community has no rights save those granted by its constitution and laws; he voluntarily abandons all other. In this preposterous doctrine of right, the Spirit virtually maintains that the House of Commons ought to be chosen without reference to its capacity for discharging its duties; and that only one mode of choice ought to be followed, even if it should make of the House a destroyer of both liberty and the empire.

This pretended individual right is a grievous individual wrong to great part of the community. What gives birth to the right to be represented? The right to be equally protected, and to have an equal share in the government. The Spirit grounds its doctrine of universal suffrage on this—every man who pays taxes ought to have a vote in electing those who impose them. Now, if every man have a vote, the most numerous class, of necessity, must monopolize the representation; and, of course, other classes must be deprived of protection and share in the government. Universal suffrage must give the House of Commons exclusively to the lower orders, and thereby, in effect, strip a very large part of the democracy of the right of representation, putting the aristocracy out of the question. Each class and interest must, as a whole, have an equal share of elective power, or there demonstrably can be no real equality of individual representation.

The Spirit of the Age, by its false theory, would give the formation of the House of Commons to the lower classes; it avows that to do so is its object. When I look at these classes, I find that they are advocating schemes which would take from the landowners, farmers, fund-holders, colonists, and clergy, the chief part of their property—that they are warring against property of almost all descriptions. I find them hostile to the existence of the aristocracy, and in no small degree friendly to the overthrow of the Monarchy. In addition, it is notorious, that, as a whole, they exercise the elective franchise in a most corrupt and prejudiced manner, and are disqualified by want of knowledge for making a proper choice. The Spirit tells me that the representative must be what the constituent is; I am compelled to believe that a House of Commons formed by them would be anxious to give effect to their wishes; and I cannot but know, that putting physical force out of view, there would be nothing to prevent it. What this House is, the Ministry must be; and what the ministry is, the peers and crown must be.

I cannot feel any desire to see such a House of Commons. As a member of the democracy, I cannot discover that my order would reap any advantage from the destruction of property, the loss of religious instruction, the extinction of the aristocracy, and the establishment of a republic. On the contrary, I can easily perceive, that the ruin would fall the most heavily on this order—that while it would smite the wealthier part of my brother democrats, it would not spare to the labouring classes the remnant of food and comfort which they still possess. The reform advocated by the Spirit would clearly be the destruction of almost every thing worth possessing.

If the elective franchise be abused, it can make small difference whether the abuse be committed by an aristocrat or a democrat; corruption and incapacity must be as injurious in the one as in the other. This is self-evident; therefore, what am I to think of the Spirit's honesty, when I see it not only sparing the profligate burgess, while it strikes at the less profligate boroughmonger; but pretending to remedy the deficiencies and misdeeds of the latter by protecting and enlarging those of the former? I must think its honesty is not a jot greater than its wisdom.

As a reformer, I follow such men as Mr Pitt and Mr Fox. I must look at the duties of the House of Commons, to know what reform is necessary. In so far as it has to represent public opinion, I find that this is not the mere opinion of the lower orders, which is commonly a borrowed one, and borrowed, too, from these vile sources, the party slave, demagogue, and traitor; it is the opinion of the independent, virtuous, intelligent, and wise part of society; and, consequently, it is even less that of these orders than of the aristocracy. But the House has other duties—it has to manage public affairs, to protect public institutions, and to act with rigid impartiality towards all classes. It is so far from being a democratic thing, formed merely to wage war for the sake of war against the aristocracy, that with its duty of resisting the encroachments of the latter, is associated that of being its adviser, ally, and champion. I must, of course, confide the formation of the House as far as possible to such electors as will make it the most efficient in point of duty: in so far as aristocratic influence is beneficial, I must have it; and to the extent in which democratic influence is pernicious, I must reject it. When I look at late years, I find that both the aristocracy and the democracy have most grossly abused their election power; I therefore wish to apply a remedy to the abuse in both. When I look at the House, I find that the two great parties in it are far too powerful, and that the independent part is much too weak; I therefore wish to weaken the former, and strengthen the latter. From all this, my views of reform make me anxious to transfer power positively and negatively from both the aristocracy and the lower orders, to the better part of the democracy. My object is to make the House of Commons still more democratic—to give it to the democracy; but this must be the real, and not the spurious one. I insist, that, in respect of person, sentiment, and right of corporeal and political character, the democracy is not formed either wholly or principally by the lower classes, and that, as a whole, its political power ought to be exercised by its virtue, intelligence, and wisdom.*

Another grand grievance with the Spirit is, the general power and even existence of the aristocracy: it proclaims not only that the latter ought to have no influence, but also that its natural, as well as constitutional being, is an evil. Its reasons are in a large degree met by what I have said already. A leading one is, that, independently of its seats in the House of Commons, the aristocracy monopolizes too large a share of office, patronage, and control in the general executive. To the mass of the democracy, it makes small difference whether office be held by aristocrats or democrats, provided its duties be performed uprightly and wisely. All history testifies that democratic rulers have been quite as ambitious, mercenary, and unprincipled, as aristocratic ones; I might go farther, but it is not necessary. With regard to wisdom, a glance at the empire is sufficient to prove that, on the whole, it has been governed as wisely as any republic ever was. I grant that continued public suffering proves incapacity in the ruler, and that, on this test, the British government has been for several years a most imbecile one; but I cannot overlook the fact, that, in this term, the government has been under the dictation of the democracy—has been the servile follower of the Spirit of the Age, and its democratic sages. Judging from both the practical rule and general principles of the latter, I cannot discover that they surpass the aristocracy in any point of official character.

* These defects of the present system deserve notice. The labourers in manufactures and trade enjoy the elective franchise to a vast extent; but the agricultural labourer is deprived of it. The annual increase of electors is almost wholly confined to manufacturing and trading ones; while it is very great in them, it scarcely reaches those of agriculture. This annual increase takes place chiefly amidst the lower orders. Every year, in respect of votes, manufactures and trade are gaining immensely on agriculture; and the lower classes on the middle and upper ones. Manufacturing and trading freeholders have multiplied so greatly in late years that they have taken the control of the election in various counties from the agricultural ones. A comparatively short period of time has in many boroughs doubled the number of burgesses, and enabled the lower to wrest the command of the election wholly from the middle classes. I think any Tory worthy of the name, may in this find reason to believe that some change is necessary; at any rate, I am sure every man may, who wishes to preserve the constitution. Those who blindly oppose reform, instead of attacking the reformers with a call for a proper one, will do well to reflect, that while they are doing it, the present system is hourly making a radical reform—is continually expelling both agriculture and the middle classes from the House of Commons. A mighty revolution has already been thus made in the House, and if no remedy be applied, the aristocracy will soon have no other part of it than its boroughs, and the populace will have all the remainder.

Are there any important matters in which the interests of the aristocracy are brought into offensive conflict with those of the democracy? None can be named. The opponents of reform stand only on the defensive, and they plead the general good, but not that of the great alone: their argument is, that the change would be as destructive to the lower as to the higher classes. Whatever may be said against the Corn Law, it obviously stands on that principle of equal protection to property which forms the foundation of the manufacturer's protecting duties; and if there were not a single peer or great landowner in being, it would still be necessary to an immense part of the community. The constitutional use of the aristocracy is, to form a defence to property, right, law, and authority, without regard to rank—to restrain the lower orders from unjust inroads on these to their own injury, as well as that of others; and to act in concert with these orders in promoting the general weal of all classes, without distinction. Its interests are identified with those of the democracy.

Are there any important matters in which these bodies act as separate and hostile ones? On reform, the corn law, &c. &c., the aristocracy is about as much divided as the democracy; while half the latter fights on the aristocratic side, half the former uses its weapons on the democratic one.

Let us suppose the aristocracy to be wholly destroyed, and the state of things wished for by the Spirit to be established. In such case the Broughams, Humes, O'Connells, Cobbetts, Hunts, &c., would be the rulers of the empire; and is there the smallest reason for believing that they would be more honest, disinterested, and wise ones, than it has hitherto generally had? Is there any fair ground for supposing that, with them as the executive, a House of Commons, chosen exclusively by the lower orders, and a republic, the population would be more beneficially governed than it has commonly been? It would be superfluous to answer the questions. Every one may see that the community would be as much divided as it now is on leading questions, and that while, on the one hand, it would be at once plunged into war with all Europe, and stripped of its colonies; on the other, half of it would be, in regard to both labourer and employer, sacrificed to the rest. As a democrat, I must of course defend the aristocracy against the Spirit for the benefit of my own order.

I will only notice another of its causes of revolution which is its leading one—to wit, the distress of the population. I am as anxious to remove this distress as it can be, but I cannot be ignorant that it can only be accomplished by the removal of the causes—what, then, are they? Demonstrably the Spirit and its principles. What has destroyed capital and employment—reduced profits and wages—created foreign competitors—and produced an excess of population? Clearly the Spirit and its principles. And what has constantly opposed all enquiry, remedy, and relief, and insisted, not only that nothing should be done to mitigate the distress, but that nothing should be left undone calculated to increase it? The knowledge of every man replies—the Spirit and its principles.

Putting this aside, is there any evidence to prove that revolution would be a remedy? The Spirit only offers evidence of a contrary character. On its own declarations, it would carry confiscation and want infinitely beyond the point they have reached, and take from the majority of the population the chief part of the property and subsistence it still retains. In addition, it proclaims its great rule of government to be, adherence to its theories and opinions, in utter scorn of their consequences. You must plunder one class of society, and hew another to pieces—destroy this institution, and annul that law—plant confiscation here, and lawlessness there—remove your trusts, reverse your rules, and renounce your convictions, solely from obedience to my will. You must not look at facts, or regard demonstrations—fruits and effects you must not notice—petitions and remonstrances you must sternly disdain—and if your theories and systems overwhelm you with ruin and calamity, you must maintain them merely because they have emanated from my assertions. Such is practically its language. As I know that the worst tyranny which ever cursed the human race, never went to a greater extreme of despotism and oppression, I must be an enemy to a revolutionary government founded upon it.

I might concede much on all these points, if the House of Commons had wholly passed from the influence of the Democracy. The just rights and power of the latter are quite as essential, as those of the Aristocracy; and if any cause had really placed the election of the majority in this House under the control of the aristocracy or the executive, I will, without hesitation, say I would have sanctioned the application of a violent remedy to so violent and portentous an evil. But I find that in one way or another the Democracy controls the election of such a majority in the House, as is abundantly sufficient for giving due effect to its wishes; and I find farther, that for several years, the House has generally followed the opinions of the populace. Here is proof that the people possess ample means, without revolution, for redressing every wrong and grievance they can justly complain of; and I cannot admit that their neglect, or abuse of them, forms any ground for an appeal to treason and rebellion.

This is the Spirit of the Age which I am to take for my bodily and mental tyrant—these are the principles and objects which I am to blindly embrace without examination, merely because the will of the people demands it. If I do, I must violate the laws of my God, and aid in robbing the people of their rights, liberties, privileges, property, and subsistence—I must be a traitor to my religion, my country, and my species; therefore, nothing is left me but indignant refusal.

I now ask, What has made a Spirit like this so omnipotent? What has severed the people from their rulers—marshalled them against their institutions—kindled the fratricidal war between the Democracy and the Aristocracy, the poor and the rich—and created the horrible tempest of revolution, anarchy, and blood, which hangs over us? A thousand voices from amidst the trembling authorities of the realm reply, The bad feelings of the people! The fault is all in the people! I deny it, and solemnly arraign these authorities. I maintain that, in the nature of things, nothing else could have flowed from the conduct which has been for several years pursued by the Crown, the Cabinet, the Legislature, the Aristocracy, and the Clergy.

Previously to this term, it was the policy of government to teach the people to revere the wisdom of their ancestors, and regard as sacred the principles which had made them so great and happy—to make their institutions, religion, and country, objects of chivalrous affection—to cherish the proper feelings between superior and inferior—and to hold speculative change and innovation in abhorrence. Each interest and class was instructed to look on the others as its brethren, and to seek its prosperity in theirs; if one of them fell into distress, the rest were told to sympathize with it, and to think relief given it, at their cost, not a loss, but a gain.

And it was then the policy of government to watch vigilantly over the people's weal, and promptly to administer to them comfort and remedy in suffering. While it carefully protected them from all hazardous changes on theory, it removed all proved evils and abuses to the utmost of its power. Every well-grounded petition from them met its friendly attention; and if any part of them were distressed, it spontaneously and at once gave them consolation, and laboured to relieve them. Every interest and class knew, when overtaken by misfortune, that government, as a matter of course, would take up its case, and render it all the assistance possible.

The British government was then a paternal one.

What followed? The Crown and Ministry naturally carried with them the leading part, not only of the legislative aristocracy, clergy, and press, but also of the democracy; they carried with them the nation. The cause of the constitution and laws, the church and the country, good principles and feelings of every kind, was thus made that of the ascendant party, as well as the national one; patriotism was aided by the fierce and determined enthusiasm of party in rendering it invincible. A gigantic moral force—an overpowering public opinion, was thus created to repress the bad in every thing. It made the profligate publication infamous, and thereby banished it from the better parts of society; even the mighty powers of Lord Byron in their evil efforts were smote and rendered innocuous by it. Insubordination and disloyalty it everywhere restrained, as things criminal, despicable, and disgraceful. In every emergency Government had only to make the appeal, and an omnipotent host appeared in the field, which by moral power bore down all opposition. In the worst days of Radicalism, disaffection was chiefly confined to the lower classes; not only the upper, but the middle ones, were enthusiastically attached to the constitution and laws, and were as ready to draw the sword in their defence against their misguided brethren, as they would have been to do it against a foreign enemy.

Farther, the bonds of union and affection were preserved between different interests and classes. If the lower classes were distressed in any quarter, they received the compassion and assistance of their superiors. The better and influential part of the Democracy saw its principles held, and its interests defended, by the Aristocracy; the various interests saw the same in regard to each other. Government, by removing suffering immediately on its appearance, prevented it from acquiring great magnitude, and forming a source of bad feeling. When its endeavours were unsuccessful, they formed evidence of its good wishes, which satisfied the better part of the sufferers. Its anxiety to protect property made all who possessed any—small landowners, farmers, shipowners, manufacturers, &c., as well as others—its supporters through interest. It placed preservation and profit on the side of loyalty and order; and loss and ruin on that of disaffection and insubordination.

Beyond all this, the community was generally kept in prosperity.

Five or six years ago this policy was totally reversed; and let it never be forgotten, that the change was made without the shadow of compulsion and necessity. The Spirit of the Age, which had previously been ravaging the earth, was subdued; and all was peace, prosperity, content, harmony, and happiness.

The weight of government, physical and moral, was now thrown into the scale with the infidel and revolutionist; it was employed to resuscitate the fallen Spirit of the Age. The Cannings declared that the constitution was essentially vicious and tyrannical in regard to the privileges and protection it gave to the religion of the State. The Huskissons and Grants ridiculed the wisdom of our ancestors, and insisted that the general principles on which the empire had been governed were erroneous and pernicious. The Peels maintained that the country had "outgrown all its institutions," and of course that a batch of new ones was necessary. They naturally smote principles and feelings with laws and institutions; individually, or collectively, they taught the people to despise and hate all established things, to think the political and social system full of barbarous defects and evils, and to regard a comprehensive change on theory as essential. This change, in important points, was, as they confessed, the one called for by the Spirit of the Age. Granting that they did not go quite so far in avowal as their new brethren, this was of no moment. Mr Canning's general insinuations against "foreign despots" and the Church received ample explanation from the explicit diatribes of Mr Brougham and Mr O'Connell. Mr Huskisson's vague assertions in favour of the working classes, had precise meaning given them by the speeches of Mr Hume. When Sir R. Peel declared himself a friend to free trade, the expounders of the latter stated it to be flatly opposed to the Corn Laws and colonial monopolies. If ministers made reservations in act and detail, they avowed that they agreed in general principle with the Whigs and Liberals; and the latter testified to the truth of it. Their newspapers intimated that they were fettered in word and deed by situation and circumstance,—that the Aristocracy prevented them, much against their wishes, from giving the widest application to liberal doctrines. In addition, their open enmity was exclusively directed against those by whom such doctrines were opposed.

Government, by this reversal of policy, not only arrayed the people against their institutions and laws, but incited every interest and class to seek the ruin of the others. It taught the masters to seek wealth in the starvation of their workmen, and the workmen to look for abundance in their masters' loss of capital and profit: it told manufactures and trade they could only find prosperity in the sacrifice of agriculture, and the latter it could only flourish by destroying the protections of the former. The colonies, the banks, and every other interest, were thus, in detail, held up by it as a prey to be hunted down by the other. The divisions, fury, and strife, which this generated throughout the community, all harmoniously conspired to feed the general hostility towards the constitution and laws. The working classes found they could not well pull down their masters, without pulling down law and property. Manufactures and trade perceived that it would aid them greatly in crushing agriculture, to crush the House of Commons and the aristocracy; and the democracy saw, that to subdue its enemy, the aristocracy, it was necessary to subdue the church and monarchy.

And government not only prohibited itself from protecting, but compelled itself to destroy, the public prosperity. This or that interest was flourishing, but it was doing so on mistaken policy, at the cost of the others, therefore it was plunged into ruin for their gain. The shipping interest, or some other, was involved in bankruptcy, but its loss was profit to the others, therefore it could not on any account be relieved. The hundreds and thousands of workmen employed by this trade were enjoying good wages and comfort; but they were doing so to the injury of other trades, therefore they were precipitated into want and wretchedness; and the hundreds of thousands employed in that were perishing from hunger, but their famine was the benefit of other trades, therefore it could not be mitigated. Government, like the Destroying Angel, traversed the empire to give the blow of death to prosperity and competence in every quarter.

The Executive naturally made the Legislature, the Aristocracy, the Democracy, and the Press, with little exception, unanimous in support of its new policy. It combined all parties in such support as a party matter. A moral force—a public opinion, infinitely more stupendous and irresistible than that which had previously existed to protect good feelings and institutions, was created to destroy them. The bad side before had always possessed a strong party, but the good one now had every one against it. The infidel and republican publication sprung from bankruptcy into prosperous and exalted circulation, because it was enabled to mount the colours of the Cabinet. The Whig and the Radical, the foe of the Church and the reviler of the Aristocracy; not only the Broughams and Humes, but the Hunts and Carliles, were now red-hot ministerialists; and propagated their doctrines as those of constituted authorities. Error, guilt, shame, and infamy, were transferred by all authority and moral power to those who defended the constitution and laws, religion and subordination.

The distress produced by government, as well as the strife of interest and class, operated in the most powerful manner in favour of the cause of revolution. It acquired the greatest magnitude, and took a permanent character; every one saw that government had caused his sufferings, and would give him no relief; the man of property perceived that, under the existing system, he must go on from loss to ruin; and the labourer, that he had nothing to expect but an increase of misery; all were assured by the doctrines of authority that the changes which revolution would make would be highly beneficial. Interest was thus placed by government wholly on the side of disaffection, disorder, and rebellion.

When all things in and out of power thus harmoniously conspired to inculcate the principles of the Spirit of the Age, and suppress opposite ones, is it matter of wonder that they were triumphantly successful?

I cannot conceive how the present Ministry can have acquired the hardihood to complain of the feelings and conduct of the people. For several months after it was formed, it was, in genuine popularity, almost the most powerful one that ever existed; it had perfect freedom of choice in policy and creed. Had it resolved to exterminate the Spirit, and re-establish the principles of loyalty, subordination, and harmony, it would have been enthusiastically supported by the better part of the community, and but little opposed by the other. All sides expected it would do so. The bubble of free-trade and innovation had burst, and novelty of an opposite kind was wished for. How has it acted?

It gained office through the only party which has defended the institutions and good feelings of the empire; and then it commenced a war of extermination against it for defending them. Upon this party, the ruffians of the Wellington Press, and the Dawsons of the Wellington Ministry, have heaped all their scurrilities; its publications have been the only ones which the man who fills the office of Attorney-General has thought deserving of being singled out for ruin by his prosecutions; and its principles have been those to which the leading Ministers have confined their dissent and reprobation.

It has at last destroyed this party in respect of feeling and object. As soon as it got fairly seated in office, it made a sweeping change in the fundamental laws of the realm, and in a vital part of the constitution; it did this in defiance of national feeling; and it was enabled to do it by such a hideous display of violated principle and pledge in the legislature as the astonished world never before witnessed. This of course brought the Crown, Cabinet, Legislature, Aristocracy, and Clergy, into fatal conflict with the only part of the community still faithful to them; and it was abundantly sufficient for converting affection into enmity. Nothing else could have severed the powerful bonds which yet bound the mass of the people to their government and institutions. The ground for opposing change and innovation was thus converted into a necessity for them; the party which had opposed them went over to their advocates.

And yet a Ministry which could so act, complains of the feelings and conduct of the people! In the exercise of that birthright which the blood of my fathers purchased, I fervently rejoice, as an Englishman, that rulers who could exhibit such an abuse of power, could not do it with impunity—that it covered them with public animosity, and shook the allegiance of the country to its centre.

On the other hand, this Ministry has regularly supported the Whigs and Liberals. It has praised them as individuals, patronised their publications, and identified itself as far as possible with their principles. In the few points in which it has refused to comply with the full extent of their demands, it has ostentatiously proclaimed its agreement with them in general creed.

Yet a Ministry like this complains of the feelings and conduct of the people! There is not a single feeling or principle entertained by the people, which this Ministry has not directly or indirectly taught them. It has treated loyalty and content as crimes, and given a bounty to disaffection and convulsion. While it has held up those as the only true instructors, who have arrayed the servant against the master, the poor against the rich, revolution against conservation, and republicanism against monarchism; its whole conduct has been of a kind to goad the people into the adoption of their schemes by suffering. Several years since, it was proved before Parliament that a great excess of labourers existed in Kent, which was producing deplorable effects on their circumstances and morals. It has since been again and again pressed on its attention, that the same causes were producing the same effects in various other counties; and it has been clear, that the evil would increase without legislative remedy. Yet Ministers have constantly refused to do any thing in the way of relief. They have acted in the same manner touching every petition from the distressed. The owner of property sinking into ruin, and the starving labourer in every quarter, have been told nothing could be done for them. The community at large has been for years involved in unexampled distress, and these Ministers have regularly refused all enquiry and remedy, save a remission of taxes, little felt, and incapable of reaching the quarters where the distress was the most severe.

Constituted as human nature is, is it possible for a people to remain attached to a system of government which will apply no remedy to its losses and sufferings, and promise nothing but a continuance of them?

What but the conduct of this Ministry on the Catholic question completed the destruction of the character of the Legislature with the People at large, of the Aristocracy with the Democracy, and of the Clergy with the Laity—caused reform to be taken up by the intelligent and virtuous part of the community as a matter of salvation—and converted that question which made the influential part of the Irish people ardent supporters of the constitution and government, and prohibited Irish independence from being mentioned, into one of national strife between England and Ireland for the overthrow of the empire?

Yet a Ministry like this complains of the feelings and conduct of the people!

And what right has the Legislature to join in the complaint? It has for many years zealously taught the feelings and principles entertained by the people, and laboured to suppress all others. When it has regularly made the Broughams, Huskissons, Humes, and O'Connells, the general expounders of its sentiments, why does it quarrel with the people for adopting them? Were its sweeping denunciations against institutions and laws—its attacks on the well-affected, and protection of the traitorous and rebellious—its incitements of every description to revolutionary objects, to be disregarded? When it held up all who defended the glorious fabric under which the country had become so great and happy, as fools, knaves, and enemies of the State, why does it condemn the People for believing it, and lament that such defenders have vanished?

Has not the Legislature in late years swept away the laws which placed the servant under the authority of the master, and prohibited the working classes from forming themselves into the ungovernable masses they now exhibit? Has it not countenanced the doctrine, that the lower orders were the most enlightened and wise part of the community; and sanctioned the schemes for teaching them science without religion, and party-politics without morals? Has it taken a single step to promote religion and morals; and has it not carried on regular war against the Church, and adopted every measure brought before it, calculated to injure morals?

What right, then, has the Legislature to complain of the people?

When it has constantly told the people, that the cheaper corn is, the better for them; and that the principles of free trade are the true ones; is it not natural for them to be the enemies of the corn law and the Aristocracy? When it has assured them that the taxes are the great cause of their sufferings, and cut down property and wages in every calling, without compensation, is it not natural for them to call for the extinction of taxes through the robbery of the public creditor? When it has treated the Church as it has done, can they think her deserving of support? When its ridicule and censures have been cast on every institution, can they be expected to regard the two Houses of Parliament as exceptions? Was it possible for it to act as it did on the Catholic question, and still retain the respect and confidence of the people?

For several years, not a single petition from the people has been able to gain the attention of the Legislature; and, in general, it has covered the petitioners with slander and insult. Immense masses of them have, in detail, implored it to enquire, and receive proofs, in order that it might spare their possessions, or remedy their sufferings; but they have implored in vain. When the country at large was in unparalleled distress, it refused investigation, and declared nothing could be granted as relief beyond a remission of taxes.

While this has been the case in free, but, alas! no longer happy England, the despots of the Continent have been introducing new kinds of employment, making canals, colonizing their waste land, encouraging their manufactures, and doing every thing possible to employ the labour, and protect the property, of their subjects.

When I, as one of the people, look at this humiliating contrast, where am I to find the justification of the Legislature? When I know that the latter had evidence before it, proving the labouring classes in many counties to be almost wholly on the poor-rates, sinking the farmers into insolvency, infinitely too numerous for the quantity of labour, employed as beasts are, and plunged into the extreme of penury and barbarism;—and when I know, too, that my country had, at home and abroad, abundance of waste land, loose capital, and idle shipping, can I think it possessed no means of removing so tremendous an evil? When I know that the suffering interests were in great prosperity before the Legislature took from them their protections, and that the latter could have been easily restored, can I believe that it had no means of relieving them? When I know that, previously to late years, the Legislature almost immediately removed the distress of any interest, can I give credit to the assertion that its means are now restricted to the production of distress?

What am I to think of the defence of the Legislature, as put forth by its spokesmen, the Whigs and Liberals—people who have long formed to this empire the greatest curse that ever scourged humanity? “We know,” cried the Broughams and Humes, “that you are in terrible suffering; but nothing shall be done to relieve you. Your excess of starving labourers cannot be removed, because it is prohibited by political economy. We will relieve them by taking from them their parish allowance, and reducing taxes they do not pay. Free trade must bind your landowners to loss of rent—your farmers to losing prices—your shipowners to losing freights—your producers to loss of capital and profit—and your labourers to famine wages, for the benefit of the rest of the community; by this it is now filling you with riches and abundance. Your distress flows from your taxes, which, when they were double their present amount, never injured you; and now wise and enlightened measures which have swept away your property, profits, wages, and employment, have only prevented it from being more severe. We will remove the loss of your landowners, farmers, shipowners, and other capitalists, by taking a few shillings per annum from their taxes; and give abundance to your famishing labourers by supplying them with cheap beer when they cannot afford to buy any. This will be wonderfully efficacious—it will be an infallible nostrum; but if it happen to be insufficient, we will abolish the corn-law, throw away your colonies, and destroy every remaining protection. In truth, the high prices which your landed and other interests still obtain, form a great source of their loss and insolvency!”

Such has been in plain English the language of these sham patriots—these pretended friends of the people—these real apostles of confiscation, beggary, hunger, misery, and national ruin. On every occasion, they have occupied the first place in refusing enquiry, rejecting petitions, insisting that no suffering, however extreme, no remedy, however obvious, should be attended to, and urging the Ministry to strike at what remained of food and property. Their barbarous ignorance and folly could deceive no man who knew his right hand from his left; and the People could only feel disgust and indignation when they saw the Legislature make itself the menial of such persons.

Free trade has long been acknowledged throughout the country, even by its friends—saving, of course, the scribblers and orators who write and speak of what they do not understand—to be a complete failure: a more conclusive proof of the truth of this could not be given, than the fact, that from the five years which have elapsed since it came into effect, grievous suffering has sat on the community, and especially on those divisions of it which it has more directly affected. Prices and other things prove at this moment that the leading doctrines were wholly erroneous on which small notes were suppressed. Here is demonstration that the Legislature has been long on vital matters acting on the most false and mischievous principles; and can it, therefore, with reason complain that it possesses not the confidence of the people when it still clings to them?

When the labourer who is always on the parish, who is treated like a brute, and who is destitute of common necessities, is assured by the Legislature that nothing shall be done for him—is it matter of wonder that he becomes an incendiary and rebel? When the mechanic and artisan find that the Legislature has given them want for competence, and tells them they have nothing better to hope for—can it be expected that they will be contented and well-affected? When the small and middling landowners, farmers, shipowners, colonists, and other people of property, see that, from the measures of the Legislature, their property is sustaining daily waste, and that it covers them with contumely, and refuses protection from the ruin into which they are sinking—would it not be contrary to the laws of nature for them to be attached to their rulers? When the labourer cannot oppose revolution, without giving permanency to his own want and misery—when the man of property cannot oppose it, without binding himself to a continuance of loss—when the people at large cannot oppose it, without perpetuating a system of rule, which, on creed, plunges division of them after division into ruin, and obstinately refuses protection to the losing, and assistance to the starving—is it not at variance with all that is known of human nature, to imagine they will be its enemies?

In speaking thus of the Legislature, I speak of that which is dead, for the benefit of the living.

And why does the Aristocracy complain of the feelings and conduct of the People? Half of it has taken the lead in giving them such instructors as they have had, and teaching them such doctrines as they have embraced; in this, it has received the sanction and assistance of the other half. To the charge, that they will no longer follow it, I reply, They have been made what they are, by being its followers, and it is only in obedience to its own tuition that they now wish to be its leaders.

Has the Aristocracy in the body endeavoured to convince the People that cheap corn would injure them through the distress it would bring on landowners, farmers, and husbandry labourers? Has it attempted to prove to them that the corn-law, in so far as it gives protection and prosperity to the agriculturists, is beneficial to the rest of the community? Has it defended this law on grounds of general benefit? No; it has told them that cheap bread would be highly advantageous to them, that the doctrines which called for the abolition of the corn-law are true, and that the latter is an evil rendered necessary by the taxes alone. Has it laboured to obtain for other interests the same protection which it enjoys? No; it has assisted in depriving some wholly of protection, and in restricting the rest to that which is not equal to one-third of its own. Some of its publications teach the doctrines of free trade, attack the protecting duties of other interests, and insist that the shipping interest, the fishing one, &c., ought to have none.

What right, then, has it to blame the People for insisting on cheap bread, calling for the robbery of the public creditor, and treating it as an enemy? When shipowners, fishermen, &c. find its own organs declaring that they ought to have no protection whatever, is it not natural for them to attack the protecting duties of the overgrown landowners, and regard it as a destroyer of their fortunes and subsistence?

Has the Aristocracy employed its borough influence in the House of Commons to keep out of this House the empiric and innovator, the infidel and demagogue, the foe of religion and assailant of the constitution; and to place its great parties under the guidance of upright, patriotic, and noble-minded men—men duly qualified to instruct and lead not only it, but the nation? Has it employed this influence to uphold, in the House, virtue, public spirit, honour, and fidelity; and to punish apostasy and profligacy? Has it employed this influence to protect the Church and other institutions, laws and morals? Has it employed this influence to compel the House to listen to the prayers of the people—enquire into the causes of distress—investigate the truth of the principles it acted on—save sinking property—remove penury—and promote prosperity, harmony, and happiness?

If it have done this, I, as one of the People, will be satisfied without reform, and I will answer for the mass of my brethren.

It cannot be necessary for me to say it has done the contrary. My country knows as well as I do, that the Aristocracy alone sent the men to the House of Commons who have brought on her such appalling calamities, and placed her on the brink of revolution—that the Aristocracy alone gave them the power to produce what they have produced—that the Aristocracy alone made them invincible against the people—and that the Aristocracy could at any time have put a stop to their mad career of ruin. I need not point to its conduct on the Catholic Question; nothing but this conduct did induce, and could have induced, the intelligent and virtuous part of the people to take up the cause of reform.

In condemning the call for reform, it attacks its own offspring.

Has the Aristocracy in late years done its constitutional duty in upholding the Monarchy and Church—protecting the just power and independence of the Crown—defending the Sovereign from the tyranny of his Ministers—and repelling the encroachments of the Commons?

The evidence all proves the reverse.

As one of the People, I am reproached for not following the Aristocracy. Which division of it am I to follow? If I select the Whigs, I must associate with those most loathsome of all unnatural reptiles, titled demagogues and rabble Nobles; I must believe all the Spirit of the Age teaches, and make of the House of Commons an engine for stifling the people's prayers, and heaping on them every calamity. If I follow Ministerialists, I must mix with those most venomous of all unnatural reptiles, Nobles whose honour cannot be trusted, Peers who have violated their pledges, and betrayed their cause; I must still be the Spirit's disciple, and I must obey all the commands of the Whigs. I cannot stoop to the contamination, or be so far the enemy of myself and the People. Higher and better leaders than the Aristocracy must be mine.

And what ground have the Clergy for complaining of the feelings and conduct of the People? Have they, as in duty bound, zealously opposed the destructive doctrines which have inundated the country? Have the Universities refuted the mock sciences and counterfeit ethics which have caused government to fill the empire with suffering and demoralization? Has the eloquence of the Prelates, from their seats in Parliament, pointed to the spread of infidelity and licentiousness—denounced public as well as private immorality—invoked opposition to those who were undermining the foundations of society—and supplicated for the means of extending religious instruction amidst the lower orders? Have the Clergy industriously toiled to instruct the ignorant, and reclaim the erring—to win the affection of the laity, and to promote the interests of the Church? In the extremity of the latter, has the laity found in them leaders of apostolic sanctity and courage—the true amidst the faithless—the pure amidst the corrupt—the examples of inflexible fidelity and heroic martyrdom?

History asserts the contrary. She offers evidence that the universities have filled the Cabinet and Legislature with the creed of national ruin; and that the voice of the Prelates has been scarcely heard in Parliament. She proves farther, that the clergy have gone with the stream—have been the instruments of men in power—have used little effort to gain the attachment of the laity—have, in a large degree, fought against it in assailing the Church—have neglected, and, to a great extent, betrayed the interests confided to their care—and have furnished some of the most dark and disgusting examples of violation of principle, treachery, treason, corruption, and profligacy.

What right, then, have the clergy to complain that the people no longer confide in and follow them?

The charges of Radicalism, which are so profusely scattered about, may probably be thrown on me for speaking in this manner. If they be, I care not. I have, for nearly seven years, occupied a prominent place in the political department of this Magazine; and my labours will amply protect me in the eyes of those whose favour I value from the suspicion of being the enemy of my country and her institutions. I have separated the principle from the individual—the object from the party; and that holy cause which I have ever maintained is still mine. I am assailing Radicalism in its head-quarters—attacking the great Radicals—arraigning the worst of the revolutionists, the leaders of revolution; and I am not to be deterred, because I find in these the principles and persons of constituted authorities. I charge, but to reform; and scourge, but to correct. In a crisis like this, we must have before us, in utter scorn of fear and reserve, the great causes.

Here is a state of things wholly without example. The working classes are, with trifling exceptions, on the side of revolution, and the mass of them decidedly so; the body of the middle classes is on the same side, or neutral. Moral power is about as much with revolution, as physical; no one scarcely dares to mention the exploded words—loyalty, subordination, and attachment to the constitution—or to oppose the main doctrines and objects of the revolutionists.

What must be the remedies?

The Ministry is most deservedly despised by the mass of the population. The Whigs naturally are opposed to it, and the body of the Tories, saving a worthless part of the aristocratic ones, are the same; all parties are against it, and this is one great reason why there is no power fully equal to oppose revolution: in addition, the creed of this Ministry prevents effectual opposition to the latter.

Give us a Ministry to which some great portion of the community will warmly attach itself; and let it boldly oppose the doctrines of the Spirit of the Age. A mighty physical and moral force, comprehending the authorities of the realm, will thus be at once brought into the field on the side of peace and conservation.

The great objects of the revolutionary part of the people have much less to do with politics, than they had formerly. Reform and a republic are but secondary matters and means; the King is popular; and no great degree of exasperation is manifested towards public authorities. The war is one of hunger against property, and loss against the causes of it; it seeks principally employment, adequate wages, and protection of property. For the last two or three years it has been the general remark amidst the working classes—We cannot bear this much longer, and if government will do nothing for us, we must do something for ourselves. The disaffection of the middle classes arises chiefly from their losses.

Acting upon this, let the new Ministry begin without delay to remove want and loss. Let it clear Kent and other counties of their excess of labourers. Let it give to landowners and farmers that protection which will secure their property and enable them to give adequate wages; and do the same to every interest. Give employment and proper wages to the husbandry labourers, artisans, &c., and they will be again peaceable and contented; give security of property and profits to the landowners, farmers, shipowners, &c. &c., and they will be again loyal: give good wages to your labouring classes, and good profits to your producers; and you will make your town shopkeepers prosperous and well affected.

In giving the most prompt and liberal relief to every suffering interest and class, let evil things be sternly repressed in every quarter. In giving food and employment to the labourers, put down their combinations, and bring them again under the government of their masters. In giving protection and prosperity to the various interests, extinguish those brutal and horrible doctrines which assert that each must flourish through the injury of the others—that the capitalist must be enriched by the starvation of the labourer; and manufactures must prosper through the insolvency of agriculture. In giving to each interest all the protection it can fairly desire, resolutely compel it to contribute liberally to the benefit of the others.

Let the Aristocracy employ its influence in the House of Commons in aid of all this. Let it at once take up the real cause of the people, and insist on comprehensive enquiry and remedy. Let it, in this House, silence the wretched brawlers who keep up the outcry touching taxes and retrenchment, and who insist that the Legislature ought to produce loss and hunger, but not to relieve them. Let it demand ample protection, not only for the small landowner and farmer, but for every manufacturer and trader who needs it. In addition to this, let it on its estates use its influence to bring its tenants and their labourers together under the same roof, and to establish the excess of labourers on the waste lands.

Let the Clergy think of their religion, and not of themselves—shake off their subserviency to power—cultivate the attachment of the laity—place themselves at its head for the protection of the Church—and labour without ceasing for the extension of religion amidst the lower orders.

You may call this unworthy of notice; be it so, but what can ~~you~~ hope for from a continuance of your system? If you still follow the Huskissons, Peels, Broughams, and Humes, what will they next lead you to? You have got your cheap labour, and it has given you incendiaries and rebels; you have got your low prices, and they have given you beggary, convulsion, and revolution. You may smite what remains of protection, and then stand still in savage insensibility to the ruin and misery you have produced; but will your inaction be tolerated? You may, when the suffering body brings its distresses before you, “let it alone,” but will the let-it-alone system let you alone? Let your present situation cause you to reflect deeply on these questions before you proceed farther. It is demonstrable, that, if the sufferings of your labouring classes be but a little increased, they will, in a mass, overthrow your whole fabric of government and society;—it is equally demonstrable, that, with your present system, these sufferings will continually increase;—it is equally demonstrable, that nothing but legislative measures can remove their excess, and enable their employers to give them adequate wages;—it is equally demonstrable, that nothing but such measures can relieve the distressed interests;—and it is therefore demonstrable, that you must wholly reverse your system, or have revolution. You have money, land, and every other requisite in profusion for making the empire almost immediately prosperous, contented, harmonious, and loyal; and woe to you if you refuse to employ them!

I am, sir, &c. &c.

ONE OF THE DEMOCRACY.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAPTER V.

A "MAN ABOUT TOWN."—DEATH AT THE TOILET.

* * THE London Medical Gazette having, in somewhat uncourtly terms, preferred an accusation of plagiarism against the original writer of this Diary—with reference to the citation (in the case "Intriguing and Madness") of the passage from Shakspeare, affirming memory to be the test of madness—"Bring me to the test," &c.);—asserting, in downright terms, that the illustration in question was "borrowed without scruple or acknowledgment from Sir Henry Hallford,"—and was "truly a little too bare-faced;"—the Editor of these Passages simply assures the reader, that from circumstances, this is impossible, and the reader would know it to be so, could these circumstances be communicated consistently with the Editor's present purposes. And farther, the Editor immediately wrote to Sir Henry Hallford, disproving the truth of the assertion in the Medical Gazette, and has received a note from Sir Henry, stating his "perfect satisfaction" with the explanation given. The other absurd and groundless allegations contained in the article in question, are not such as to require an answer.

London, 12th November, 1880.

A "MAN ABOUT TOWN."

I HATE humbug, and would eschew that cant and fanaticism which are at present tainting extensive portions of society, as sincerely as I venerate and wish to cultivate a spirit of sober, manly, and rational piety. It is not, therefore, to pander to the morbid tastes of overweening saintliness, to encourage its arrogant assumptions, sanction its hateful, selfish exclusiveness, or advocate that spirit of sour, diseased, puritanical seclusion from the innocent gaieties and enjoyments of life, which has more deeply injured the interests of religion than any of its professed enemies; it is not, I repeat, with any such unworthy objects as these that this melancholy narrative is placed on record. But it is to shew, if it ever meet their eyes, your "men about town," as the élite of the rakish fools and flutterers of the day are significantly termed, that some portions of the page of profligacy are black—black with horror, and steeped in the tears, the blood of anguish and remorse wrung from ruined thousands!—that often the "iron is entering the very soul" of those who present to the world's eye an exterior of glaring gaiety and recklessness;—that gilded guilt must, one day, be stripped of its tinsel, and flung into the haze and gloom of outer darkness. These are the only objects for which this black passage is laid before the reader, in which I have undertaken to describe pains and agonies, which these eyes witnessed, and that with all the true frightfulness of reality. It has, indeed, cost me feelings of little less than torture to retrace the leading features of the scenes with which the narrative concludes.

"Hit him—pitch it into him! Go it, boys—go it! Right into your man, each of you, like good ones!—Top sawyers these!—Hurra! Tap his claret-cask—draw his cork!—Go it—go it—beat him, big one! lick him, little one! Hurra!—Slash, smash—fib away—right and left!—Hollo!—(Clear the way there!—Ring! ring!)"

These, and many similar exclamations, may serve to bring before the reader one of those ordinary scenes in London—a street row; arising, too, out of circumstances of equally frequent recurrence. A gentleman(!) prowling about Piccadilly, towards nightfall in the month of November, in quest of adventures of a certain description, had been offering some impertinence to a female of respectable appearance, whom he had been following for some minutes. He was in the act of putting his arm round her waist, or taking some similar liberty, when he was suddenly seized by the collar from behind, and jerked off the pavement so violently, that he fell nearly at full length in the gutter. This feat was performed by the woman's husband, who had that moment rejoined her, having left her only a very short time before, to leave a message at one of the coach-offices, while she walked on, being in haste. No man of ordinary spirit could endure such rough handling tamely. The instant, therefore, that the prostrate man had recovered his footing, he sprang towards his assailant, and struck him furiously over the face with his umbrella. For a moment the man seemed disinclined to return the blow, owing to the passionate dissuasions of his wife; but it was useless—his English blood began to boil under the idea of submitting to a blow, and, hurriedly exclaiming, "Wait a moment, sir,"—he pushed his wife into the shop adjoining, telling her to stay till he returned. A small crowd stood round. "Now, by —, sir, we shall see which is the better man!" said he, again making his appearance, and putting himself into a boxing attitude. There was much disparity between the destined combatants, in point both of skill and size. The man last named was short in stature, but of a square iron-build; and it needed only a glance at his posture to see he was a scientific, perhaps a thoroughbred, bruiser. His antagonist, on the contrary, was a tall, handsome, well-proportioned, gentlemanly man, apparently not more than twenty-eight, or thirty years old. Giving his umbrella into the hands of a bystander, and hurriedly drawing off his gloves, he addressed himself to the encounter with an ungaurded impetuosity, which left him wholly at the mercy of his cool and practised opponent.

The latter seemed evidently inclined to play a while with his man, and contented himself with stopping several heavily-dealt blows, with so much quickness and precision, that every one saw "the big one had caught a Tartar" in the man he had provoked. Watching his opportunity, like a tiger, crouching noiselessly in preparation for the fatal spring, the short man delivered such a slaughtering left-handed hit full in the face of his tall adversary, accompanied by a tremendous "doubling-up" body-blow, as in an instant brought him senseless to the ground. He who now lay stunned and blood-streamed on the pavement, surrounded by a rabble jeering the fallen "swell," and exulting at seeing the punishment he had received for his impertinence, which the conqueror pithily told them, as he stood over his prostrate foe, was the Honourable St John Henry Effingstone, presumptive heir to a marquise; and the victor, who walked coolly away as if nothing had happened, was Tom —, the prize-fighter.

Such was the occasion of my first introduction to Mr Effingstone; for I was driving by at the time this occurrence took place; and my coachman, seeing the crowd, slackened the pace of his horses, and I desired him to stop. Hearing some voices cry, "Take him to a doctor," I let myself out, announced my profession, and seeing a man of very gentlemanly and superior appearance, covered with blood, and propped against the knee of one of the people round, I had him brought into my carriage, saying I would drive him to his residence close by, which his cards shewed me was in — Street. Though much disfigured, and in great pain, he had not received any injury likely to be attended with danger. He soon recovered; but an infinitely greater annoyance remained after all the other symptoms had disappeared—his left eye was sent into deep mourning, which threatened to last for some weeks; and could any thing be more vexatious to a gay man about town? for such was Mr Effingstone—but no ordinary one. He did not belong to that crowded class of essenced fops, of silly coxcombs, hung in gold chains, and bespangled with a profusion of rings, brooches, pins, and quizzing-glasses, who are to be seen in fine weather glistening about town, like fire-flies in India. He was no walking advertisement of the superior articles of his tailor, mercer, and jeweller. No—Mr Effingstone was really a man about town, and yet no puppy. He was worse—an abandoned profligate, a systematic debauchee, an irreclaimable reprobate. He stood pre-eminent amidst the throng of men of fashion, a glaring form of guilt, such as Milton represents Satan—

"In shape and gesture proudly eminent,"

among his gloomy battalions of fallen spirits. He had nothing in common with the set of men I have been alluding to, but that he chose to drink deeper from the same foul and maddening cup of dissipation. Their minor fooleries and "naughtinesses," as he termed them, he despised. Had he not neglected a legitimate exercise of his transcendent talents, he might have become, with little effort, one of the first men of his age. As for actual knowledge, his powers of acquisition seemed unbounded. Whatever he read he made his own; good or bad, he never forgot it. He was equally intimate with ancient and modern scholarship. His knowledge of the varieties and distinctions between the ancient sects of philosophers was more minutely accurate, and more successfully brought to bear upon the modern, than I am aware of having ever known in another. Few, very few, that ever I have been acquainted with, could make a more imposing and effective display of the "dazzling fence of logic." Fallacies, though never so subtle, so exquisitely raisonné to the truth, and calculated to evade the very ghost of Aristotle himself, melted away instantaneously before the first glance of his eye. His powers were acknowledged and feared by all who knew him—as many a discomfited sciolist now living can bear testimony. His acuteness of perception was not less remarkable. He anticipated all you meant to convey, before you had uttered more than a word or two. It was useless to kick or wince under such treatment—to find your own words thrust back again down your own throat as useless, than which few things are more provoking to men with the slightest spice of petulance. A conviction of his overwhelming power kept you passive beneath his grasp. He had, as it were, extracted and devoured the kernel, while you were attempting to decide on the best method of breaking the shell. His wit was radiant, and, fed by a fancy both lively and powerful, it flashed and sparkled on all sides of you like lightning. He had a strong bent towards satire and sarcasm, and that of the bitterest and fiercest kind. If you chanced unexpectedly to become its subject, you sneaked away consciously seared to your very centre. If, however, you really wished to acquire information from him, no one was readier to open the vast storehouses of his learning. You had but to start a topic requiring elucidation of any kind, and presently you saw, grouped around it, numerous, appropriate, and beautiful illustrations, from almost every region of knowledge. But then you could scarce fail to observe the spirit of pride and ostentation which pervaded the whole. If he failed anywhere—and who living is equally excellent in all things?—it was in physics. Yes, here he was foiled. He lacked the patience, perseverance, and almost exclusive attention, which the cold and haughty goddess presiding over them invariably exacts from her suitors. Still, however, he had that showy general intimacy with its outlines, and some of its leading features, which earned him greater applause than was doled out reluctantly and suspiciously to the profoundest masters of science.

Yet Mr Effingstone, though such as I have described him, gained no distinctions at Oxford; and why? because he knew that all acknowledged his intellectual supremacy; that he had but to extend his foot, and stand on the proudest pedestal of academical eminence. This satisfied him. And another reason for his conduct once slipped out in the course of my intimacy with him:—His overweening, I may say, almost unparalleled pride, could not brook the idea of the remotest chance of failure! The same thing accounted for another manifestation of his peculiar character. No one could conceive how, when, or where, he came by his wonderful knowledge. He never seemed to be doing any thing; no one ever saw him reading or writing, and yet he came into the world au fait at almost every thing! All this was attributable to his pride, or, I should say more correctly, his vanity. "Results, not processes, are for the public eye," he was fond of saying. In plain English, he would shine before men, but would not that they should know the pains and expense with which his lamp was fed. And this highly-gifted individual, as to intellect, it was, who chose to track the waters of dissipation, to career among their sunk rocks, shoals, and quicksands, even till he sunk and perished in them! By some strange omission in his moral conformation, his soul seemed utterly destitute of any sympathies for virtue; and whenever I looked at him, it was with feelings of concern, alarm, and wonder, akin to those with which one might contemplate the frightful creature brought into being by Frankenstein. Mr Effingstone seemed either wholly incapable of appreciating moral excellence, or wilfully contemptuous of it. While reflecting carefully on his intimacy, which several years' intimacy gave me many opportunities of doing, and endeavouring to account for his fixed inclination towards vice, and that in its most revolting form, and most frantic excesses, at a time when he was consciously possessed of such capabilities of excellence of every description;—it has struck me that a little incident, which came to my knowledge casually, afforded a clew to the whole—a key to his character. I one day chanced to overhear a distinguished friend of his father's lamenting that a man "of Mr St John's mighty powers" could prostitute them in the manner he did; and the reply made by his father was, with a sigh, that "St John was a splendid sinner, and he knew it." From that hour the key-stone was fixed in the arch of his unalterable, irreclaimable depravity. He felt a Satanic satisfaction in the consciousness of being an object of regret and wonder among those who most enthusiastically acknowledged his intellectual supremacy. How infinitely less stimulating to his morbid sensibilities would be the placid approval of virtue—a commonplace acquiescence in the ordinary notions of virtue and religion! He wished rather to stand out from the multitude—to be severed from the herd. "Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven," he thought; and he was not long in sinking many fathoms lower into the abyss of atheism. In fact, he never pretended to the possession of religious principle; he had acquiesced in the reputed truths of Christianity like his neighbours; or, at least, kept doubts to himself, till he fancied his reputation required him to join the crew of fools, who blazon their unbelief. This was "dammed fine."

Conceive, now, such a man as I have truly, but, perhaps, imperfectly, described Mr Effingstone—in the possession of L.3000 a-year—perfectly his own master—with a fine person and most fascinating manners—capable of acquiring with ease every fashionable accomplishment—the idol, the dictator of all he met—and with a dazzling circle of friends and relatives:—conceive for a moment such a man as this, let loose upon the town! Will it occasion wonder if the reader is told how soon nocturnal studies, and the ambition of retaining his intellectual character which prompted them, were supplanted by a blind, absorbing, reckless devotion—for he was incapable of anything but in extremes—to the gaming-table, the turf, the cockpit, the ring, the theatres, and daily and nightly attendance on those haunts of detestable debauchery, which I cannot foul my pen with naming?—that a two or three years' intimacy with such scenes as these had conducted, in the first instance, to shed a haze of indistinctness over the multifarious acquirements of his earlier and better days, and finally to blot out large portions with blank oblivion?—that his soul's sun shone in dim discoloured rays through the fogs—the vault-vapours of profligacy?—that prolonged desuetude was gradually, though unheededly, benumbing and palsyng his intellectual faculties?—that a constant "feeding on garbage" had vitiated and depraved his whole system, both physical and mental?—and that, to conclude, there was a lamentable, an almost incredible, contrast between the glorious being, Mr Effingstone, at twenty-one, and that poor faded creature—that prematurely superannuated debauchee, Mr Effingstone, at twenty-seven?

I feel persuaded I shall not be accused of travelling out of the legitimate sphere of these "Passages," of forsaking the track of professional detail, in having thus attempted to give the reader some faint idea of the intellectual character of one of the most extraordinary young men that have ever flashed, meteor-like, across the sphere of my own observation. Not that in the ensuing pages, it will be in my power to exhibit him such as he has been described, doing and uttering things worthy of his great powers. Alas, alas! he was "fallen, fallen, fallen" from that altitude long before it became my province to know him professionally. His decline and fall are alone what remain for me to describe. I am painting from the life, and those are living who know it: that I am describing the character and career of him who once lived,—who deliberately immolated himself before the shrine of debauchery; and they can, with a quaking heart, attest the truth of the few bitter and black passages of his remaining history, which here follow.

The reader is acquainted with the circumstances attending my first professional acquaintance with Mr Effingstone. Those of the second are in perfect keeping. He had been prosecuting an enterprise of seduction, the interest of which was, in his eyes, enhanced a thousandfold, on discovering that the object of his illicit attentions was—married. She was, I understood, a very handsome, fashionable woman; and she fell—for Mr Effingstone was irresistible! He was attending one of their assignations one night, which she was, unexpectedly unable to keep; and he waited so long at the place of meeting, but slightly clad, in the cold and inclement weather, that when he returned home at an early hour in the morning, intensely chagrined, he felt inclined to be very ill. He could not rise to breakfast. He grew rapidly worse; and when I was summoned to his bedside, he exhibited all the symptoms of a very severe inflammation of the lungs. One or two concurrent causes of excitement and chagrin aggravated his illness. He had been very unfortunate in betting on the Derby, and was threatened with an arrest from his tailor, whom he owed some hundreds of pounds, which he could not possibly pay. Again—a wealthy remote member of the family, his god-father, having heard of his profligacy, altered his will, and left every farthing he had in the world, amounting to upwards of fifty or sixty thousand pounds, to a charitable institution, the whole of which had been originally destined to Mr Effingstone.

The only notice taken of him in the old gentleman's will was, "To St John Henry Effingstone, my unworthy godson, I bequeath the sum of five pounds sterling, to purchase a Bible and Prayer-book, believing the time may yet come when he will require them."—These circumstances, I say, added to one or two other irritating concomitants, such as will sometimes succeed in stinging your men about town into something like reflection, brief and futile though it be, contributed to accelerate the inroads of his dangerous disorder. We were compelled to adopt such powerful antiphlogistic treatment as reduced him to within an inch of his life. Previous to, and in the course of, this illness, he exhibited one or two characteristic traits.

"Doctor—is delirium usually an attendant on this disorder?" he enquired one morning. I told him it was—very frequently.

"Ah! then, I'd better become zygotic, with one of old, and bite out my tongue; for, d—n it! my life won't bear ripping up! I shall say what will horrify you all! Delirium blackens a poor fellow sadly among his friends, doesn't it? Babbling devil—what can silence it? D—n, if you should hear me beginning to let out, suffocate me, doctor." * *

"Any chance of my giving the GREAT CUT this time, doctor, eh?" he enquired the same evening, with great apparent nonchalance. Seeing my puzzled air—for I did not exactly comprehend the low expression, "great cut"—he asked quickly, "Doctor, shall I die, d'ye think?" I told him I certainly apprehended great danger, for his symptoms began to look very serious. "Then the ship must be cleared for action. What is the best way of ensuring recovery, provided it is to be?" I told him that, among other things, he must be kept very quiet—must not have his mind excited by visitors.

"Nurse, please ring the bell for George," said he, suddenly interrupting me. The man in a few moments answered the summons. "George, d'ye value your neck, eh?" The man bowed. "Then, harkee, see you don't let in a living soul to see me, except the medical people. Friends, relatives, mother, brothers, sisters, d—n, sirrah! shut them all out —And, harkee, duns especially. If ——— should come, and get inside the door, kick him out again; and if ——— comes, and ———, and ———, tell them, that if they don't mind what they are about, d—n them! I'll die, if it's only to cheat them." The man bowed and retired. "And—and —doctor, what else?"

"If you should appear approaching your end, Mr Effingstone, you would allow us, perhaps, to call in a clergyman to assist you in your devot—"

"What—ch—a parson? Oh, ——— it! no, no—out of the question—non ad rem, I assure you," he replied hastily. "D'y^e think I can't roll down to hell fast enough, without having my wheels oiled by their hypocritical humbug? Don't name it again, doctor, on any account, I beg."

* * * He grew rapidly worse, but ultimately recovered. His injunctions were obeyed to the letter; for his man George idolized his master, and turned a deaf ear to all applications for admission to his master's chamber. It was well there was no one of them present to listen to his ravings; for the disorgings of his polluted soul were horrible. His progress towards convalescence was by very slow steps; for the energies of both mind and body had been dreadfully shaken. His illness, however, had worked little or no alteration in his moral sentiments—or, if any thing, for the worse.

"It won't do at all, will it, doctor?" said Mr Effingstone, when I was visiting him, one morning, at the house of a titled relation in ——— square, whither he had been removed to prepare for a jaunt to the continent. "What do you allude to, Mr Effingstone?—What won't do?" I asked, for I knew not to what he alluded, as the question was the first break of a long pause in our conversation, which had been quite of a miscellaneous character. "What won't do? Why, the sort of life I have been leading about town these two or three last years," he replied. "By G—, doctor, it has nearly wound me up, has not it?"

"Indeed, Mr Effingstone, I think so. You have had a very, very nar-rowescape—have been within a hair's breadth of your grave."—"Aye," he exclaimed, with a sigh, rubbing his hand rapidly over his noble forehead, "twas a complete toss up whether I should go or stay!—But come, come, the good ship has weathered the storm bravely, though she has been battered a little in her timbers!" said he, striking his breast, "and she's fit for sea again already, with a little caulking, that is. Helgho! what a d—d fool illness makes a man! I've had some of the strangest, oddest twingings—such gleams and visions!—What d'y^e think, doctor, I've had dinging in my ears night and day, like a d—d church-bell? Why, a passage from old Persius, and this is it (you know I was a dab at Latin once, doctor,) rotundo ore,

'Magne Pater divum! sævos punire tyrannos

Hand alia ratione velis, quam dira libido Moverit ingenium, ferventi tineta veneno;
—Virtutem videant—intabescantque relictâ! *

True and forcible enough, isn't it?"

"Yes," I replied, and expressed my satisfaction at his altered sentiments. "He might rely on it," I ventured to assure him, "that the paths of virtue, of religion"—I was going too fast.

"Pho, pho, doctor! No humbug, I beg—come, come, no humbug—no nonsense of that sort! I meant nothing of the kind, I can assure you! I'm a better Bentley than you, I see! What d'y^e think is my reading of 'virtutem videant?'—Why—let them get wives when they're worn out, and want nursing—ah, ha!—curse me! I'd go on raking—ay, d—n it, I would, sour as you look about it!—but I'm too much the worse for wear at present—I must recruit a little."

"Mr Effingstone, I'm really confounded at hearing you talk in so light a strain! Forgive me, my dear sir, but"—

"Fiddle-de-dee, doctor! Of course, I'll forgive you, if you won't repeat the offence. 'Tis unpleasant—a nuisance—'tis, upon my soul! Well, however, what do you think is the upshot of the whole—the practical point—the winding up of affairs—the balancing of the books”—he delighted in accumulations of this sort—“the shutting up of the volume, eh? D—e! I’m going to get married—I am, by —! I’m at dead-low water-mark in money-matters—and, in short, I repeat it, I intend to marry—a gold bag! A good move, isn’t it? But, to be candid, I can’t take all the credit of the thing to myself, either, having been a trifle bored, bullied, badgered into it by the family. They say the world cries shame on me! simpletons, why listen to the world!—I only laugh, ha, ha, ha! and cry, curse on the world—and so we are quits with one another!—By the way, the germ of that’s to be found in that worthy fellow Plautus!”

All this, uttered with Mr Effingstone’s characteristic emphasis and rapidity of tone and manner, conveyed his real sentiments; and it was not long before he carried them into effect. He spent two or three months in the south of France; and not long after his return to England, with restored health and energies, he singled out from among the many, many women who would have exulted in being an object of the attentions of the accomplished, the celebrated, Mr Effingstone, Lady E——, the very flower of English aristocratical beauty, daughter of a distinguished peer, and sole heiress to the immense estates of an aged baronet in——shire.

The unceasing exclusive attentions exacted from her suitor by this haughty young beauty, operated for a while as a salutary check upon Mr Effingstone’s reviving propensities to dissipation. So long as there was the most distant possibility of his being rejected, he was her willing slave at all hours, on all occasions; yielding implicit obedience, and making incessant sacrifices of his own personal conveniences. As soon, however, as he had “run down the game,” as he called it, and the young lady was so far compromised in the eyes of the world, as to render retreat next to impossible, he began to slacken in his attentions; not, however, so palpably and visibly as to alarm either her ladyship or any of their mutual relations or friends. He compensated for the attentions he was obliged to pay her by day, by the most extravagant nightly excesses. The pursuits of intellect, of literature, and philosophy, were utterly and apparently finally discarded—and for what? For wallowing swinishly in the foulest sinks of depravity, herding among the acknowledged outcasts, commingling intimately with the very scum and refuse of society, battenning on the rottenness of obscenity, and revelling amid the hellish orgies celebrated nightly in haunts of nameless infamy. Gambling, gluttony, drunkenness, harlotry, blasphemy! * * *

¶ I cannot bring myself to make public the shocking details with which the five following pages of Dr ——’s Diary are occupied. They are too revolting for the columns of this distinguished Magazine, and totally unfit for the eyes of its miscellaneous readers. If printed, they would appear to many absolutely incredible. They are little else than a corroboration of what is advanced in the sentences immediately preceding this interjected paragraph. What follows must be given only in a fragmentary form—the cup of horror must be poured out before the reader, only κατὰ σταγόνας.†]

Mr Effingstone, one morning, accompanied Lady E—— and her mother to one of the fashionable shops, for the purpose of aiding the former in her choice of some beautiful Chinese toys, to complete the ornamental department of her boudoir. After having purchased some of the most splendid and costly articles which had been exhibited, the ladies drew on their gloves, and gave each an arm to Mr Effingstone to lead them to the carriage. Lady E—— was in a flutter of unusually animated spirits, and was complimenting Mr Effingstone, in enthusiastic terms, on the taste with which he had guided their purchases; and they had left the shop door, the footman was letting down the carriage steps, when a very young woman, elegantly dressed, who happened to be passing at that moment, seemingly in a state of deep dejection, suddenly started on seeing and recognising Mr Effingstone, placed herself between them and the carriage, and lifting her clasped hands, exclaimed, in piercing accents, "Oh, Henry, Henry, Henry! how cruelly you have deserted your poor ruined girl! What have I done to deserve it? I'm broken-hearted, and can rest nowhere! I've been walking up and down M—— street nearly three hours this morning to get a sight of you, but could not! Oh, Henry! how differently you said you would behave before you brought me up from ——shire!" All this was uttered with the impassioned vehemence and rapidity of highly excited feelings, and uninterrupted; for both Lady E—— and her mother seemed perfectly petrified, and stood pale and speechless. Mr Effingstone, too, was for a moment thunderstruck; but an instant's reflection shewed him the necessity of acting with decision one way or another. Though deadly pale, he did not disclose any other symptom of agitation; and with an assumed air of astonishment and irrecognition, exclaimed, concernedly, "Poor creature! unfortunate thing! Some strange mistake this!" — "Oh, no, no, no, Henry! it's no mistake! You know me well enough — I'm your own poor Hannah!"

"Pho, pho! nonsense, woman! I never saw you before." —

"Never saw me! never saw me!" almost shrieked the girl, "and is it come to this?" — "Woman, don't be foolish — cease, or we must give you over to an officer as an impostor," said Mr Effingstone, the perspiration bursting from every pore. "Come, come, your ladyships had better allow me to hand you into the carriage. See, there's a crowd collecting."

"No, no, Mr Effingstone," replied Lady E——'s mother with excessive agitation; "this very singular — strange affair — if it is a mistake — had better be set right on the spot. Here, young woman, can you tell me what is the name of this gentleman?" pointing to Mr Effingstone.

"Effingstone — Effingstone, to be sure, ma'am," sobbed the girl, looking imploringly at him. The instant she had uttered his name, the two ladies, dreadfully agitated, withdrew their arms from his, and with the footman's assistance, stepped into their carriage and drove off rapidly, leaving Mr Effingstone bowing, kissing his hand, and assuring them that he should "soon settle this absurd affair," and be at —— street before their ladyships. They heard him not, however; for the instant the carriage had set off, Lady E—— fainted.

"Young woman, you're quite mistaken in me — I never saw you before. Here is my card — come to me at eight to-night," he added, in an under tone, so as to be heard by none but her he addressed. She took the hint, appeared pacified, and each withdrew different ways — Mr Effingstone almost suffocated with suppressed execrations. He flung himself into a hackney-coach, and ordered it to —— street, intending to assure Lady E——, with a smile, that he had instantly "put an end to the ridiculous affair." His knock, however, brought him a prompt "Not at home," though their carriage had but the instant before driven from the door. He jumped again into the coach, almost gnashing his teeth with fury, drove home, and dispatched his groom with a note, and orders to wait an answer. He soon brought it back, with the intelligence that Lord and Lady —— had given their porter orders to reject all letters or messages from Mr Effingstone! So there was an end of all hopes from that quarter. This is the history of what was mysteriously hinted at in one of the papers of the day, as a "strange occurrence in high life, which would probably break off a matrimonial affair long considered as settled." — But how did Mr Effingstone receive his ruined dupe at the appointed hour of eight? He answered her expected knock himself.

"Now, look, ——!" said he sternly, extending his arm to her menacingly, "if ever you presume to darken my doors again, by ——, I'll murder you! I give you fair warning. You've ruined me — you have, you accursed creature!"

"Oh, my God! What am I to do to live? What is to become of me?" groaned the victim.

"Do? Why go and be ——! And here's something to help you on your way — there!" and he flung her a cheque for L.50, and shut the door violently in her face.

Mr Effingstone now plunged into profligacy with a spirit of almost diabolical desperation. Divers dark hints, stinging innuendoes, appeared in the papers, of his disgraceful notoriety in certain scenes of an abominable description. But he laughed at them. His family at length cast him off, and refused to recognise him till he chose to alter his courses—to “purge.”

Mr Effingstone was boxing one morning with Belasco—I think it was—at the latter’s rooms; and was preparing to plant a hit which the fighter had defied him to do, when he suddenly dropped his guard, turned pale, and in a moment or two, fell fainting into the arms of the astounded boxer. He had several days previously suspected himself the subject of indisposition—how could it be otherwise, keeping such hours, and living such a life as he did—but not of so serious a nature as to prevent him from going out as usual. As soon as he had recovered, and swallowed a few drops of spirits and water, he drove home, intending to have sent immediately for Mr —, the well-known surgeon; but on arriving at his rooms, he found a travelling carriage-and-four waiting before the door, for the purpose of conveying him instantly to the bedside of his dying mother, in a distant part of England, as she wished personally to communicate to him something of importance before she died. This he learnt from two of his relatives, who were up stairs giving directions to his servant to pack up his clothes, and make other preparations for his journey, so that nothing might detain him from setting off the instant he arrived at his rooms. He was startled—alarmed—confounded at all this. Good God, he thought, what was to become of him? He was utterly unfit to undertake a journey, requiring instant medical attendance, which had already been too long deferred; for his dissipation had already made rapid inroads on his constitution. Yet what was to be done? His situation was such as could not be communicated to his brother and sister-in-law—for he did not choose to encounter their sarcastic reproaches.

He had nothing for it but to get into the carriage with them, go down to —shire, and when there, devise some plausible pretext for returning instantly to town. That, however, he found impracticable. His mother would not trust him out of her sight one instant, night or day—but kept his hand close locked in hers; he was also surrounded by the congregated members of the family—and could literally scarce stir out of the house an instant. He dissembled his illness with tolerable success—till his aggravated agonies drove him almost beside himself. Without breathing a syllable to any one but his own man, whom he took with him, he suddenly left the house, and without even a change of clothes, threw himself into the first London coach—and by two o’clock the next day was at his own rooms in M—street, in a truly deplorable condition, and attended by Sir — and myself. The consternation of his family in —shire may be conceived. He trumped up some story about his being obliged to stand second in a duel—but his real state was soon discovered. Nine weeks of unmitigated agony were passed by Mr Effingstone—the virulence of his disorder for a long time setting at defiance all that medicine could do. This illness, also, broke him down sadly, and we recommended to him a second sojourn in the south of France—for which he set out the instant he could undertake the journey with safety. Much of his peculiar character was developed in this illness; that haughty, reckless spirit of defiance, that contemptuous disregard of the sacred consolations of religion,—that sullen indifference as to the event which might await him, which his previous character would have warranted me in predicting.

* * * *

About seven months from the period last mentioned, I received, one Sunday evening, a note, written in hurried characters; and a hasty glance at the seal, which bore Mr Effingstone’s crest, filled me with sudden vague apprehensions that some misfortune or other had befallen him. This was the note:—

“Dear Doctor,—For God’s sake come and see me immediately, for I have this day arrived in London from the continent, and am suffering the tortures of the damned, both in mind and body. Come—come—in God's name come instantly, or I shall go mad. Not a word of my return to any one till I have seen you. You will find me—in short, my man will accompany you. Yours in agony, St J. H. Effingstone. Sunday evening, November, 18—."

Tongue cannot utter the dismay with which this note filled me. His unexpected return from abroad,—the obscure and distant part of the town (St George's in the East) where he had established himself,—the dreadful terms in which his note was couched, revived, amidst a variety of vague conjectures, certain fearful apprehensions for him which I had begun to entertain before he quitted England. I ordered out my chariot instantly; his groom mounted the box to guide the coachman, and we drove down rapidly. A sudden recollection of the contents of several of the letters he had sent me latterly from the continent, at my request, served to corroborate my worst fears. I had given him over for lost—by the time my chariot drew up opposite the house where he had so strangely taken up his abode. The street and neighbourhood, though not clearly discernible through the fogs of a November evening, contrasted strangely with the aristocratical regions to which my patient had been accustomed. Erow was narrow, and the houses were small, yet clean and creditable-looking. On entering No. —, the landlady, a person of quiet respectable appearance, told me that Mr Hardy,—for such, it seems, was the name he chose to go by in these parts—had just retired to rest, as he felt fatigued and poorly, and she was just going to make him some gruel. She spoke in a tone of flurried excitement, and with an air of doubt, which were easily attributable to her astonishment at a man of Mr Effingstone's appearance and attendance, with such superior travelling equipments, dropping into such a house and neighbourhood as hers. I repaired to his bedchamber immediately. It was a small comfortably furnished room; the fire was lit, and two candles were burning on the drawers. On the bed, the plain chintz curtains of which were only half drawn, lay — St John Henry Effingstone. I must pause a moment to describe his appearance, as it struck me at first looking at him. It may be thought rather far-fetched, perhaps, but I could not help comparing him, in my own mind, to a gem set in the midst of faded tarnished embroidery: the coarse texture of the bed-furniture—the ordinary style of the room—its constrained dimensions, contrasted strikingly with the indications of elegance and fashion afforded by the scattered clothes, toilet, and travelling paraphernalia, &c.—the person and manners of its present occupant, who lay on a bed all tossed and tumbled, with only a few minutes' restlessness. A dazzling diamond ring sparkled on the little finger of his left hand, and was the only ornament he ever wore. There was something, also, in the snowiness, simplicity, and fineness of his linen, which alone might have evidenced the superior consideration of its wearer, even were that not sufficiently visible in the noble, commanding outline of the features, faded though they were, and shrinking beneath the inroads of illness and dissipation. His forehead was white and ample; his eye had lost none of its fire, though it gleaned with restless energy; in a word, there was that ease and loftiness in his bearing, that indescribable manière d'être, which are inseparable from high birth and breeding. So much for the appearance of things on my entrance.

"How are you, Mr Effingstone—how are you, my dear sir?" said I, sitting down by the bedside.

"Doctor—the pains of hell have got hold upon me. I am undone," he replied gloomily, in a broken voice, and extended to me a hand cold as marble.

"Is it as you suspected in your last letter to me from Rouen, Mr Effingstone?" I enquired, after a pause. He shook his head, and covered his face with both hands, but made me no answer. Thinking he was in tears, I said in a soothing tone, "Come, come, my dear sir, don't be carried away; don't"—

"Faugh! Do you take me for a puling child, or a woman, doctor: Don't suspect me again of such contemptible pusillanimity, low as I am fallen," he replied with startling sternness, removing his hands from his face.

"I hope, after all, that matters are not so desperate as your fears would persuade you," said I, feeling his pulse.

"Doctor, don't delude me; all is over, I know it is. A horrible death is before me; but I shall meet it like a man. I have made my bed, and must lie upon it."

"Come, come, Mr Effingstone, don't be so gloomy, so hopeless; the exhausted powers of nature may yet be revived," said I, after having asked him many questions.

"Doctor —, I'll soon end that strain of yours. 'Tis silly—pardon me—but it is. Reach me one of these candles, please." I did so. "Now, I'll shew you how to translate a passage of Persius.

*‘Tentemus fauces. — tenero latet ulcus in ore
Pulcrum quod haud deceat plebei radere beta.’*

"Eh, you recollect it? Well, look! —What say you to this; isn't it frightful?" he asked, bitterly raising the candle, that I might look into his mouth. It was, alas, as he said! In fact, his whole constitution had been long tainted, and exhibited symptoms of soon breaking up altogether! I feared, from the period of my attendance on him during the illness which drove him last to the continent, that it was beyond human power to dislodge the harpy that had fixed its cruel fangs deeply, inextricably in his vitals. Could it be wondered at, even by himself? Neglect, in the first instance, added to a persevering course of profligacy, had doomed him long, long before, to premature and horrible decay! And though it can scarcely be credited, it is nevertheless the fact; even on the continent, in the character of a shattered invalid, the infatuated man resumed those dissolute courses which in England had already hurried him almost to death's door!

"My good God, Mr Effingstone!" I enquired, almost paralyzed with amazement at hearing him describe recent scenes in which he had mingled, which would have made even satyrs skulk ashamed into the woods of old, "how could you have been so insane, so stark staring mad?"

"By instinct, doctor, by instinct! The nature of the beast!" he replied, through his closed teeth, and with an unconscious clenching of his hands. Many enquiries into his past and present symptoms forewarned me that his case would probably be marked by more appalling features than any that had ever come under my care; and that there was not a ray of hope that he would survive the long, lingering, and maddening agonies, which were "measured out to him from the poisoned chalice" which he had "commended to his own lips." At the time I am speaking of, I mean when I paid him the visit above described, his situation was not far from that of Job, described in chap. xx. v. 7, 8. * * *

He shed no tears, and repeatedly strove, but in vain, to repress sighs with which his breast heaved, nearly to bursting, while I pointed out—in obedience to his determination to know the worst—some portions of the dreary prospect before him.

"Horrible! hideous!" he exclaimed, in a low broken tone, his flesh creeping from head to foot. "How shall I endure it!—Oh, Epictetus, how?" He relapsed into silence, with his eyes fixed on the ceiling, and his hands joined over his breast, and pointing upwards, in a posture which I considered supplicatory. I rejoiced to see it, and ventured to say, after much hesitation, that I was delighted to see him at last looking to the right quarter for support and consolation.

"Bah!" he exclaimed impetuously, removing his hands, and eyeing me with sternness, almost approaching fury, "why will you persist in pestering your patients with twaddle of that sort?—candem semper canens cantilenam, ad nauseam usque—as though you carried a psalter in your pocket? When I want to listen to any thing of that kind, why, I'll pay a parson! Haven't I a tide enough of horror to bear up against already, without your bringing a sea of superstition upon me? No more of it—no more—'tis foul." I felt roused myself, at last, to something like correspondent emotions; for there was an insolence of assumption in his tone which I could not brook.

"Mr Effingstone," said I, calmly, "this silly swagger will not do.

"Tis unworthy of you—unscholarly—ungentlemanly—you force me to say so. I beg I may hear no more of it, or you and I must part. I have never been accustomed to such treatment, and I cannot now learn how to endure it from you.—From what quarter can you expect support or fortitude," said I, in a milder tone, seeing him startled and surprised at the former part, "except the despised consolations of religion?"

"Doctor—you are too superior to petty feelings not to overlook a little occasional petulance in such a wretched fellow as I am! You ask me whither I look for support? I reply, to the energies of my own mind—the tried disciplined energies of my own mind, doctor—a mind that never knew what fear was—that no disastrous combinations of misfortune could ever yet shake from its fortitude! What but this is it, that enables me to shut my ears to the whisperings of some pitying friend, who, knowing what hideous tortures await me, has stepped out of hell to come and advise me to suicide—Eh?" he enquired, his eye glaring on me with a very unusual expression. "However, as religion, that is, your Christian religion, is a subject on which you and I can never agree—an old bone of contention between us—why, the less said about it the better. It's useless to irritate a man whose mind is made up. D—n it! I shall never be a believer—may I die first!" he concluded, with angry vehemence.

The remainder of the interview I spent in endeavouring to persuade him to relinquish his present unsuitable lodgings, and return to the sphere of his friends and relations—but in vain. He was fixedly determined to continue in that obscure hole, he said, till there was about a week or so between him and death, and then he would return, "and die in the bosom of his family, as the phrase was." Alas, however, I knew but too well, that in the event of his adhering to that resolution, he was fated to expire in the bed where he then lay; for I foresaw but too truly that the termination of his illness would be attended with circumstances rendering removal utterly impossible. He made me pledge my word that I would not, without his express request or sanction, deprive any member of his family, or any of his friends, that he had returned to England. It was in vain that I expostulated, that I represented the responsibility imposed upon me; and reminded him, that, in the event of any thing serious and sudden befalling him, the censure of all his relatives would be levelled at me. He was immovable. "Doctor, you know well I dare not see them, as well on my own account as theirs," said he, bitterly. He begged me to prescribe him a powerful anodyne draught; for that he could get no rest at nights; that an intense cracking pain was gnawing all his bones from morning to evening, and from evening to morning; and what with this and other dreadful concomitants, he "was," he said, "suffering the tortures of the damned, and perhaps worse." I complied with his request, and ordered him also many other medicines and applications, and promised to see him soon in the morning. I was accordingly with him about twelve the next day. He was sitting up, and in his dressing-gown, before the fire, in great pain, and suffering under the deepest dejection. He complained heavily of the intense and unremitting agony he had endured all night long, and thought that from some cause or other, the laudanum draught I ordered, had tended to make him only more acutely sensible of the pain. "It is a peculiar and horrible sensation; and I cannot give you an adequate idea of it," he said: "it is as though the marrow in my bones were transformed into something animated—into blind-worms, writhing, biting, and stinging incessantly"—and he shuddered, as did I also, at the revolting comparison. He put me upon a minute exposition of the rational of his disorder: and if ever I was at a loss for adequate expressions or illustrations, he supplied them with a readiness, an exquisite appositeness, which, added to his astonishing acuteness in comprehending the most strictly technical details, filled me with admiration for his great powers of mind, and poignant regret at their miserable desecration.

"Well, I don't think you can give me any efficient relief, doctor," said he, "and I am therefore bent on trying a scheme of my own."

"And what, pray, may that be?" I enquired curiously.

"I'll tell you my preparations. I've ordered—by ———!—nearly a hundredweight of the strongest tobacco that's to be bought, and thousands of pipes; and with these I intend to smoke myself into stupidity, or rather insensibility, if possible, till I can't undertake to say whether I live or not; and my good fellow, George, is to be reading me Don Quixote, the while." Oh, with what a sorrowful air of forced gaiety was all this uttered!

One sudden burst of bitterness I well recollect. I was saying, while putting on my gloves to go, that I hoped to see him in better spirits the next time I called.

"Better spirits? Ha! ha! How the ——— can I be in better spirits—an exile from society—and absolutely rotting away here—in such a contemptible hovel as this—among a set of base-born brutal savages?—laugh! laugh! It does need something here—here," pressing his hand to his forehead, "to bear it—aye, it does!" I thought his tones were tremulous, and that for the first time I had ever known them so—and I could not help thinking the tears came into his eyes; for he started suddenly from me, and affected to be gazing at some passing objects in the street. I saw he was beginning to sink under a consciousness of the bitter degradation into which he had sunk—the wretched prospect of his "sun's going down in darkness!" I saw that the strength of mind to which he clung so pertinaciously for support, was fast disappearing, like snow beneath the sunbeam. * * *

[Then follow the details of his disease, which are so shocking as to be unfit for any but professional eyes. They represent all the energies of his nature as shaken, beyond the possibility of restoration—his constitution thoroughly polluted—wholly undetermined. That the remedies resorted to had been almost more dreadful than the disease—and yet exhibited in vain! In the next twenty pages of the Diary, the shades of horror are represented as gradually closing and darkening around this wretched victim of debauchery; and the narrative is carried forward through three months. A few extracts only, from this portion, are fitting for the reader.]

Friday, January 5.—Mr Effingstone continues in the same deplorable state described in my former entry. It is absolutely revolting to enter his room, the effluvia are so sickening—so overpowering. I am compelled to use a vinaigrette incessantly, as well as eau de Cologne, and other scents, in profusion. I found him engaged, as usual, deep in Petronius Arbitr! He still makes the same wretched show of reliance on the strength and firmness of his mental powers; but his worn and haggard features—the burning brilliance of his often half-frenzied eyes—the broken, hollow tones of his voice—his sudden starts of apprehension—belie every word he utters. He describes his bodily sufferings as frightful. Indeed Mrs ——— has often told me, that his groans both disturb and alarm the neighbours, even as far as over the way! The very watchman has several times been so much startled in passing, at hearing his groans, that he has knocked at the door to enquire about them. Neither Sir ——— nor I can think of any thing that seems likely to assuage his agonies. Even laudanum has failed us altogether, though it has been given in unprecedented quantities. I think I can say with truth and sincerity, that scarce the wealth of the Indies should tempt me to undertake the management of another such case. I am losing my appetite—loathe animal food—am haunted day and night by the piteous spectacle which I have to encounter daily in Mr Effingstone. Oh, that Heaven would terminate his tortures—surely he has suffered enough! I am sure he would hail the prospect of death with ecstasy!

Wednesday, 10.—Poor, infatuated, obstinate Effingstone will not yet allow me to communicate with any of his family or friends, though he knows they are almost distracted at not hearing from him, fancying him yet abroad. Colonel ——— asked me the other day, earnestly, when I last heard from Mr Effingstone! I wonder my conscious looks did not betray me. I almost wish they had. Good God! in what a painful predicament I am placed! What am I to do? Shall I tell them all about him, and disregard consequences? Oh—no—no;—how can that be, when my word and honour are solemnly pledged to the contrary?

Saturday, 20.—Poor Effingstone has experienced a signal instance of the ingratitude and heartlessness of mere men of the world. He sent his man, some time ago, with a confidential note to Captain —, formerly one of his most intimate acquaintances, stating briefly the shocking circumstances in which he is placed, and ~~begging~~ ^{urging} him to call and see him. The captain sent back a viva voce (!) message, that he ~~should~~ ^{ought} feel happy in calling on Mr Effingstone in a few days' time, and would then, but that he was busy making up a match at billiards, and balancing his betting-book, &c. &c. &c. This day the fellow rode up to the door, and—left a card for Mr Effingstone, without asking to see him! Heartless, contemptible thing! I drove up about a quarter of an hour after this gentleman had left. Poor Effingstone could not repress tears while informing me of the above. "Would you believe it, doctor," said he, "that Captain — was one of my most intimate companions—that he has won many hundred pounds of my money—and that I have stood his second in a duel?"—"Oh, yes—I could believe it all, and much more!"—"My poor man, George," he resumed, "is worth a million of such puppies! Don't you think the good, faithful fellow looks ill? He is at my bedside twenty times a-night! Do try and do something for him! I've left him a trifling annuity out of the wreck of my fortune, poor fellow!" and the rebellious tears again glistened in his eyes. His tortures are unmitigated.

Friday, 26.—Surely, surely I have never seen, and seldom heard or read, of such sufferings as the wretched Effingstone's. He strives to endure them with the fortitude and patience of a martyr—or rather is struggling to exhibit a spirit of sullen, stoical submission to his fate, such as is inculcated in Arrian's Discourses of Epictetus, which he reads almost all day. His anguish is so excruciating and uninterrupted, that I am astonished how he retains the use of his reason. All power of locomotion has disappeared long ago. The only parts of his body he can move now are his fingers, toes, and head—which latter he sometimes shakes about, in a sudden ecstasy of pain, with such frightful violence as would, one should think, almost suffice to sever it from his shoulders! The flesh of the lower extremities—the flesh——* * * Horrible! All sensation has ceased in them for a fortnight! He describes the agonies about his stomach and bowels to be as though wolves were ravenously gnawing and mauling all within.

Oh, my God! if "men about town," in London, or elsewhere, could but see the hideous spectacle Mr Effingstone presents, surely it would palsy them in the pursuit of ruin, and scare them into the paths of virtue!

Mrs —, his landlady, is so ill with attendance on him—almost poisoned by the foul air in his chamber—that she is gone to the house of a relative for a few weeks, in a distant part of the town, having first engaged one of the poor neighbours to supply her place as Mr Effingstone's nurse. The people opposite, and on each side of the house, are complaining again, loudly, of the strange nocturnal noises heard in Mr Effingstone's room. They are his groanings! * * *

Tuesday, 31.—Again I have visited that scene of loathsomeness and horror, Mr Effingstone's chamber. The nurse and George told me he had been raving deliriously all night long. I found him incredibly altered in countenance, so much so, that I should hardly have recognised his features. He was mumbling, with his eyes closed, when I entered the room.

"Doctor!" he exclaimed, in a tone of doubt and fear, such as I had never known from him before, "you have not heard me abuse the Bible lately, have you?"

"Not very lately, Mr Effingstone," I replied, pointedly.

"Good," said he, with his usual decision and energy of manner. "There are awful things in that book—aren't there, doctor?"

"Many very awful things there are indeed."

"I thought so—I thought so. Pray"
 — his manner grew suddenly perturbed, and he paused for a moment, as if to recollect himself—
 "Pray—pray"—again he paused,
 but could not succeed in disguising his trepidation—"do you happen to recollect whether there are such words in the Bible as—as—'MANY STRIPES?'"

"Yes, there are; and they form part of a very fearful passage," said I, quoting the verse as nearly as I could. He listened silently. His features swelled with suppressed emotion. There was horror in his eye.

"Doctor, what a—a—remark—able —nay, hideous dream I had last night! I thought a fiend came and took me to a gloomy belfry, or some other such place, and muttered
 'many stripes—many stripes,' in my ear; and the huge bell almost tolled me into madness, for all the damned danced around me to the sound of it! ha, ha!" He added, with a faint laugh, after a pause, "There's something cu—cur—cursedly odd in the coincidence, isn't there? How it would have frightened some wiseacres!" he continued, a forced smile flitting over his haggard features, as if in mockery. "But it is easily to be accounted for—the intimate connection—sympathy—between mind and matter, reciprocally affecting each other—affecting each — ha, ha, ha!—Doctor, it's no use keeping up this damned farce any longer, human nature won't bear it! D—n!
 I'm going down to HELL! I am!" said he, almost yelling out the words. I had never before witnessed such a fearful manifestation of his feelings.
 I almost started from the chair on which I was sitting.

"Why"—he continued, in nearly the same tone and manner, as if he had lost all self-control, "what is it that has maddened me all my life, and left me sober only at this ghastly hour—too late?" My agitation would not permit me to do more than whisper a few unconnected words of encouragement, almost inaudible to myself. In about ten minutes' time, neither of us having broken the silence of the interval, he said, in a calmer tone, "Doctor, be good enough to wipe my forehead—will you?" I did so. "You know better, doctor, of course, than to attach any importance to the nonsensical rantings extorted by deathbed agonies, eh? Don't dying people, at least those who die in great pain, almost always express themselves so? How apt superstition is to rear its dismal flag over the prostrate energies of one's soul, when the body is racked by tortures like mine! Oh, oh, oh, that maddening sensation about the centre of my stomach! Doctor, go home, and forget all the stuff you've heard me utter to-day—'Richard's himself again!'"

Thursday, 2d February.—On arriving this morning at — row, I was shewn into the back parlour, where sat the nurse, very sick and faint. She begged me to procure a substitute, for that she was nearly killed herself, and nothing should tempt her to continue in her present situation. Poor thing! I did not wonder at it! I told her I would send a nurse from one of the hospitals that evening; and then enquired what sort of a night Mr Effingstone had passed.
 "Terrible," she said; "groaning, shaking, and roaring all night long,
 'many stripes,' 'many stripes,' 'oh
 God of mercy!' and enquiring perpetually for you." I repaired to the fatal chamber immediately, though latterly my spirits began to fail me whenever I approached the door. I was going to take my usual seat in the arm-chair by the bedside.

"Don't sit there—don't sit there," groaned, rather gasped Mr Effingstone, "for a hideous being sate in that chair all night long," every muscle in his face crept and shrunk with horror, "muttering, 'many stripes!' Doctor, order that blighted chair to be taken away, broken up, and burnt, every splinter of it!
 Let no human being ever sit in it again! And give instructions to the people about me never to desert me for a moment—or—carry me off!—they will! * * * My frenzied fancy conjures up the ghastliest objects that can scare man into madness!" He paused:

"Great God, doctor! suppose, after all, what the Bible says should prove true!" he literally gnashed his teeth, and looked a truer image of despair than I have ever seen represented in pictures, on the stage, or in real life. "Why, Mr Effingstone, if it should, it need not be to your sorrow, unless you choose to make it so," said I, in a soothing tone.

"Needn't it, needn't it?" with an abstracted air—"Needn't it? Oh, good!—hope—There, there it sate, all night long, there! I've no recollection of any distinct personality, and yet I thought it sometimes looked like—of course," he added, after a pause, and a sigh of exhaustion—"of course these phantoms, or similar ones, must often have been described to you by dying people—eh?"

Friday, 3d.—* * * He was in a strangely altered mood to-day; for though his condition might be aptly described by the words "dead alive" his calm demeanour, his tranquillized features, and the mild expression of his eye, assured me he believed what he said, when he told me that his disorder had "taken a turn,"—that the "crisis was past;" and he should recover! Alas, was it ever known that dead mortified flesh ever resumed its life and functions! To have saved himself from the spring of a hungry tiger, he could not have moved a foot or a finger, and that for the last week! Poor, poor Mr Effingstone began to thank me for my attentions to him during his illness; said, he "owed his life to my consummate skill;" he would "trumpet my fame to the Andes, if I succeeded in bringing him through."

"It has been a very horrible affair, doctor—hasn't it?" said he.

"Very, very, Mr Effingstone; and it is my duty to tell you, there is yet much horror before you!"

"Ah! well, well! I see you don't want me to be too sanguine—too impatient—it's kindly meant—very! Doctor, when I leave here, I leave it an altered man! Come, does not that gratify you, eh?"

I could not help a sigh. He would be an altered man, and that very shortly! He mistook the feelings which prompted the sigh. "Mind—not that I'm going to commence saint—far from it; but—but—I don't despair of being a Christian. I don't, upon my honour. The New Testament is a sublime—a—I believe—a true revelation of the Almighty. My heart is quite humbled; yet—mark me—I don't mean exactly to say I'm a believer—not by any means; but I can't help thinking that my enquiries might tend to make me so." I hinted that all these were indications of bettered feelings. I could say no more.

"I'm bent on leading a different life to what I have led before, at all events! Let me see—I'll tell you what I've been chalking out during the night—I shall go to Lord —'s villa in —, whither I've often been invited, and shall read Lardner, and Paley, and get them up thoroughly—I will, by —!"

"Mr Effingstone, pardon me!"

"Ah—I understand—'twas a mere slip of the tongue—what's bred in the bone, you know!"

"I was not alluding to the oath, Mr Effingstone; but—but it is my duty to warn you!"

"Ah—that I'm not going the right way to work—eh? Well, at all events, I'll consult a clergyman. The Bishop of — is a distant connexion of our family, you know,—I'll ask his advice! * * * Oh, doctor, look at that rich—that blessed light of the sun! Oh, draw aside the window-curtain, let me feel it on me! What an image of the beneficence of the Deity! A smile flung from his face over the universe!" I drew aside the curtain. It was a cold clear frosty day, and the sun shone into the room with cheerful lustre. Oh, how awfully distinct were the ravages which his wasted features had sustained! His soul seemed to expand beneath the genial influence of the sunbeams; and he again expressed his confident expectations of recovery.

"Mr Effingstone, do not persist in cherishing false hopes! Once for all," said I, with all the deliberate solemnity I could throw into my manner, "I assure you, in the presence of God, that, unless a miracle takes place, it is utterly impossible for you to recover, or even to last a week longer!" I thought it had killed him. His features whitened visibly as I concluded—his eye seemed to sink, and the eyelids fell. His lips presently moved, but uttered no sound. I thought he had received his death-stroke, and was immeasurably shocked at its having been from my hands, even though in the strict performance of my duty. Half an hour's time, however, saw him restored to nearly the same state in which he had been previously. I begged him to allow me to send a clergyman to him, as the best means of soothing and quieting his mind; but he shook his head despondingly. I pressed my point, and he said deliberately, "No." He muttered some such words, as "The Deity has determined on my destruction, and is permitting his devils to mock me with hopes of this sort—Let me go, then, to my own place!" In this awful state of mind I was compelled to leave him. I sent a clergyman to him in my chaise—the same whom I had called to visit Mr — (alluding to the "Scholar's Death-Bed;") but he refused to see him, saying, that if he presumed to force himself into the room, he would spit in his face, though he could not rise to kick him out! The temper of his mind had changed into something perfectly diabolical, since my interview with him.

Saturday, 14th.—Really my own health is suffering—my spirits are sinking through daily horrors I have to encounter at Mr Ellingstone's apartment. This morning, I sat by his bedside full half an hour, listening to him uttering nothing but groans that shook my very soul within me. He did not know me when I spoke to him, and took no notice of me whatever. At length his groans were mingled with such expressions as these, indicating that his disturbed fancy had wandered to former scenes.

"Oh!—oh!—Pitch it into him, Bob! Ten to two on Cribb!—Horrible!—These dice are loaded, Wilmington, by —, I know they are!—Seven's the main!—Ha!—done, by —! * * Hector, yes—[he was alluding to a favourite race-horse]—won't 'bate a pound of his price!—Your Grace shall have him for six hundred—Fore-legs, only look at them!—There, there, go it! away! away! neck and neck—In, in, by —! * * Hannah! what the —'s become of her—drowned? No, no, no,—What a fiend incarnate that Bet — is! * * Oh! horror, horror! Rottenness! Oh, that some one would knock me on the head, and end me! * * Fire, fire! Stripes, many stripes—Stuff! You didn't fire fair. By —, you fired before your time—[alluding, I suppose, to a duel in which he had been concerned]—d— your cowardice!"

Such was the substance of what he uttered—it was in vain that I tried to arrest the torrent of vile recollections. * * *

"Doctor, doctor, I shall die of fright!" he exclaimed an hour afterwards—"What d'ye think happened to me last night? I was lying here, with the fire burnt very low, and the candles out. George was asleep, poor fellow, and the woman gone out to get an hour's rest also. I was looking about, and suddenly saw the dim outline of a table, set, as it were, in the middle of the room. There were four chairs, faintly visible, and three ghostly figures came through that door and sat in them, one by one, leaving one vacant. They began a sort of horrid whispering, more like gasping—they were devils, and talked about—my damnation! The fourth chair was for me, they said, and all three turned and looked me in the face. Oh! hideous—shapeless—damned!" He uttered a shuddering groan. * *

[Here follows an account of his interview with two brothers—the only members of the family—whom he had at last permitted to be informed of his frightful condition—who would come and see him.] * * * He did little else than rave and howl, in a blasphemous manner, all the while they were present. He seemed hardly to be aware of their being his brothers, and to forget the place where he was. He cursed me—then Sir —, his man George, and charged us with compassing his death, concealing his case from his family, and execrated us for not allowing him to be removed to the west end of the town. In vain we assured him that his removal was utterly impossible—the time was past; I had offered it once. He gnashed his teeth, and spit at us all! "What! die—die—Die in this damned hole?—I won't die here—I will go to — street. Take me off!—Devils, then, do you come and carry me there!—Come—out, out upon you! —* * —You have killed me, all of you!—You're twisting me!—You've put a hill of iron on me—I'm dead!—all my body is dead—[ * ]—George, you wretch! why are you ladling fire upon me?—Where do you get it?—Out—out—out!—I'm flooded with fire!—Scorched—Scorched!— * Now—now for a dance of devils—Ha—I see! I see!—There's —, and —, and —, among them!—What! all three of you dead—and damned before me?—W——! Where is your d—d loaded dice?—Filled with fire, eh?—* —So, you were the three devils I saw sitting at the table, eh?—Well, I shall be last—but, d—e, I'll be the chief of you!—I'll be king in hell!— *—What—what's that filthy owl sitting at the bottom of the bed for, eh?—Kick it off—strike it!—Away—out on thee, thou imp of hell!—I shall make thee sing presently!—Let in the snakes—let them in—I love them! I hear them writhing up stairs!" He began to shake his head violently from side to side, his eyes glaring like coals of fire, and his teeth gnashing. I never could have imagined any thing half so frightful. What with the highly excited state of my feelings, and the horrible scents of death which were diffused about the room, and to which not the strongest salts of ammonia, used incessantly, could render me insensible, I was obliged to leave abruptly. I knew the last act of the black tragedy was closing that night! I left word with the nurse, that so soon as Mr Effingstone should be released from his misery, she should get into a hackney-coach, and come to my house.

* * * * *

I lay tossing in bed all night long—my mind suffused with the horrors of the scene of which I have endeavoured to give some faint idea above. Were I to record half what I recollect of his hideous ravings, it would scare myself to read it!—I will not! Let them and their memory perish!—I fancied myself lying side by side with the loathsome thing bearing the name of Effingstone—that I could not move away from him—that his head, shaking from side to side as I have mentioned above, was battering my cheeks and forehead; in short, I was almost beside myself!—I was in the act of uttering a fervent prayer to the Deity, that even in the eleventh hour—the eleventh hour—when a violent ringing of the night-bell made me spring out of bed. It was as I suspected. The nurse had come—and, already, all was over. My heart seemed to grow suddenly cold and motionless. I dressed myself, and went down into the drawing-room.

On the sofa lay the woman: She had fainted. On recovering her senses, I asked her if all was over;—she nodded with an affrighted expression!—A little wine and water restored her self-possession. "When did it occur?" I asked. "Exactly as the clock struck three," she replied. "George, and I, and Mr——, the apothecary, whom we had sent for out of the next street, were sitting and standing round the bed. Mr Hardy lay tossing his head about for nearly an hour, saying all manner of horrible things. A few minutes before three he gave a loud howl, and shouted, 'Here, you wretches—why do you put the candles out—here—here—I'm dying!'"

"God's peace be with you, sir!—The Lord have mercy on you!"—we groaned, like people distracted.

"Ha—ha—ha!—D—n you!—D—n you all!—Dying?—D—n me! I won't die!—I won't die!—No—no!—D—n me—I won't—won't—won't—!" and made a noise as if he was choked. We looked—yes, he was gone!"—He was interred in an obscure dissenting burying-ground in the immediate neighbourhood, under the name of Hardy, for his family refused to recognise him.

So lived and died a "man about town"—and so, alas, will yet live and die many another MAN ABOUT TOWN!

DEATH AT THE TOILET.

"'Tis no use talking to me, mother, I will go to Mrs P——'s party to-night, if I die for it—that's flat! You know as well as I do, that Lieutenant N—— is to be there, and he's going to leave town to-morrow—so up I go to dress."

"Charlotte, why will you be so obstinate? You know how poorly you have been all the week, and Dr—— says late hours are the worst things in the world for you."

"Pshaw, mother! nonsense, nonsense."

"Be persuaded for once, now, I beg! Oh dear, dear, what a night it is too—it pours with rain, and blows a perfect hurricane! You'll be wet and catch cold, rely on it. Come now, won't you stop and keep me company to-night? That's a good girl!"

"Some other night will do as well for that, you know; for now I'll go to Mrs P——'s, if it rains cats and dogs. So up—up—up I go!" singing jauntily

"Oh she shall dance all dress'd in white, So ladylike."

Such were, very nearly, the words, and such the manner in which Miss J—— expressed her determination to act in defiance of her mother's wishes and entreaties. She was the only child of her widowed mother, and had, but a few weeks before, completed her twenty-sixth year, with yet no other prospect before her than bleak single-blessedness. A weaker, more frivolous and conceited creature never breathed—the torment of her amiable parent, the nuisance of her acquaintance. Though her mother's circumstances were very straitened, sufficing barely to enable them to maintain a footing in what is called the middling genteel class of society, this young woman contrived by some means or other to gratify her penchant for dress, and gadded about here, there, and everywhere, the most showily dressed person in the neighbourhood. Though far from being even pretty-faced, or having any pretensions to a good figure, for she both stooped and was skinny, she yet believed herself handsome; and by a vulgar, flippant forwardness of demeanour, especially when in mixed company, extorted such attentions as persuaded her that others thought so.

For one or two years she had been an occasional patient of mine. The settled pallor, the tallowiness of her complexion, conjointly with other symptoms, evidenced the existence of a liver complaint; and the last visits I had paid her were in consequence of frequent sensations of oppression and pain in the chest, which clearly indicated some organic disease of her heart. I saw enough to warrant me in warning her mother of the possibility of her daughter's sudden death from this cause, and the imminent peril to which she exposed herself by dancing, late hours, &c.; but Mrs ——'s remonstrances, gentle and affectionate as they always were, were thrown away upon her headstrong daughter.

It was striking eight by the church clock, when Miss J——, humming the words of the song above mentioned, lit her chamber-candle by her mother's, and withdrew to her room to dress, soundly rating the servant-girl by the way, for not having starched some article or other which she intended to have worn that evening. As her toilet was usually a long and laborious business, it did not occasion much surprise to her mother, who was sitting by the fire in their little parlour, reading some book of devotion, that the church chimes announced the first quarter past nine o'clock, without her daughter's making her appearance. The noise she had made over-head in walking to and fro to her drawers, dressing-table, &c. had ceased about half an hour ago, and her mother supposed she was then engaged at her glass, adjusting her hair, and preparing her complexion.

"Well, I wonder what can make Charlotte so very careful about her dress to-night!" exclaimed Mrs J——, removing her eyes from the book, and gazing thoughtfully at the fire; "Oh! it must be because young Lieutenant N—— is to be there. Well, I was young myself once, and it's very excusable in Charlotte—heigho!" She heard the wind howling so dismally without, that she drew together the coals of her brisk fire, and was laying down the poker when the clock of —— church struck the second quarter after nine.

"Why, what in the world can Charlotte be doing all this while?" she again enquired. She listened—"I have not heard her moving for the last three quarters of an hour! I'll call the maid and ask." She rung the bell, and the servant appeared.

"Betty, Miss J—— is not gone yet, is she?"

"La, no, ma'am," replied the girl, "I took up the curling irons only about a quarter of an hour ago, as she had put one of her curls out; and she said she should soon be ready. She's burst her new muslin dress behind, and that has put her into a way, ma'am."

"Gout to her room, then, Betty, and see if she wants any thing; and tell her it's half past nine o'clock," said Mrs J——. The servant accordingly went up stairs, and knocked at the bedroom door, once, twice, thrice, but received no answer. There was a dead silence, except when the wind shook the window. Could Miss J—— have fallen asleep? Oh, impossible! She knocked again, but unsuccessfully as before. She became a little flustered; and after a moment's pause, opened the door and entered. There was Miss J—— sitting at the glass. "Why, la, ma'am!" commenced Betty in a petulant tone, walking up to her, "here have I been knocking for these five minutes, and"— Betty staggered horror-struck to the bed, and uttering a loud shriek, alarmed Mrs J——, who instantly tottered up stairs, almost palsied with fright.—Miss J—— was dead!

I was there within a few minutes, for my house was not more than two streets distant. It was a stormy night in March: and the desolate aspect of things without—deserted streets—the dreary howling of the wind, and the incessant pattering of the rain—contributed to cast a gloom over my mind, when connected with the intelligence of the awful event that had summoned me out, which was deepened into horror by the spectacle I was doomed to witness. On reaching the house, I found Mrs J—— in violent hysterics, surrounded by several of her neighbours who had been called in to her assistance. I repaired instantly to the scene of death, and beheld what I shall never forget. The room was occupied by a white-curtained bed. There was but one window, and before it was a table, on which stood a looking-glass, hung with a little white drapery; and various paraphernalia of the toilet lay scattered about—pins, broaches, curling-papers, ribands, gloves, &c. An arm-chair was drawn to this table, and in it sat Miss J——, stone-dead. Her head rested upon her right hand, her elbow supported by the table; while her left hung down by her side, grasping a pair of curling-irons. Each of her wrists was encircled by a showy gilt bracelet. She was dressed in a white muslin frock, with a little bordering of blonde. Her face was turned towards the glass, which, by the light of the expiring candle, reflected with frightful fidelity the clammy fixed features, daubed over with rouge and carmine—the fallen lower jaw—and the eyes directed full into the glass, with a cold dull stare, that was appalling. On examining the countenance more narrowly, I thought I detected the traces of a smirk of conceit and self-complacency, which not even the palsying touch of Death could wholly obliterate. The hair of the corpse, all smooth and glossy, was curled with elaborate precision; and the skinny sallow neck was encircled with a string of glistening pearls. The ghastly visage of death thus leering through the tinselry of fashion—the "vain show" of artificial joy—was a horrible mockery of the fooleries of life!

Indeed it was a most humiliating and shocking spectacle. Poor creature! struck dead in the very act of sacrificing at the shrine of female vanity! She must have been dead for some time, perhaps for twenty minutes, or half an hour, when I arrived, for nearly all the animal heat had deserted the body, which was rapidly stiffening. I attempted, but in vain, to draw a little blood from the arm. Two or three women present proceeded to remove the corpse to the bed, for the purpose of laying it out. What strange passiveness! No resistance offered to them while straightening the bent right arm, and binding the jaws together with a faded white riband, which Miss J—— had destined for her waist that evening.

On examination of the body, we found that death had been occasioned by disease of the heart. Her life might have been protracted, possibly for years, had she but taken my advice, and that of her mother. I have seen many hundreds of corpses, as well in the calm composure of natural death, as mangled and distorted by violence; but never have I seen so startling a satire upon human vanity, so repulsive, unsightly, and loathsome a spectacle, as a corpse dressed for a ball!

AN AUTUMN WALK.

BY DELTA.

I.

SWEET is the smile of the vernal morn,
When upon zephyr's wing is borne
The breath of the opening flowers, and skies
Day after day to the gazer's sight
Expand a thousand fairy dyes,
More softly pure, more serenely bright;
When Ocean lulls his foamy roar,
To tell that the boreal storms are o'er;
While naked boughs put on their green;
And morning listens the early lark;
And the snowdrop, like a spirit, is seen
Peeping up from earth's caverns dark:—
Oh, then is the season of hope—the heart
Feels of the universe a part;
The blooming flowers—the budding trees—
The brightening sun—the tender sky—
The singing birds, and the humming bees—
Speak they not all to the ear or eye—
To say, after darkness, and cold, and rain,
Come loveliness, warmth, and life again!

II.

Nor glorious less is the summer noon,
When, from its azure zenith, June
Looks on the beautiful earth, to spread
A darkening shadow beneath the bowers,
And the boughs of the chestnut overhead
Are spangled over with gorgeous flowers;
When the trout leaps up from the tepid stream;
And the cattle, from the hot day-beam,
Take to the shelter of cooling groves,
Where, 'mid the pillar'd emerald gloom,
From tree to tree the cushat roves,
And unseen flowers the air perfume:—
Then to the loiterer of the fields
A source of enduring joy it yields,
'To pause amid the pastures green,
And hearken a thousand notes that fill
The air with music from throats unseen—
A long, loud song of praise, until
The bosom's cares are subdued to rest,
And a holy calm pervades the breast.

III.

How should the seasons the heart employ?
To Spring give hope, and to Summer joy;
But to Autumn belongs majestic thought—
The shadows of Time and Eternity,
Like visions before the eye are brought
From her yellow woods and her changing sky:
Thou, Autumn, now art around my way,
As lonely thus abroad I stray,
While the afternoon melts into eve—
Alas! how rapidly day is done!—
And clouds of a thousand colours weave
Their glories around the setting sun.

All nature seems bathed in a tender grief ;
 There is a red-brown tint on the leaf,
 That proclaims of desolation blank ;
 And the flowers that erewhile bloom'd so fair,
 Now, seeding, wither along the bank,
 Sered by the chill of the alter'd air :
 The aspect of all things seems to say—
 Man like the seasons shall pass away !

IV.

October, my moralist thou shalt be—
 Shake down thy fragile leaves from the tree ;
 Pour out thy tears from the sullen cloud ;
 And, while the gleaner forsakes the field,
 Let the winds of evening, piping loud,
 A chorus sad to the partridge yield.
 What saith the river that rushes down
 From its nursing mountains, foamy and brown ?
 It tells of tempest—of sleet and rain—
 Of summer past and of winter near,
 Of glories that shall not revive again,
 Until a new life re-illumine the year :—
 Of the shortening and the lengthening night ;
 Of departed sunshine ; and beauty's blight ;
 Omens of death and of pale decay—
 Types of destruction's impending gloom—
 Flitting o'er man on life's thorny way,
 And pointing alike to his goal—the tomb ;
 For, when finishes Age's childlike reign,
 No second boyhood comes round again !

V.

Thus to my soul—in my lonely walks
 Of contemplation—Autumn talks :
 The red-breast, as it hops along,
 Like a restless spirit, from bough to bough,
 Seems warning me, with its dirge-like song,
 Of the changes that wait upon all below !
 Speaks not the hollow-sounding sea
 Of what hath been—and no more shall be !
 Of days that are past—of friendships gone ;
 Of visions whose glory made boyhood bright !
 Of pleasures flown—for ever flown—
 Of hopes that shone, but to set in night !
 The fading flower and the falling leaf,
 Do they not emblem that life is brief ?
 'Tis not in beauty—they seem to say—
 From year to year to retain its glow ;
 'Tis not in strength to resist decay—
 All is doom'd to the dust below—
 The meek and the mighty—the free and the slave—
 The rich and the poor—the coward and brave,—
 The young and the old, meet they not in the grave ?

THE MYSTERIOUS BRIDE.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

A GREAT number of people now-a-days are beginning broadly to insinuate that there are no such things as ghosts, or spiritual beings visible to mortal sight. Even Sir Walter Scott is turned renegade, and, with his stories made up of half-and-half, like Nathaniel Gow's toddy, is trying to throw cold water on the most certain, though most impalpable, phenomena of human nature. The bodies are daft. Heaven mend their wits! Before they had ventured to assert such things, I wish they had been where I have often been; or, in particular, where the Laird of Birkendelly was on St Lawrence's Eve, in the year 1777, and sundry times subsequent to that.

Be it known, then, to every reader of this relation of facts that happened in my own remembrance, that the road from Birkendelly to the great muckle village of Balmawhapple, (commonly called the muckle town, in opposition to the little town that stood on the other side of the burn,)—that road, I say, lay between two thorn hedges, so well kept by the Laird's hedger, so close, and so high, that a rabbit could not have escaped from the highway into any of the adjoining fields. Along this road was the Laird riding on the Eve of St Lawrence, in a careless, indifferent manner, with his hat to one side, and his cane dancing a hornpipe on the curch of the saddle before him. He was, moreover, chanting a song to himself, and I have heard people tell what song it was too. There was once a certain, or rather uncertain, bard, ycleped Robert Burns, who made a number of good songs; but this that the Laird sung was an amorous song of great antiquity, which, like all the said bard's best songs, was sung one hundred and fifty years before he was born. It began thus:

"I am the Laird of Windy-wa's,
I cam nae here without a cause,
An' I hae gotten forty fa's

In coming o'er the knowe, joe!

The night it is baith wind and weet;
The morn it will be snaw and sleet;
My shoon are frozen to my feet;
"O, rise an' let me in, joe!"
Let me in this ae night," &c. &c.

This song was the Laird singing, while, at the same time, he was smudging and laughing at the catastrophe, when, ere ever aware, he beheld, a short way before him, an uncommonly elegant and beautiful girl walking in the same direction with him. "Aye," said the Laird to himself, "here is something very attractive indeed! Where the deuce can she have sprung from? She must have risen out of the earth, for I never saw her till this breath. Well, I declare I have not seen such a female figure—I wish I had such an assignation with her as the Laird of Windy-wa's had with his sweetheart."

As the Laird was half-thinking, half-speaking this to himself, the enchanting creature looked back at him with a motion of intelligence that she knew what he was half-saying, half-thinking, and then vanished over the summit of the rising ground before him, called the Birky Brow. "Aye, go your ways!" said the Laird; "I see by you, you'll not be very hard to overtake. You cannot get off the road, and I'll have a chat with you before you make the Deer's Den."

The Laird jogged on. He did not sing the "Laird of Windy-wa's" any more, for he felt a sort of stifling about his heart; but he often repeated to himself, "She's a very fine woman!—a very fine woman indeed—and to be walking here by herself! I cannot comprehend it."

When he reached the summit of the Birky Brow he did not see her, although he had a longer view of the road than before. He thought this very singular, and began to suspect that she wanted to escape him, although apparently rather lingering on him before. "I shall have another look at her, however," thought the Laird; and off he set at a flying trot. No. He came first to one turn, then another. There was nothing of the young lady to be seen. "Unless she take wings and fly away, I shall be up with her," quoth the Laird; and off he set at the full gallop.

In the middle of his career he met with Mr M'Murdie of Aulton, who hailed him with, "Hilloa! Birkendelly! where the deuce are you flying at that rate?"

"I was riding after a woman," said the Laird, with great simplicity, reining in his steed.

"Then I am sure no woman on earth can long escape you, unless she be in an air balloon."

"I don't know that. Is she far gone?"

"In which way do you mean?"

"In this."

"Aha-ha-ha! Hee-hee-hee!" nickered M'Murdie, misconstruing the Laird's meaning.

"What do you laugh at, my dear sir? Do you know her, then?"

"Ho-ho-ho! Hee-hee-hee! How should I, or how can I, know her, Birkendelly, unless you inform me who she is?"

"Why, that is the very thing I want to know of you. I mean the young lady whom you met just now."

"You are raving, Birkendelly. I met no young lady, nor is there a single person on the road I have come by, while you know, that for a mile and a half forward your way, she could not get out of it."

"I know that," said the Laird, biting his lip, and looking greatly puzzled; "but confound me if I understand this; for I was within speech of her just now on the top of the Birky Brow there; and, when I think of it, she could not have been even thus far as yet. She had on a pure white gauze frock, a small green bonnet and feathers, and a green veil, which, flung back over her left shoulder, hung below her waist; and was altogether such an engaging figure, that no man could have passed her on the road without taking some note of her.—Are you not making game of me? Did you not really meet with her?"

"On my word of truth and honour, I did not. Come, ride back with me, and we shall meet her still, depend on it. She has given you the go-by on the road. Let us go; I am only going to call at the mill about some barley for the distillery, and will return with you to the big town."

Birkendelly returned with his friend. The sun was not yet set, yet M'Murdie could not help observing that the Laird looked thoughtful and confused, and not a word could he speak about any thing save this lovely apparition with the white frock and the green veil; and lo, when they reached the top of the Birky Brow, there was the maiden again before them, and exactly at the same spot where the Laird first saw her before, only walking in the contrary direction.

"Well, this is the most extraordinary thing that I ever knew!" exclaimed the Laird.

"What is it, sir?" said M'Murdie.

"How that young lady could have eluded me," returned the Laird; "see, here she is still."

"I beg your pardon, sir, I don't see her. Where is she?"

"There, on the other side of the angle; but you are short-sighted. See, there she is ascending the other eminence in her white frock and green veil, as I told you—What a lovely creature!"

"Well, well, we have her fairly before us now, and shall see what she is like at all events," said M'Murdie.

Between the Birky Brow and this other slight eminence, there is an obtuse angle of the road at the part where it is lowest, and, in passing this, the two friends necessarily lost sight of the object of their curiosity. They pushed on at a quick pace—cleared the low angle—the maiden was not there! They rode full speed to the top of the eminence from whence a long extent of road was visible before them—there was no human creature in view! M'Murdie laughed aloud; but the Laird turned pale as death, and bit his lip. His friend asked at him, good-humouredly, why he was so much affected. He said, because he could not comprehend the meaning of this singular apparition or illusion, and it troubled him the more, as he now remembered a dream of the same nature which he had had, and which terminated in a dreadful manner.

"Why, man, you are dreaming still," said M'Murdie; "but never mind. It is quite common for men of your complexion to dream of beautiful maidens, with white frocks and green veils, bonnets, feathers, and slender waists. It is a lovely image, the creation of your own sanguine imagination, and you may worship it without any blame. Were her shoes black or green?—And her stockings, did you note them? The symmetry of the limbs, I am sure you did! Good-bye; I see you are not disposed to leave the spot. Perhaps she will appear to you again.”

So saying, M'Murdie rode on towards the mill, and Birkendelly, after musing for some time, turned his beast's head slowly round, and began to move towards the great muckle village.

The Laird's feelings were now in terrible commotion. He was taken beyond measure with the beauty and elegance of the figure he had seen; but he remembered, with a mixture of admiration and horror, that a dream of the same enchanting object had haunted his slumbers all the days of his life; yet how singular that he should never have recollected the circumstance till now! But farther, with the dream there were connected some painful circumstances, which, though terrible in their issue, he could not recollect, so as to form them into any degree of arrangement.

As he was considering deeply of these things, and riding slowly down the declivity, neither dancing his cane, nor singing the “Laird of Windy-wa's,” he lifted up his eyes, and there was the girl on the same spot where he saw her first, walking deliberately up the Birky Brow. The sun was down; but it was the month of August, and a fine evening, and the Laird, seized with an unconquerable desire to see and speak with that incomparable creature, could restrain himself no longer, but shouted out to her to stop till he came up. She beckoned acquiescence, and slackened her pace into a slow movement. The Laird turned the corner quickly, but when he had rounded it, the maiden was still there, though on the summit of the Brow. She turned round, and, with an ineffable smile and curtsy, saluted him, and again moved slowly on. She vanished gradually beyond the summit, and while the green feathers were still nodding in view and so nigh, that the Laird could have touched them with a fishing-rod, he reached the top of the Brow himself. There was no living soul there, nor onward, as far as his view reached. He now trembled every limb, and, without knowing what he did, rode straight on to the big town, not daring well to return and see what he had seen for three several times; and, certain he would see it again when the shades of evening were deepening, he deemed it proper and prudent to decline the pursuit of such a phantom any farther.

He alighted at the Queen's Head, called for some brandy and water, quite forgot what was his errand to the great muckle town that afternoon, there being nothing visible to his mental sight but lovely fairy images, with white gauze frocks and green veils. His friend, Mr M'Murdie, joined him; they drank deep, bantered, reasoned, got angry, reasoned themselves calm again, and still all would not do. The Laird was conscious that he had seen the beautiful apparition, and, moreover, that she was the very maiden, or the resemblance of her, who, in the irrevocable decrees of Providence, was destined to be his. It was in vain that M'Murdie reasoned of impressions on the imagination, and

“Of fancy moulding in the mind,
Light visions on the passing wind.”

Vain also was a story that he told him of a relation of his own, who was greatly harassed by the apparition of an officer in a red uniform, that haunted him day and night, and had very nigh put him quite distracted several times; till at length his physician found out the nature of this illusion so well, that he knew, from the state of his pulse, to an hour when the ghost of the officer would appear; and by bleeding, low diet, and emollients, contrived to keep the apparition away altogether.

The Laird admitted the singularity of this incident, but not that it was one in point; for the one, he said, was imaginary, and the other real; and that no conclusions could convince him in opposition to the authority of his own senses. He accepted of an invitation to spend a few days with M'Murdie and his family; but they all acknowledged afterwards that the Laird was very much like one bewitched.

As soon as he reached home, he went straight to the Birky Brow, certain of seeing once more the angelic phantom; but she was not there. He took each of his former positions again and again, but the desired vision would in nowise make its appearance. He tried every day, and every hour of the day, all with the same effect, till he grew absolutely desperate, and had the audacity to kneel on the spot, and entreat of Heaven to see her. Yes, he called on Heaven to see her once more, whatever she was, whether a being of earth, heaven, or hell!

He was now in such a state of excitement that he could not exist; he grew listless, impatient, and sickly; took to his bed, and sent for M'Murdie and the doctor; and the issue of the consultation was, that Birkendelly consented to leave the country for a season, on a visit to his only sister in Ireland, whither we must now accompany him for a short space.

His sister was married to Captain Bryan, younger of Scoresby, and they two lived in a cottage on the estate, and the Captain's parents and sisters at Scoresby Hall. Great was the stir and preparation when the gallant young Laird of Birkendelly arrived at the cottage, it never being doubted that he had come to forward a second bond of connexion with the family, which still contained seven dashing sisters, all unmarried, and all alike willing to change that solitary and helpless state for the envied one of matrimony—a state highly popular among the young women of Ireland. Some of the Misses Bryan had now reached the years of womanhood, several of them scarcely; but these small disqualifications made no difference in the estimation of the young ladies themselves; each and all of them brushed up for the competition, with high hopes and unflinching resolutions. True, the elder ones tried to check the younger in their good-natured, forthright, Irish way; but they retorted, and persisted in their superior pretensions. Then there was such shopping in the county-town! It was so boundless, that the credit of the Hall was finally exhausted, and the old squire was driven to remark, that "Och and to be sure it was a dreadful and tirrrell concussion, to be put upon the equipment of seven daughters all at the same moment, as if the young gentleman could marry them all! Och, then, poor dear shoul, he would be after finding that one was sufficient, if not one too many. And, therefore, there was no occasion, none at all, at all, and that there was not, for any of them to rig out more than one."

It was hinted that the Laird had some reason for complaint at this time; but as the lady sided with her daughters, he had no chance. One of the items of his account was, thirty-seven buckling-combs, then greatly in vogue. There were black combs, pale combs, yellow combs, and gilt ones, all to suit or set off various complexions; and if other articles bore any proportion at all to these, it had been better for the Laird and all his family that Birkendelly had never set foot in Ireland.

The plan was all concocted. There was to be a grand dinner at the Hall, at which the damsels were to appear in all their finery. A ball was to follow, and note taken which of the young ladies was their guest's choice, and measures taken accordingly. The dinner and the ball took place, and what a pity I may not describe that entertainment, the dresses, and the dancers, for they were all exquisite in their way, and outré beyond measure. But such details only serve to derange a winter's evening tale such as this.

Birkendelly having at this time but one model for his choice among womankind, all that ever he did while in the presence of ladies, was to look out for some resemblance to her, the angel of his fancy; and it so happened, that in one of old Bryan's daughters named Luna, or more familiarly, Loony, he perceived, or thought he perceived, some imaginary similarity in form and air to the lovely apparition. This was the sole reason why he was incapable of taking his eyes off from her the whole of that night; and this incident settled the point, not only with the old people, but even the young ladies were forced, after every exertion on their own parts, to "yild the pint to their sister Loony, who certinly was nit the mist genteelest nor mist hand-someest of that guid-lucking family."

The next day Lady Luna was dispatched off to the cottage in grand style, there to live hand and glove with her supposed lover. There was no standing all this. There were the two parrocked together, like a ewe and a lamb, early and late; and though the Laird really appeared to have, and probably had, some delight in her company, it was only in contemplating that certain indefinable air of resemblance which she bore to the sole image impressed on his heart. He bought her a white gauze frock, a green bonnet and feathers, with a veil, which she was obliged to wear thrown over her left shoulder; and every day after, six times a-day, was she obliged to walk over a certain eminence at a certain distance before her lover. She was delighted to oblige him; but still when he came up, he looked disappointed, and never said, "Luna, I love you; when are we to be married?" No, he never said any such thing, for all her looks and expressions of fondest love; for, alas, in all this dalliance, he was only feeding a mysterious flame, that preyed upon his vitals, and proved too severe for the powers either of reason or religion to extinguish. Still time flew lighter and lighter by, his health was restored, the bloom of his cheek returned, and the frank and simple confidence of Luna had a certain charm with it, that reconciled him to his sister's Irish economy. But a strange incident now happened to him which deranged all his immediate plans.

He was returning from angling one evening, a little before sunset, when he saw Lady Luna awaiting him on his way home. But instead of brushing up to meet him as usual, she turned, and walked up the rising ground before him. "Poor sweet girl! how condescending she is," said he to himself, "and how like she is in reality to the angelic being whose form and features are so deeply impressed on my heart! I now see it is no fond or fancied resemblance. It is real! real! real! How I long to clasp her in my arms, and tell her how I love her; for, after all, that is the girl that is to be mine, and the former a vision to impress this the more on my heart."

He posted up the ascent to overtake her. When at the top she turned, smiled, and curtsied. Good Heavens! it was the identical lady of his fondest adoration herself, but lovelier, far lovelier than ever. He expected every moment that she would vanish as was her wont; but she did not—she awaited him, and received his embraces with open arms. She was a being of real flesh and blood, courteous, elegant, and affectionate. He kissed her hand, he kissed her glowing cheek, and blessed all the powers of love who had thus restored her to him again, after undergoing pangs of love such as man never suffered.

"But, dearest heart, here we are standing in the middle of the highway," said he; "suffer me to conduct you to my sister's house, where you shall have an apartment with a child of nature having some slight resemblance to yourself." She smiled, and said, "No, I will not sleep with Lady Luna to-night. Will you please to look round you, and see where you are." He did so, and behold they were standing on the Birky Brow, on the only spot where he had ever seen her. She smiled at his embarrassed look, and asked if he did not remember aught of his coming over from Ireland. He said he thought he did remember something of it, but love with him had long absorbed every other sense. He then asked her to his own house, which she declined, saying she could only meet him on that spot till after their marriage, which could not be before St Lawrence's Eve come three years. "And now," said she, "we must part. My name is Jane Ogilvie, and you were betrothed to me before you were born. But I am come to release you this evening, if you have the slightest objection."

He declared he had none; and, kneeling, swore the most solemn oath to be hers for ever, and to meet her there on St Lawrence's Eve next, and every St Lawrence's Eve until that blessed day on which she had consented to make him happy, by becoming his own for ever. She then asked him affectionately to exchange rings with her, in pledge of their faith and truth, in which he joyfully acquiesced; for she could not have then asked any conditions, which, in the fulness of his heart's love, he would not have granted; and after one fond and affectionate kiss, and repeating all their engagements over again, they parted.

Birkendelly's heart was now melted within him, and all his senses overpowered by one overwhelming passion. On leaving his fair and kind one, he got bewildered, and could not find the road to his own house, believing sometimes that he was going there, and sometimes to his sister's, till at length he came, as he thought, upon the Liffey, at its junction with Loch Allan; and there, in attempting to call for a boat, he awoke from a profound sleep, and found himself lying in his bed within his sister's house, and the day sky just breaking.

If he was puzzled to account for some things in the course of his dream, he was much more puzzled to account for them now that he was wide awake. He was sensible that he had met his love, had embraced, kissed, and exchanged vows and rings with her, and, in token of the truth and reality of all these, her emerald ring was on his finger, and his own away; so there was no doubt that they had met,—by what means it was beyond the power of man to calculate.

There was then living with Mrs Bryan an old Scots woman, commonly styled Lucky Black. She had nursed Birkendelly's mother, and been dry-nurse to himself and sister; and having more than a mother's attachment for the latter, when she was married, old Lucky left her country, to spend the last of her days in the house of her beloved young lady. When the Laird entered the breakfast parlour that morning, she was sitting in her black velvet hood, as usual, reading "The Fourfold State of Man," and being paralytic and somewhat deaf, she seldom regarded those who went out or came in. But chancing to hear him say something about the ninth of August, she quitted reading, turned round her head to listen, and then asked, in a hoarse tremulous voice, "What's that he's saying? What's the unlucky calkant saying about the ninth of August?"

Aih? To be sure it is St Lawrence's Eve, although the tenth be his day. It 's ower true, ower true! ower true for him an' a' his kin, poor man! Aih? What was he saying then?"

The men smiled at her incoherent earnestness, but the lady, with true feminine condescension, informed her, in a loud voice, that Allan had an engagement in Scotland on St Lawrence's Eve. She then started up, extended her shrivelled hands, that shook like the aspen, and panted out, "Aih, aih? Lord preserve us! whaten an engagement has he on St Lawrence's Eve? Bind him! bind him! shackle him wi' bands of steel, and of brass, and of iron!—O, may He whose blessed will was pleased to leave him an orphan sae soon, preserve him from the fate which I tremble to think on!"

She then tottered round the table, as with supernatural energy, and seizing the Laird's right hand, she drew it close to her unstable eyes, and then, perceiving the emerald ring chased in blood, she threw up her arms with a jerk, opened her skinny jaws with a fearful gape, and uttering a shriek, that made all the house yell, and every one within it to tremble, she fell back lifeless and rigid on the floor. The gentlemen both fled, out of sheer terror; but a woman never deserts her friends in extremity. The lady called her maids about her, had her old nurse conveyed to bed, where every means were used to restore animation. But, alas! life was extinct! The vital spark had fled for ever, which filled all their hearts with grief, disappointment, and horror, as some dreadful tale of mystery was now sealed up from their knowledge, which, in all likelihood, no other could reveal. But to say the truth, the Laird did not seem greatly disposed to probe it to the bottom.

Not all the arguments of Captain Bryan and his lady, nor the simple entreaties of Lady Luna, could induce Birkendelly to put off his engagement to meet his love on the Birky Brow on the evening of the 9th of August; but he promised soon to return, pretending that some business of the utmost importance called him away. Before he went, however, he asked his sister if ever she had heard of such a lady in Scotland as Jane Ogilvie. Mrs Bryan repeated the name many times to herself, and said that name undoubtedly was once familiar to her, although she thought not for good, but at that moment she did not recollect one single individual of the name. He then shewed her the emerald ring that had been the death of old Lucky Black; but the moment the lady looked at it, she made a grasp at it to take it off by force, which she had very nearly effected. "O, burn it, burn it!" cried she; "it is not a right ring! Burn it!"

"My dear sister, what fault is in the ring?" said he. "It is a very pretty ring, and one that I set great value by."

"O, for Heaven's sake, burn it, and renounce the giver!" cried she. "If you have any regard for your peace here, or your soul's welfare hereafter, burn that ring! If you saw with your own eyes, you would easily perceive that that is not a ring befitting a Christian to wear."

This speech confounded Birkendelly a good deal. He retired by himself and examined the ring, and could see nothing in it unbecoming a Christian to wear. It was a chased gold ring, with a bright emerald, which last had a red foil, in some lights giving it a purple gleam, and inside was engraven "Elegit," much defaced, but that his sister could not see; therefore he could not comprehend her vehement injunctions concerning it. But that it might no more give her offence, or any other, he sewed it within his vest, opposite his heart, judging that there was something in it which his eyes were withholden from discerning.

Thus he left Ireland with his mind in great confusion, groping his way, as it were, in a hole of mystery, yet the passion that preyed on his heart and vitals more intense than ever. He seems to have had an impression all his life that some mysterious fate awaited him, which the correspondence of his dreams and day visions tended to confirm. And though he gave himself wholly up to the sway of one overpowering passion, it was not without some yearnings of soul, manifestations of terror, and so much earthly shame, that he never more mentioned his love, or his engagements, to any human being, not even to his friend M'Murdie, whose company he forthwith shunned.

It is on this account that I am unable to relate what passed between the lovers thenceforward. It is certain they met at the Birky Brow that St Lawrence's Eve, for they were seen in company together; but of the engagements, vows, or dalliance, that passed between them, I can say nothing; nor of all their future meetings, until the beginning of August 1781, when the Laird began decidedly to make preparations for his approaching marriage; yet not as if he and his betrothed had been to reside at Birkendelly, all his provisions rather bespeaking a meditated journey.

On the morning of the 9th, he wrote to his sister, and then arraying himself in his new wedding suit, and putting the emerald ring on his finger, he appeared all impatience, until towards evening, when he sallied out on horseback to his appointment. It seems that his mysterious innamora had met him, for he was seen riding through the big town before sunset, with a young lady behind him, dressed in white and green, and the villagers affirmed that they were riding at the rate of fifty miles an hour! They were seen to pass a cottage called Mosskilt, ten miles farther on, where there was no highway, at the same tremendous speed; and I could never hear that they were any more seen, until the following morning, when Birkendelly's fine bay horse was found lying dead at his own stable door; and shortly after, his master was likewise discovered lying a blackened corpse on the Birky Brow, at the very spot where the mysterious, but lovely dame, had always appeared to him. There was neither wound, bruise, nor dislocation, in his whole frame; but his skin was of a livid colour, and his features terribly distorted.

This woful catastrophe struck the neighbourhood with great consternation, so that nothing else was talked of. Every ancient tradition and modern incident were raked together, compared, and combined; and certainly a most rare concatenation of misfortunes was elicited. It was authenticated that his father had died on the same spot that day twenty years, and his grandfather that day forty years, the former, as was supposed, by a fall from his horse when in liquor, and the latter, nobody knew how; and now this Allan was the last of his race, for Mrs Bryan had no children.

It was moreover now remembered by many, and among the rest, the Rev. Joseph Taylor, that he had frequently observed a young lady, in white and green, sauntering about that spot on a St Lawrence's Eve.

When Captain Bryan and his lady arrived to take possession of the premises, they instituted a strict enquiry into every circumstance; but nothing farther than what was related to them by Mr M'Murdie could be learned of this Mysterious Bride, besides what the Laird's own letter bore. It ran thus :—

"DEAREST SISTER,

"I shall, before this time to-morrow, be the most happy, or most miserable, of mankind, having solemnly engaged myself this night to wed a young and beautiful lady, named Jane Ogilvie, to whom it seems I was betrothed before I was born. Our correspondence has been of a most private and mysterious nature; but my troth is pledged, and my resolution fixed. We set out on a far journey to the place of her abode on the nuptial eve, so that it will be long before I see you again.

"Yours till death,

"ALLAN GEORGE SANDISON.

"Birkendelly, August 8th, 1781."

That very same year, an old woman, named Marion Haw, was returned upon that, her native parish, from Glasgow. She had led a migratory life with her son—who was what he called a bell-hanger, but in fact a tinker of the worst grade—for many years, and was at last returned to the muckle town in a state of great destitution. She gave the parishioners a history of the Mysterious Bride, so plausibly correct, but withal so romantic, that every body said of it, (as is often said of my narratives, with the same narrow-minded prejudice and injustice,) that it was a made story. There were, however, some strong testimonies of its veracity.

She said the first Allan Sandison, who married the great heiress of Birkendelly, was previously engaged to a beautiful young lady, named Jane Ogilvie, to whom he gave any thing but fair play; and, as she believed, either murdered her, or caused her to be murdered, in the midst of a thicket of birch and broom, at a spot which she mentioned; that she had good reasons for believing so, as she had seen the red blood and the new grave, when she was a little girl, and ran home and mentioned it to her grandfather, who charged her as she valued her life never to mention that again, as it was only the nubbles and hide of a deer, which he himself had buried there. But when, twenty years subsequent to that, the wicked and unhappy Allan Sandison was found dead on that very spot, and lying across the green mound, then nearly level with the surface, which she had once seen a new grave, she then for the first time ever thought of a Divine Providence; and she added, "For my grandfather, Neddy Haw, he dec'd too; there's naebody kens how, nor ever shall."

As they were quite incapable of conceiving, from Marion's description, any thing of the spot, Mr M'Murdie caused her to be taken out to the Birky Brow in a cart, accompanied by Mr Taylor, and some hundreds of the townsfolk; but whenever she saw it, she said, "Aha, birbies! the haill kintra's altered now. There was nae road here then; it gaed straight ower the tap o' the hill. An' let me see—there's the thorn where the cushats biggit; an' there's the auld birk that I aince fell aff an' left my shoe stickin' i' the cleft. I can tell ye, birbies, either the deer's grave, or bonny Jane Ogilvie's, is no twa yards aff the place where that horse's hind feet are standin'; sae ye may howk, an' see if there be any remains."

The minister, and M'Murdie, and all the people, stared at one another, for they had purposely caused the horse to stand still on the very spot where both the father and son had been found dead. They digged, and deep, deep below the road, they found part of the slender bones and skull of a young female, which they deposited decently in the churchyard. The family of the Sandisons is extinct—the Mysterious Bride appears no more on the Eve of St Lawrence—and the wicked people of the great muckle village have got a lesson on Divine justice written to them in lines of blood.

THE HISTORY OF A FRENCH ARTIZAN DURING THE LAST REVOLUTION.

I WAS born in the beautiful valley of the Seine, near the small town of Bonnières. It is a lovely place, and I will say no more of it; for in sitting down to write all the miseries and horrors that have visited me since I left it, the fair calm spot of my birth, and the sweet peaceful scenes of my boyhood, rise up like the reproachful spirit of a noble parent before a criminal son, and upbraid me for having ever quitted my tranquil home. My father, though but the gardener at the chateau, was also a small propriétaire; and, in his spare time, used to cultivate his own fields by the banks of the river. The chateau had been purchased by Monsieur V——, the rich bookseller in Paris; and in hanging about the house while a child, I became a great favourite with the good Parisian. Still my principal patron was Monsieur le Curé of Bonnières, who discovered in me an amazing genius for my catechism, taught me to read and write, gave me a smattering of Latin, and declared, that if I took pains and behaved well, he and Monsieur V—— between them, would procure me the means of studying, and make me a clergyman like himself.

My ambition was flattered with the prospect; and during my early years, the dream of my future honours was always before me: but, as I grew up and learnt to dance upon the green with the girls of the village, my sentiments insensibly changed. I began to think of leaving off dancing, and being grave, and serious, and never marrying—each with an augmented degree of horror. The decisive blow, however, was struck, when I had seen three times Mariette Dupont. We were both as young as we well could be to fall in love; but she was so beautiful, and her soft dark eyes looked so imploringly into one's heart, that from the very first moment I saw her, I felt an inclination to put my arm round her, and say, "Thou shalt be my own; and I will guard thee from sorrow, and care, and adversity; and shelter thee from every blast that blows in the bleak cold world around." But on this I must not pause either, for the memory of such dreams is bitterness. The matter went on—I loved Mariette, and she — Ay! that joy is at least my own—lasting—imperishable, and the annihilation of a world could not take it from me—She loved me—deeply, truly, devotedly—through life—to the tomb!

Years flew by; and we were married; for my father had never liked the thought of my becoming a priest, which he looked upon as being buried alive. He said I should do much better to labour as my ancestors had done; or, since I had a superior education, could read and write, and understood Latin, I might easily make my fortune in Paris. So he willingly gave his consent to my marriage with Mariette. Monsieur V—— the bookseller, said it was always right to let fools have their own way; and the Curé frowned and united us, merely observing, that he had bestowed his time and attention very much in vain.

By my father's counsel, we determined to go to Paris immediately, for he and my brother were both sure that I should there become a great man, and Mariette had no doubt of it. "Besides," my father said, "if you do not get on there, you can come back here, and help to take care of our own ground, while I work at the chateau."

To Paris we went, and took a small lodging in the Faubourg Poissonnière, where, for two or three weeks, Mariette and myself spent our time and our money in love and amusement. We were not extravagant, but we were thoughtless; and surely a three-week's thoughtlessness was but a fair portion for such happiness as we enjoyed. At length I began to think of seeking something to do; and I had sufficient self-confidence to fancy I could even write in a newspaper. Forth I went to propose myself; and Mariette's eyes told me how high were her anticipations of my success. To the proprietors of the Constitutionnel, my first application was made; but the gentleman I saw bent his ear to catch my provincial jargon—looked at me from head to foot—told me I was dreaming; and turned upon his heel. How I got out of the house, I know not ; but when I found myself in the street, my head swam round, and my heart swelled with mingled indignation, shame, and disappointment.

It required no small effort to force myself to enter the office of the National, which was the next I tried. There I mentioned my pretensions, in a humbler tone, and only proposed that something from my pen might be received as an experiment. The clerk to whom I spoke bore my message into an inner room, and returned with a calm, business-like face, to inform me that all departments were full. This had occupied me the whole morning; and I now returned to Mariette, who instantly read my mortification in my countenance. She asked no questions, but only cast her arms round my neck, and with a smile, which was not gay, though it was not desponding, she whispered, "Do not be vexed, Frank. They cannot know yet how clever you are. When they see more of you, they will be glad enough to have you. Besides, we can go back again to Bonnières."

The thought of returning unsuccessful to my own home, was not what I could endure. I imagined the cold eye of the curate; and the disappointment and surprise of my father and brother; and the jeers and the wonder of the whole village; and I determined to do any thing rather than go back to Bonnières. The landlord of our lodgings was a tinman, a great politician, and a literary man. All his information, however, was gathered from a paper called the Globe, which he cited on every occasion. To the office of the Globe, then, I went, after dinner; and, having taken a couple of turns before the door, to gather resolution, I went in, and modestly asked when I could see the editor. One of the young men in the office answered that Monsieur—— was then in the house, and ushered me into another room. Here I found a gentleman writing, who looked up with a pleasant and intelligent expression, and pointing to a seat, asked my business.

As I explained it to him, his countenance took a look of great seriousness; and he replied, "I am extremely sorry that no such occupation as you desire can be afforded you by the editors of the Globe, for we have applications every day, which we are obliged to reject, from writers of known excellence. I am afraid, also, that you will find much difficulty in obtaining what you seek, for one of the worst consequences of bad government is now affecting the whole of France. I mean the undue proportion between the number of the population and the quantity of employment. Where the fault lies, I must not presume to say, but that there must be a great fault somewhere is evident; otherwise every man who is willing to labour, would find occupation."

It has struck me since, that there must often be causes for want of employment, which no government could either control or remedy; but, at the time, his reasoning seemed excellent; and all I felt was renewed disappointment, and a touch of despair, which I believe shewed itself very plainly in my face, for the editor began to ask me some farther questions which soon led me to tell him my precise situation.

He mused, and seemed interested; but for a moment replied nothing. At length, looking at me with a smile, he said, "Perhaps, what I am about to propose to you, may be very inferior to your expectations; nevertheless it will afford you some occupation."

The very name of occupation was renewed life, and I listened with eagerness, while he offered to recommend me to a printer, as what is called a reader, or corrector of the press. I embraced his proposal with unutterable thankfulness; and having ascertained that I was capable of the task, by some proof-sheets that lay upon the table, he wrote a note to Monsieur Manson, the printer, and put it into my hand. I could almost have knelt and worshipped him, so great was the change from despair to hope. With the letter in my hand, I flew to the printing-house, was tried and received; and, though the emotion held out was as small as it well could be, my walk home was with the springing step of joy and independence; and my heart, as I pressed Mariette to my bosom, and told her my success, was like that of a great general in the moment of victory, before the gloss of triumph has been tarnished by one regret for the gone, or one calculation for the future. I was soon installed in my new post; and though what I gained was barely enough for the necessities of life, yet it sufficed; and there was always a dear warm smile in the eyes I loved best, which cheered and supported me whenever I felt inclined to despond or give way.

It is true, I often regretted that I could not procure for Mariette those comforts and those luxuries which I little valued myself; but she seemed to heed them not, and every privation appeared to her a matter of pride—to be borne rather as a joy than a care. Six months thus passed; and they were the happiest of my life, for though I laboured, I laboured in the sunshine. I had perfectly sufficient time also, to make myself thoroughly acquainted with the whole art of printing, and to fit myself for the task of a compositor, which, though more mechanical, was more lucrative; and it became necessary that I should gain more, as a change was coming over Mariette which promised us new cares and new happiness. Strange, that when I looked upon her languid features, and her altered shape, she seemed to me a thousand times more lovely, than in all the fresh graces of expanding womanhood! And when fears for her safety mingled with the joy of possessing her—when her calm sweet eyes rested long and fixedly upon me, as if she strove to trace out the image of her future child in the looks of its father—a new and thrilling interest appeared to have grown up between us, which was something more than love.

At length, one of the compositors having gone to conduct a printing office at Rennes, my object was accomplished; and I obtained his vacant place. Still the emoluments were infinitely small, for the book trade was bad, and of course the printers suffered. Sometimes there was plenty of work, and sometimes there was none; and the whole of my companions murmured highly at the government, whose imbecility and tyrannical conduct, they said, had destroyed the commerce of the country, and done every thing to ruin and degrade the press. There was many a busy whisper amongst us, that nothing could save the nation but a new revolution; and as we all felt more or less the sharp tooth of want, we madly thought that no change would be detrimental to us.

I doubted some of the opinions that I heard; but one of my comrades worked at the Globe, which had now become a daily paper, and he used often to give us long quotations, which convinced us all that the government was opposed to the wishes of the whole nation, and that any change must be for the better.

During the autumn, I contrived to save some little portion of my wages; but the rigour of the winter, and the quantity of wood we were obliged to burn, soon consumed all that I had laid by; so that the provision for Mariette's confinement became a matter of serious and dreadful anxiety. One morning, however, I received a letter from my brother, telling me that my father had died suddenly on the preceding night. I will not rest upon all that I felt. I had always been the slave of my imagination: and it had been one of my favourite vanities to think how proud my father's heart would be to see me raise myself high in the world, and how comfortable I should be able to render his old age, when the smile of fortune should be turned upon me. But now he was dead, and those dreams all broken.

The little patch of ground which we possessed was of course divided between me and my brother; and my portion was instantly sold to provide for the occasion which was so near at hand. The depression of all property, and the haste with which I was obliged to effect the sale, rendered it the most disadvantageous that can be conceived; and what with the expenses of Mariette's confinement, a long illness which she underwent after, and a fit of sickness which I suffered myself—before the end of March my stock of money was reduced to fifty francs.

Work was by this time sufficient and regular, so that I could maintain myself, Mariette, and our boy. We had, indeed, no superfluity; we knew no luxury; and the external enjoyments which I saw many possessing, far less worthy than ourselves, were denied to us.

Mariette bore it all with cheerfulness, but I grew gloomy and discontented, and the continual murmurs at the government, which I heard amongst my companions, wrought upon me. I gradually began to dream that every thing unpleasant in my situation was attributable to the state of society in which I lived. Every political change now seemed to irritate and affect me. Whereas, before I heard a word of politics, I used to work on with hope and activity—encountering hardships boldly, and feeling them the less, because I did not let my mind rest upon them—I now dwelt upon every uncomfot, and magnified it in my own eyes, for the purpose of making it a greater reproach to the government, whose evil measures, I thought, caused it. I would pause long in my work to read scraps from a newspaper, and to comment on the folly and tyranny of our rulers; and thus I met several reproofs for my slowness and negligence. The fires in Normandy I heard of with indignation and horror, and I attributed them all to the ministers, whose wickedness I thought was capable of any baseness, till one day I heard one of my republican companions observe, that the incendiaries were very much in the right, to burn down the barns and destroy the grain, as by making the great mass of the people as miserable and pennyless as themselves, they would force them to bring about a revolution, which would set all things to rights. Besides, he asked, what right had a rich man to corn, when the poor were starving?

The elections for the chamber of deputies was another great source of anxiety to me; and when I found they were all liberal, I felt nearly as much satisfaction as if I had been elected myself. At length the meeting of the chambers approached; and many a warm discussion took place amongst the journeymen printers, on the questions likely to be brought under consideration. Every one said that the ministers must go out, or dissolve the chambers; and many observed with a shrewd glance, that neither the dissolution of the chambers, nor the resignation of the ministers, would satisfy the people. "We must have a change," they said—"a complete change;" and several began to talk boldly of revolution.

The continual irritation and discontent I felt, had their effect on my countenance; and Mariette grew anxious about me. She did all she could to soothe me—sat with her arms round my neck, and endeavoured to persuade me that I should be happier if I did not think of politics. "Kings and governments," she said, and said truly, "could only provide for the general good; and that there must always be many in every country whose fate destined them to labour and live hard. She could not but think," she added, "that the way to be happy, was for every one to try, by his own exertions, to improve his own condition; and neither to envy his neighbour nor to meddle with affairs in which he was not well practised." She sought to induce me, too, to return to Bonnières. We had never been so happy since we left it; and so sweetly, so perseveringly did she urge a request which I saw was made for my sake more than her own, that at length I consented to go, and, quitting all the vain dreams which had led me to Paris, to reassume the class and occupation of my fathers.

We had not money to go by the Diligence; but we were both good walkers; and the baby, being brought up by hand—and that upon the simplest food—would prove but little encumbrance.

This determination was taken on Sunday the 25th of July, and the next day I gave my employer notice that, at the end of the month, I should quit him. In the meantime we determined to save every sou that was possible, in order to provide for our expenses by the way; for which we had hitherto made no reserve. On the Monday following, I joined the rest of the printers, and we worked through the day in tranquillity. At night, however, as I was returning over the Pontneuf, I met one of my companions, who grasped my hand, asking, with a look of intense eagerness, "If I had heard the news?" The suddenness of the question, and his look of anxiety, alarmed me. I knew not well what I dreaded, but at all events, my fears were all personal. His tale soon relieved me of my apprehensions for Mariette and our child; but raised my indignation to the highest pitch against the government. The King, he told me, had violated the charter, struck at the liberty of the press, altered the law of election, and reduced the people to a nation of slaves.

Distant shouts met our ear as we were crossing the Rue St Honoré; and hurrying on in the direction from which they proceeded, we came upon an immense multitude, who were breaking the lamps, and yelling execrations against the government.

I was well enough inclined to join them; but remembering Mariette, I returned home, and told her all that had occurred. As I spoke, a paleness came over her beautiful face, so unusual, so ghastly, that it made me start. It seemed as if some warning voice had told her that every happy dream was at an end—that the eternal barrier had fallen between us and joy for ever. The next morning every thing seemed to have passed by which had disturbed the tranquillity of the town on the previous evening—the streets were quiet, and the people engaged in their usual occupations. Mariette's mind appeared somewhat calmed; but still she looked at me anxiously, as she saw me about to depart, and made me promise more than once, that I would go straight to my work, without mingling with any mob I might see. I kept my word; and, though I saw several groups of people gathered round the corners of the streets, where the obnoxious ordinances were posted up, I did not even stop to read, but hurried on to the printing-house with all speed. The scene in the workrooms was different from any I had ever beheld. All the presses were standing still; and the workmen, gathered into knots, were each declaiming more violently than the other, on the infamy and folly of the government; and, with furious gestures, vowing vengeance. The overseer came in soon after, and with some difficulty got us to our work; but, about twelve o'clock, the proprietor of the establishment himself appeared, and told us to leave off our labours. "My good friends," said he, "the government has annihilated the liberty of the press. The type of several of the journals has been seized this morning. Our liberties are at an end without we secure them by our own force. Far be it from me to counsel tumult or bloodshed—the law is quite sufficient to do us justice. However, I have determined, as well as Monsieur Didot and all the other printers, to cease business, and discharge my workmen." We were then paid the small sum owing to each, and dismissed, with a caution to be quiet and orderly, and to trust to the law; though the very fact of turning out a number of unemployed and discontented men, upon such a city as Paris, seemed to me the very best possible way of producing that tumult which we were warned to avoid.

I soon after found, that it was not alone the printers who had been discharged, but that almost all the workmen in the city had been suddenly thrown out of employment. As I returned home, there was a sort of ominous silence about the town that had something fearful in it. Not ten persons were to be seen upon the Quais, which are usually so crowded; and, it seemed as if the whole population had been concentrated on particular points. To my great surprise, on entering my lodging, I found my brother sitting with Mariette, and holding our infant on his knee, while the child looked up in his face and smiled, as if it knew that those were kindred eyes which gazed upon it. My brother soon told me the occasion of his coming to Paris, which was to buy seeds and plants for the hothouse at the Chateau; and about three o'clock, as every thing was quiet, I went out with him. As we passed onward, we soon saw that all was not right. The shops were closed—the gates of the Palais Royal were shut—groups of gloomy faces were gathered at every corner—and the whole town wore the dull, heavy aspect of a thunder-cloud, before the storm bursts forth in all its fury. A few gens-d'armes were to be seen, but no extraordinary military force appeared; and gradually the same sort of yelling shouts came upon our ear that I had heard the night before.

As we approached the Rue St Honoré, the cries became louder; and turning down the Rue des Bons Enfans, we found ourselves suddenly in the crowd from which they proceeded. It consisted of about five hundred men and boys, all unarmed. Some had stones in their hands, and some had sticks; but no more deadly weapon could I discern amongst them. A great proportion of the mob were discharged printers, and I was instantly recognised by several of my fellow-workmen, drawn into the crowd with my brother, who was very willing to go, and hurried on towards the Place Vendôme, whither the rioters were directing their steps, with the purpose of attacking the house of Monsieur de Peyronnet, one of the obnoxious ministers. The numbers in the Rue St Honoré were in no degree tremendous; but, as we entered the Place Vendôme, I saw an equal body coming up the Rue Castiglione, and another approaching by the Rue de la Paix. A large force of mounted gens-d'armes was drawn up in the square; and shortly after, a party of the guard, and the troops of the line, appeared. There seemed to be considerable hesitation on both parts to strike the first blow; and as long as we kept to shouts, the military remained passive. What took place towards Peyronnet's house, I could not discover for the heads of the people, but there seemed a considerable tumult in that direction; and a moment after, a lad beside me threw an immense brick at the head of the officer of gens-d'armes, crying, "A bas le Roi! Vive la Charte!"

The missile took effect, knocked off the officer's hat, and covered his forehead with a stream of blood. That instant the word was given to charge; and in a moment, we were driven down the Rue St Honoré in confusion and terror. My brother could not run so fast as I could, and at the corner of the Palais Royal, I found that he was left several yards behind, while the horses were close upon him. I instinctively started back to assist him, and seeing no other means, I seized a wine cask that stood at one of the doors, and rolled it with all my strength between him and the soldiers. The nearest gens-d'armes's horse, stopped in full course, stumbled and fell over the barrel. A loud shout of gratulation and triumph burst from the people; and turning in their flight, they discharged a shower of bricks and stones upon the advancing cavalry, which struck more than one horseman from his saddle, and afforded time for my brother and myself to join the rest, which we did amidst great cheering and applause, as the first who had actively resisted the military. Elated by the cheers, my brother entered with enthusiasm into the feelings of the multitude, while I felt as if I had committed a crime, in injuring men who were but doing their duty.

A temporary cessation of hostility now occurred between the people and the soldiery. The gens-d'armes established themselves in the Place du Palais Royal, some troops of the line took possession of the Rue St Honoré, and the mob occupied the end of the Rue de Richelieu, and the corners of the Rue Montpensier, where the new and incomplete buildings afforded plenty of loose stones, which were soon again used as missiles against the gens-d'armes. I would fain now have got away and returned home, but my brother would remain; and my companions, remembering the affair of the barrel, put me forward as a kind of leader; so that vanity joined with enthusiasm to make me continue, while the thought of Mariette came from time to time across my memory with a thrill of dispiriting anxiety. The next two hours passed all in tumult. The soldiers charged us several times, and we fled, but still returned to our position as they reassumed theirs. Many shots were fired, but few fell, and muskets, fowling-pieces, pistols, and swords began to appear amongst the crowd, while in one or two places I discerned the uniform of the National Guard, and two or three youths from the Polytechnic School. Darkness soon after this came on; the multitudes opposed to the soldiery were increasing every minute, and a cry began to run through the crowd, "To the gunsmiths' shops! To the gunsmiths' shops!" Instantly this suggestion was obeyed. We dispersed in a moment. Every gunsmith's shop in the neighbourhood was broken open, and almost before I was aware myself, I was armed with a double-barrelled gun and a brace of pistols, and provided with powder and ball. The shop from which these instruments of slaughter were procured was one at the end of the Rue de Vivienne, and as I came out, I paused to consider which way I should now turn. "Let us go to the Corps de Garde near the Exchange," cried one of the men who had been near me all the day. "Lead on, mon brave," he continued, laying his hand on my shoulder, "you shall be our captain." I looked round for my brother, but he was no longer there, and I followed the man's suggestion. As we went, by the advice of one of the Polytechnic School, we put out all the lamps, and spread the cry everywhere to do the same. It was now quite dark, and our number increased at every step as we advanced. Opposite the Corps de Garde, at the Bourse, a small body of soldiers was drawn up, and two or three torches were lighted. A warning to stand off! was given, as soon as the troops heard our approach, and as we still advanced, increasing our pace, a volley instantly followed. A ball whistled close by my ear and made me start, but I still rushed on; and the soldiers, seeing the multitude by which they were attacked, attempted to retreat into the guard-house. We were upon them, however, before the doors could be closed, and a terrific struggle took place, man to man. One strong fellow closed with me, and the strife between us soon grew for life. Our feet slipped, and we fell together, rolling over and over, wrapped, with a sort of convulsive fold, in each other's arms. All thought was out of the question; but suddenly getting one of my hands free, I brought the muzzle of a pistol close to my opponent's head, and fired. For an instant his fingers pressed more tightly round my throat—then every muscle was in a moment relaxed, and as I sprang up, he rolled backwards on the pavement. The fury of excitement was now upon me, and hearing some shots still ringing within the guard-house, I was rushing towards it, when I perceived the multitude pouring forth, and a thick smoke, with some flashes of flame, streaming from the windows. The guard-house was on fire, and in an instant the whole sky was in a blaze. I stood to look at it, for a moment, as the fire light flashed and flickered upon the dark and demon-like figures that surrounded the pile, and on the various dead bodies that lay in the open space the people had left, as in awe, between them and the destruction they had wrought. It was a fearful sight—sweet memories of peace and home rushed upon my brain—I shuddered at my own deeds, and turning from the whole vision of excited passion before my eyes, I ran as hard as I could to reach my home.

Oh never did I feel the thought of returning to the secure arms of her

I loved, so exquisite, as at that moment! and I flew up the stairs rather than ran. I opened the door and entered. Mariette was kneeling by the cradle of our child. She did not hear me come in. I pronounced her name. At first she made no reply; but then turned round with a face that will haunt me to the grave, and pointed to the cradle. I sprang forward and looked. There were traces of blood and bloody bandages strewn about, and round the poor infant's white and delicate shoulder were the compresses and dressings of a fresh wound.

"Good God, Mariette," I exclaimed, "how is this? How?"—"I heard firing in the streets," she answered, with an awful degree of calmness, "I feared for my husband—ran out to see; and not daring to leave it all alone, I took my child to death. I had scarcely gone a yard, when a shot struck it in my arms."

Through the whole of that dreadful night, Mariette and I sat by the cradle of our dying child—silent as the grave, with our eyes fixed upon its pale and ashy countenance, and hardly daring to lift our looks towards each other. From time to time it gave a faint and torturing cry, but in general, seemed in a panting sort of sleep, till towards four in the morning, when the breathing stopped, and I know not what grey shadow fell over its calm sweet face. I did not think it was dead; but Mariette threw her arms round my neck, and hid her eyes upon my bosom.

It was nearly mid-day on the Wednesday, when one of my companions came to tell me that the man who, it was reported, had been seen with me the day before, had been killed by a shot on the Boulevards, and I hastened after the messenger to ascertain the truth, for my brother had not yet reappeared. He led me to the door of the Exchange, over which the tri-coloured flag was now flying in triumph, but on each side of the gate was stretched a dead corpse, and the first I saw was indeed my brother. Rage and revenge took possession of my whole heart. I joined the brave men who were marching down to the Place de Greve; and from that moment, I entered into every act of the revolution, with all the enthusiasm, the zeal, the fury of the rest. It is needless to detail every scene I witnessed, and every struggle in which I shared. Suffice it, I was in most of those that occurred—at the taking and re-taking of the Hotel de Ville—at the storming of the Louvre, and at the capture of the Tuileries. The enthusiasm amongst us was immense and overpowering; and the moderation and heroism with which it was conducted, reconciled me fully to the revolution. From time to time, I ran home to soothe and console my poor Mariette, and to snatch a mouthful of bread, for our purse was now so low that we did not dare to purchase any thing else. Mariette ate little while I was there, but she assured me that she had plenty, and that she generally took something while I was gone in the middle of the day. Grief and anxiety had worn her sadly; the lustre had quitted hereye, and the rose had left her cheek; and she looked at me so sadly, so painfully, as I went away, that every time I determined it should be the last. At length the royal troops were beaten out of Paris, and the palace where monarchs had revelled fell into the hands of the people. A few of the National Guard and a few of the common people were selected, as to a post of high honour, to guard the Tuileries during the night, under the command of a student of the Polytechnic School. I was one of those fixed upon; and having sent, by a comrade, a message to Mariette, which he forgot to deliver, I remained for the night in those scenes of ancient splendour. There was something awfully melancholy in the solitary palace, and a feeling of compassion for the de-throned king grew over my heart as I sat in the midst of the magnificent halls that he might never see again. As soon as we were relieved the next morning, I flew to Mariette. She had passed a night of the most dreadful anxiety, my comrade having, as I have said, never delivered my message. Her eye was hollow and her cheek was sunk, but all seemed forgotten when she beheld me safe; and seeing me fatigued and faint, she made me eat some bread and drink a glass of water, almost weeping that she had not something better to give me.

As the last bit touched my lip, a vague thought struck me that she had had none herself, and I insisted on her telling me. She cast her arms round me, and assured me with a smile, that it did her more good to see me eat than to take any thing herself; but I at length drew from her that all our money was expended, and that she had not tasted any thing for two days.

I thought I should have gone distracted; and after remaining for a few minutes stupified as it were, I ran to the printing-house to see if I could get work, and induce the overseer to advance me a single franc to buy some bread for my poor Mariette. The office, however, was shut up, and I knocked in vain for admittance. I then turned to the lodging of one of my fellow-printers, who might lend me, I thought, even a few sous. I hurried up the narrow dirty staircase where he lived, and went into his room; but the sight I saw soon convinced me he wanted assistance as much as I did. He was sitting at an uncovered table, with five children of different ages about him. His cheek was wan and hollow; and as I entered, he fixed his haggard eye upon the door, while a little girl kept pulling him importunately by the arm, crying, "Give me a piece, papa—I will have a piece of bread." "Lend me a franc," cried he as soon as he saw me; "my children are starving—I will pay you when I get work."

I told him my own condition; but he burst forth in the midst, as if seized with a sudden frenzy, trembling with passion, and his eye glaring like that of a wild beast. "You are one of the revolutionists too. God's curse and mine upon you! See what your revolutions have brought! My children are starving—every artizan in Paris is beggared and unemployed. I am starving—my wife is dying for want of medicines in that bed—all these dear infants are famished; and all by your cursed revolutions! Out of my sight! Begone! for fear I commit a murder."

With a heart nearly breaking I returned home, and folding my poor Mariette in my arms, I gave way to tears, such as had never stained my cheeks before. She tried to soothe me—and smiled—and told me that really she was not hungry—that she did not think she could eat if she had any thing: but oh! I could not deceive myself. I saw famine on her cheek, and heard faintness in her tone; and after a long fit of thought, I determined to go to Monsieur V——, the great bookseller, who had been so kind to me while a boy. I told Mariette my errand, and as Paris was now nearly as quiet as ever, she willingly let me go.

It was a long way, and I had to cross the whole city, so that it was late when I arrived. Even then I found that Monsieur V—— was out; but the servant told me I could see him the following morning at nine. With this cold news I was forced to return; and no one can conceive what a miserable night I spent, thinking that every hour was an hour of starvation to the dear creature by my side. She lay very still, but she slept not at all, and I felt sure that the want of rest must wear her as much as hunger. When I rose, however, she seemed rather sleepy, and said she would remain in bed, and try for some repose, as she had not closed her eyes since Monday. It was too early to go to Monsieur V——, so I hurried first to the printing-office, for I hoped that the tranquillity which was now returning, might have caused Monsieur Manson to resume his usual business. I only found the porter, who told me that there was no chance of the house opening again for weeks at least, if not months, and with a chilled heart, I proceeded to the house of Monsieur V——.

Admission was instantly granted me, and I found the great bookseller sitting at a table with some written papers before him, on which he was gazing with an eye from which the spirit seemed withdrawn, to rest upon some deep absorbing contemplation within. He was much changed since I had seen him, and there were in his appearance those indescribable traces of wearing care, which often stamp, in legible characters, on the countenance, the misfortunes which man would fain hide from all the world. There was a certain negligence, too, in his dress, which struck me, but as he received me kindly, I told him all my sorrows, and all my wants.

As I spoke, his eyes fixed upon me with a look of painful and intense interest, and when I had done, he rose, closed the door, and took a turn or two thoughtfully in the room. "What has ruined you," said he at length, pausing before me, and speaking abruptly, "has ruined me. The revolution we have just past through has been great and glorious in its character, and all the world must look upon it with admiration; but it has made you and me, with hundreds, nay thousands, of others—beggars—ay, utter beggars. It is ever the case with revolutions. Confidence is at an end throughout the country, and commerce receives a blow that takes her centuries to recover. The merchant becomes a bankrupt—the artizan starves. I have now seen two revolutions, one bloody and extravagant, the other generous and moderate, and I do not believe that at the end of either of them, there was one man in all France who could lay his hand upon his heart and say, that he was happier for their occurrence; while millions in want and poverty, and millions in mourning and tears, cursed the day that ever infected them with the spirit of change.—To tell you all in one word: within an hour from this time I am a bankrupt, and I am only one of the first out of thousands. Those thousands employ each thousands of workmen, and thus the bread of millions is snatched from their mouths. I do not say that revolutions are always wrong; but I do say that they always bring a load of misery, especially to the laborious and working classes—and now leave me, good youth. There is a five-franc piece for you. It is all I can give you, and that, in fact, I steal from my creditors. I pity you from my soul, and the more, perhaps, because I feel that I need pity myself."

The five-franc piece he gave me, I took with gratitude and ecstasy. To me it was a fortune, for it was enough to save my Mariette. I hastened home with steps of light, only pausing to buy a loaf and a bottle of wine. I ran up stairs—I opened the door. Mariette had not risen. She slept, I thought—I approached quietly to the bed. All was still—too still. A faintness came over my heart, and it was a moment or two before I could ascertain the cause of the breathless calm that hung over the chamber. I drew back the curtain, and the bright summer sunshine streamed in upon the cold—dead—marble cheek of all that to me had been beautiful and beloved!

THE LATE CABINET.

PERHAPS in the records of this kingdom there have been three critical periods of trial since the Revolution of 1688-9, which might justify a thoughtful patriot, and not merely the factious intriguer, in reposing the burden of his anxieties upon purely personal considerations, and anchoring his final hopes upon the individual composition of the Cabinet. The Revolution, for itself, was a measure of that paramount character which transcended all distinctions of party: as we have repeatedly explained, in opposition to the false views of Mr Fox and others, that great consummate evolution of tendencies, which had long been silently ripening in the constitutional balance of forces, was the joint product of Whigs and Tories; and not by favour of circumstances or accident of position, as modern theorists have imagined, but in virtue of fundamental principles. Thus far was no room for a choice between an executive of Whigs or of Tories; seeing that, in this crisis, all turned upon the legislative body; and that they—no matter whether Whigs or Tories—went into this immortal measure with a perfect passion of fervid cordiality, one heart, and one soul; seeing also, that no recusants did, or could appear, without branding themselves as personal (not official) adherents of the king; (i. e. Jamesmen, or Jacobites,) and therefore, as ipso facto disavowing principles of any kind whatever, and audaciously professing even to sink the permanent rights of the crown in the fleeting interests of an individual. Here, then, in this first and greatest crisis subsequent to the formal establishment by name of the two parties, it was a matter of indifference which, or in what proportion both united, should hold the reins of administration. In the two wars, however, that followed, the last war of William III., and Queen Anne's war "of the succession," which were as essential a reaction from the English Revolution, and as indispensable ratifications (baptisms by fire and blood) of the Protestant succession in Great Britain, as the thirty years' war in Germany was the last seal of the Reformation and of the Protestant existence on the continent,—the preponderance of the Whigs had first become a sine qua non guarantee for the ultimate triumph of all which had been done. The Whigs of those days had two advantages: fidelity was for them a matter of necessity; they were pledged by their interests, as well as their principles, to the prosecution of the Revolution to its final results: no tampering was possible; whereas the Tories had still a locus penitentie left open with the fugitive king; and old connexions with the exiled court, opened a thousand avenues and a thousand disguises to a renewal of the intercourse. Secondly, as the Whigs were inevitably more single-minded and more consciously compromised as regarded their ends, so also they stood on vantage ground for most of the means. With them were the commanding talents for war—for diplomacy—for finance; but above all, that great organ of prosperity, without which the large foundations of William could not have been laid; that organ, under any drooping of which they would have been laid in vain, and Europe would have sighed hopelessly for that superstructure, and in those gigantic proportions, which Marlborough raised upon that noble foundation,—this organ, public credit, was wholly their creature. The banks, and national loans, were then, and in that service, first brought forward. These agencies were the growth of the Revolution, and of the Protestant interest; and reciprocally they soon became the most effectual guardians of that interest. From misconception on matters then so little understood by any body, and from the unfortunate position in which they stood towards the government, the Tories, and the old landed interest, looked with jealous and discouraging eyes upon these allies of our dearest interests. They occupied, in fact, the false position of the modern Whigs for the last forty years; and were the same narrow-minded and anti-national politicians that the Whigs have shewed themselves during the entire wars of the French Revolution. A Whig leader it was, in those days, that set the seal to the English revolution, by that immortal march, or rather eagle's flight, upon the Danube, which in one day's work withered the military pride of France, and unravell'd the whole web of her policy—trampling on all that had been reared by the counsels of Richelieu or by the sword of Turenne. But even this great captain was indebted for half his triumph to a Whig Treasurer and a Whig Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, going “cap in hand” through the city of London, personally soliciting and canvassing for each L.100, and backing the security of the state by municipal, or even by private countersigns—manifesting, in fact, for the noblest of causes, the address—the suppleness, almost, if one might venture to say it, the shuffling and the evasiveness of a Jewish money-changer—by such means compensated in zeal whatever was wanting in strength to the yet infant immaturity of the national system of finances. The persons, therefore, the very individuals, as well as the principles, of those illustrious Whig administrators, who directed the policy of William, and the first ten years of his successor, seem to have been indispensable to the prosperous management of that great conflict upon which Europe was thrown by the British revolution. And this judgment, sufficiently sustained by the Parliamentary conduct of the Tories, during the twenty and odd years of their opposition to government, is placed beyond all question by the four memorable years during which female caprice, dotage, and their own intrigues, called them to the possession of power. What a scenical display of national humiliation! And difficult it is to say, whether each separate year, and the several parts of our foreign policy in progress, or the general winding up of the whole in the treaty of Utrecht, most signally proclaim the critical necessity to our affairs of the early Whigs at the period following the Revolution. Blenheim and Utrecht! “Into what depth thou seest, from what height fallen!” And, indeed, from the very enormity of the transition, may be derived a plausible palliation for the Tories. Were it not, we hear an objector saying, for the dazzling supremacy* of the Somerses, the Godolphins, and the Marlboroughs, by comparison with ministers of less immoderate splendour, and making allowances for its own internal dissensions, the cabinet of Queen Anne's last years would not have been thought a feeble one. But in reality, a juster sentiment suggests, that this very juxtaposition and immediate succession to the administration of Marlborough, ought to operate rather in the way of aggravation than of palliation. For undoubtedly the policy of Harley benefited more in substance by the immediate heirship of influence and consideration, bequeathed by six or seven campaigns of unbroken triumph, than it could by any possibility have suffered under the unfavourable judgments of men from the disadvantages of contrast. Whosoever succeeded to Marlborough, though he were weaker than Sporus, that man inherited Blenheim; so much was clear: and there was a dowry ample enough for a title of rejuvenescence to a superannuated empire, and for giving one generation of borrowed power and influence to a cabinet, in its own pretensions the feeblest or least aspiring. Without some violent effort of retarding force, the mere impetus of the acquired motion, long after the moving power should be withdrawn, was evidently adequate to sustain an appearance of energy and progress in the government. What was the retarding force in Lord Oxford's administration, it is more and more difficult, as the curtain is more and more raised upon those times, to express by one word. But it is evident, after all allowances for a distracted choice, that a very principal element of that force was—incompetence, and deficiency in moral elevation, to face the service of his times. He was not on a level with his duties; in talents even, un-

* It is remarkable that Lord Bolingbroke, by the testimony of all his contemporaries who could be considered fine judges on such a question, was the most brilliant of the brilliant. Yet, in some unaccountable way, either he was neutralized by his hated associate in power, or he neutralized himself; for he never shone except to those who saw him or who heard him.

less it were for caballing, he was below the occasion. But much more than that, he was unsound in heart. He did not even perceive, nor would he have cared if he had perceived, that the stake played for in the wars of Europe during the next quarter of a century succeeding to the Revolution, was the Protestant succession in name, and virtually, therefore, the security of the Protestant interest throughout the world. In reality, this was the last of the wars which Popery has attempted for recovering her supremacy; a line of Popish princes on the throne of Great Britain, together with the active bigotry of Louis XIV. in his later years, having revived the last gleams of a hope which had else sunk below the provisions of the peace of Westphalia. Had, therefore, Lord Oxford, or any other man as little alive to the true grandeur of the interests at stake, presided in the early part of the period in question, we may conjecture the amount of general evil which he would have effected by that which he did effect, even in its four last years, when his course had been in a great measure effectually predetermined by the potent policy of his predecessors, and his range of mischief proportionately narrowed.* Burke has very emphatically described the fervor, almost, we might say, the agony, of zeal with which the otherwise phlegmatic William, surmounting victoriously the depressions of a sinking constitution, laboured, in conjunction with the noblest of his English counsellors, to raise the nation up to his own level, and to the level of that great crisis which, during the two last years of his life, he saw advancing upon Europe. If he, if Burke, were right in their several appreciations of that crisis, then it cannot be denied, that a personal importance attached to any ministry capable of meeting it, and that the individual characters of the predominant ministers between 1689 and 1710, may be counted amongst the providential blessings of that period.

From that time up to the French Revolution, an interval of 78 years, no capital interest of Europe was brought into conflict within the sphere of cabinets. Great men appeared occasionally on the stage of nations; great powers and accomplishments were displayed; great questions even were debated and fought for; but not those paramount questions, which, accordingly as they are well or ill conducted, seem likely to retard the very progress of society, or to carry it forward with accelerated pace. The vast explosion of the French Revolution, and the consequent convulsion of all European states, first in our days developed a condition of danger, and a ferment of public feeling, which gave an almost terrific importance to the personal qualities of the existing cabinet. Had Mr Pitt, Mr Dundas, and Mr Thomas Grenville, happened to die at that crisis, we know not by what course of substitutions, under the reckless and anti-national bearing of those into whose hands the power would naturally have fallen, that crusade against jacobinism could have been evoked, or the energies of the national character combined, for those great results which the mere salvation of Europe demanded. And, in reality, all depended for a time upon the leading of one man. Mr Burke, on whom devolved the functions of Peter the Hermit, was doubtless a herald and an organizer of this sacred conspiracy—greater than the greatest cause could reasonably expect. But, as an efficient leader, he wanted rank; and he was at the end of his career. So that on Mr Pitt's single life the total burden of hope, with which the cause of anti-jacobinism was freighted, at one time rested. The same loyalty to the demands of the crisis—the same stern integrity—the same disinterested honour, which had distinguished the foremost ministers of William and of Anne, in contrast with the most eminent of their opponents, marked out Mr Pitt as the great servant of his age and country. He obeyed the appeal of Europe with perfect fidelity and singleness of purpose; and though he was called away from us in the very thickest darkness of the storm, just half-way between its opening and its glorious catastrophe, yet he had by that time provided for the necessities of the public service by the formation and training of a cabinet, which, though neither having nor needing his powers, was yet sufficiently prepared to comprehend the sanctity of their own mission, to appreciate Mr Pitt's policy of unrelenting war with jacobinism and its monstrous progeny, and finally to pursue that policy with honesty and vigour.

* At first sight it may seem too much of a refinement for the absolute realities of practice, but unquestionably there are strong grounds for believing that, over and above more directly treasonable purposes, which afterwards governed the unsteady policy of Lord Oxford, he had really the wish continually before his mind to depreciate the war services of his predecessors by the treaty in which they terminated. Naturally, and in the regular course of causes and effects, every treaty of peace stands in the relation of an index of value—a criterion—or exponent of profit—to the war which it closes. And though this can never be true except by approximation, even where the same or equal talents and equal zeal have been applied to the war and to the treaty, yet there is always a presumption of some broad proportion between the two services in the same period of time. And to this natural presumption Lord Oxford seems to have intrusted the inference, that a war could not, on the whole, have been very splendidly managed, which could justify a treaty of Utrecht.

It was almost frightful that so much stress should lie upon a single life, that a mere personal question should carry with it such mighty results for good and evil, as had been the case in Mr Pitt's instance at one period of his life. As the poet, looking upon the English Channel, at Dover, felt it to be almost a terrific reflection, at the height of Napoleon's desolations, that in such "a span of waters" lay our sole separation from that dark empire of evil principles; something of the same awe fell at one time upon the politician when reflecting that, laying together the whole circumstances, one frail life was all that divided us from regicide and triumphant jacobinism. Under the policy opposed to Mr Pitt's, had that gained the ascendancy, England would not only have been infected in her own population, but would have become a party to the extensive propagation of evil. As it was, she both saved herself, and became the chief bulwark of others. Mr Pitt's, therefore, was the second case in which the choice of a good cabinet was narrowed, or rather strictly determined, by purely personal considerations. But a third case arose within the year succeeding to his death, and in behalf of those very disciples of his school who inherited his policy, and might, as statesmen, be regarded in the light of his direct lineal representatives. Every body knows the value which belonged to the Peninsular struggle in the series of means for shattering the power of Bonaparte. It acted in two ways: First, By disenchanting the prostrate world from the spells of French military prowess;—the day at Baylen, and consequent surrender of Dupont's army, the brilliant actions at Vimiera and Roleia gave a shock to all Europe which disabused them of their timid prepossessions; from that shock Bonaparte never recovered. Secondly, The Spanish war it was, and the aceldama which it provided for the French military levies, which made the hideous ruins of the Moscow campaign irreparable. The flight from Moscow would even have been arrested at Smolensko, and its carnage effaced in a week, had it not been for the Peninsula, which locked up at all times a quarter of a million of men. The Spanish war, therefore, was the apparent means, under Heaven, by and through which Europe retrieved her station, her dignity, and her hopes. Such being its value, we can appreciate the claims of those two parties between whom it became the chief point of contest whether any war of that name, or, at least, of that magnitude and character, should ever exist. Had the Whigs prevailed—had the Fox and Grenville administration continued to direct the policy of England through 1807 and 1808—no Spanish war would have been made available to the service of Europe; starved of British supplies in money and arms, but, above all, defrauded of the military aid from this country which, as regarded the open campaigns between regular armies, was pretty nearly the sole reliance of Spain and Portugal for presenting a continued front of resistance in the field; it is as certain as any one conclusion can be from merely human premises, that nothing more than a desultory Guerilla warfare, computed by most judges* as adequate for the neutralizing of about 50,000 French troops, could have been sustained, and probably not that beyond a term of two years. It is also well known to many politicians, that, at a domestic crisis subsequent to the commencement of the Peninsular war, when it seemed every way probable that the Whigs would come again into power, the most positive assurances were circulated on their part, that every man of the English army would be brought home from the frontiers of Spain; ostensibly for the preservation of "so many valuable lives:" but really and truly to save the credit of the too flagrant Whig predictions of inevitable ruin to our arms when matched against Napoleon. This was familiarly known at the time; but apart from direct positive testimony, every man who remembers the Whig mode of dealing with our foreign policy, and the passionate violence with which they reiterated one uniform doctrine of the hopelessness of all resistance to Napoleon except by sea, must be satisfied that mere shame would have compelled them to act upon the policy they had advocated with so much loss of character in the nation. Consistency, if nothing else, and the mortification of adopting the very line of conduct marked out by their opponents, would have obliged them to such a course. Besides which, though it is very true that the intemperance of opposition had carried them farther than they designed, and their own violence had pledged them to consequences which they had soon reason to regret deeply—it is also true, that from the long habit of cherishing an admiration for a man whom they viewed as a thorn in the side of their antagonists, and from originally servile constitution of mind, the Whigs did undoubtedly share themselves in that panic which they laboured so zealously to diffuse: they were of the genus attonitorum; and their prostrate reverence of the French power long survived its object. At their hands, therefore, we repeat that no Peninsular war could have been obtained. And hence it follows, that the men who were at issue with the Whigs on this capital question, were then personally indispensable to their country and their age. This was the third case of that nature. Does a fourth exist at present?

Those times are gone. New interests have succeeded: other questions are agitated—other hopes—and "other palms are won." The men are gone who then vexed and cursed the earth; those are gone also who delivered it, or most of them. But our own troubles have arisen for our own generation: who is it that shall face them in the Cabinet? A new and mighty revolution in France has given a shock to the remotest realms; much more then to this great kingdom, so keen and quick in political sympathy, and related to her as an emulous competitor, and as virtually the nearest of her neighbours. Old questions among ourselves are revived accordingly with a heat commensurate to the stir and ferment of the revolutionary times and neighbourhood. Great difficulties of a financial kind blend with these political troubles. The existing administration, estimated by those even who view the times with too much awe—too much solemnity of feeling to have a thought left for faction and its low regards,—does not inspire the confidence which could sustain the nation under its anxieties. Their recent conduct has increased the general distrust. People without party know not which way to turn, or whither to direct their hopes. A general distraction of feeling exists, aided by the utter dissolution of party ties consequent upon the political death of Lord Liverpool. The king's speech powerfully promotes the public ferment. The insurrectionary movements grow more and more alarming. And in the midst of the general confusion, the Wellington Cabinet is suddenly and decisively overthrown, in a manner which, whilst it satisfies our sense of justice, offers no prospect of permanent advantage, unless the opportunity can be improved for recomposing a new administration, strong enough and honest enough to face the necessities of the age. Have we the materials for such a ministry? Are we now in a fourth crisis corresponding to the three we have described? That is to say, are there any men, who, either for qualities purely personal, (as might be said of Mr Pitt,) or as the sole remaining representatives of a party that have not betrayed its principles, may be looked upon as indispensable at this time to the public service?—What answer can be given to this question by men who, with a single and exclusive regard to the public interests, know also and confess the value of party combinations, and would be glad to find any constitutional party surviving the late wrecks of principle, presuming one condition only, that it should be a party not pledged to some measure of ruinous reform?

* Col. Napier, who, however otherwise acute, is blinded by his prejudices on this occasion, and grossly contradicts himself in arguing the value of the Guerrilla service, estimates the amount of French troops that might be supposed neutralized by the whole of the Guerrillas through Spain, according to our recollection, at 40,000 men.

Not to speak invidiously, we will not undertake to deny that there are individuals who stand in that relation to the public service, which our question presumes. But any sufficient body of such men to make up an effective ministry, and that shall at the same time have such a determinate personal superiority, (Mr Pitt's case,) or superiority of position, (the case of his successors,) as to exclude all competition, we fear it would be vain to look for. The case, however, as we have described it above, has returned upon us in one half of the former precedents: but it is the unpropitious half. If there are no men, or body of men, whose presence is indispensable to the public service, there are some whose absence (to say the least) is highly desirable: and as preponderant members of the new cabinet, we may go so far as to say that their absence is indispensable. At the same time, we frankly confess that these are the very men who have the best chance for coming in. The persons we mean are the Whigs. And they will themselves feel that we speak with no offensive purpose, when we add our reason. It is this:—the old arguments for excluding the Whigs, strong and insurmountable as they were in that day, are departed with the system of things to which they referred. Others may have arisen; but on these we do not dwell. One overruling argument applies to this time. Reform in Parliament, formerly a hopeless speculation, is now adopted strenuously, as the favourite measure of the times. Reforms might be devised of a character to do no harm; but these are not what is sought. In any sense in which reform would satisfy those who clamour for it, we view it as the most dangerous scheme that ever has been agitated. In connexion with the Ballot, which also is demanded by the majority, it will practically overthrow the constitution; and a sweeping, agrarian revolution will inevitably follow within two or three years. Now, it is true that the great Whig aristocrats, the territorial nobility, have precisely the same interests in resisting such reform, as those of the same rank who happen to be Tories. Lord Fitzwilliam, Lord Spencer, Lord Lansdown, Lord Grosvenor, Sir W. W. Wynne, or the Duke of Devonshire, we presume, would as little like to see their borough interest, or their county interest, destroyed, as the Duke of Newcastle or Rutland, Lord Lonsdale, or Lord Harewood. But, however they might behave, there are several Whigs, with no such interests at stake, who are pledged to the question; and an influential post in the administration might furnish them with means for carrying it. On this ground, we should look at any Whig cabinet, unbalanced by men of opposite views, as peculiarly ominous at this particular crisis: though, on other considerations, the nation would, perhaps, prefer such a composition of the ministry as would give some chance for re-moulding the shattered parties into something like their ancient form.

Beyond the one absolute disqualification we have mentioned, viz. the being pledged to reform in a dangerous shape, or a shape not accurately limited, we know of no other; but that one is so urgent at this time, that if there should be found any man or party that would as resolutely oppose all reforms that were not of a temperate and constitutional character, as others will support them, we should be disposed to think that this man, or his party, would have the same advantage of position over their antagonists at the present crisis of revolutionary clamour, as the Tories, who would fight, had, during 1807—15, over the craven Whigs who would not. In such a case, a fourth instance would be realized, in addition to the three we have recorded, where there was a personal call for a particular set of men. But, as we are not aware of such a set, acting in concert with each other, we take it for granted, that, with the single reservation we have stated for the class of desperate reformers, all other statesmen on the public arena are open to the public choice, with recommendations varying in every possible degree, but none absolutely disqualified, as were Mr Pitt's opponents, by their anti-national doctrines.

Amongst these, therefore, the ejected ministers will have their titles to plead as well as others. A ministry will probably be so formed as to exclude them: but it is also possible, though much less likely, that an arrangement may be made comprehensive enough to take in some fragments of that party. We do certainly not expect to see the Duke of Wellington ever returning to office. Age and disgust will indispose him to come forward again in a character of which he now understands the difficulties, and the vexatious embarrassments. Sir Robert Peel, however, sooner or later, is sure to creep back into office; his habits of business, and plain—practical good sense—will always find a ready and full appreciation: and as to any scruples of party or principle in receiving his alliance, those have perished; and, except Mr Canning, nobody has so much aided in destroying them as himself.—Considered in this light, as candidates for office in some future arrangement, the late ministers became doubly interesting to us in their character of persons violently dispossessed of office. The reasons for the past become important to the future. They are still nominally Tories, and partially they are really such. It would, therefore, be satisfactory to know what part of their conduct it is which has really led to their overthrow: because, in that way, we might ascertain how far they can be relied on in any cabinet having it as a chief object to promote Tory measures; and, above all, to resist those revolutionary schemes of reform which will now come forward every year in greater abundance, and in more violent forms. We cannot dissemble that, spite of the past, and though we had ceased (with every body else, we suppose) to put faith in the strength of their integrity, or firmness of their principles, we did rely a good deal on three qualities in the late Cabinet, all of which seemed pledges for their resistance to the violent reformers. These qualities were—good sense, moderation, and firmness. This last, degenerating too often into obstinacy, seemed peculiarly to characterise the Duke of Wellington; the two others seemed at one time the common property of the Cabinet, making some allowances in two or three instances. Hence we cannot deny, that though pleased, (as all were,) on a general principle of retribution, at hearing of their fall, we could not but feel it too probable, that, setting aside all personal feelings, the great cardinal interests of the public, as bound up with the maintenance of the Constitution, might suffer by their loss of power. At the same time it must be granted, that our confidence, as well in their good sense and their moderation, as in their firmness, has been shaken a good deal by the indiscretions of their Parliamentary conduct through one fortnight of this month. With what reason, will best appear from a short survey of the most important topics in the King's speech, in connexion with the ministerial comments and explanations.

The questions of the Regency and the Civil List, though important, are less so than their names imply. The subjects are important no doubt; but the questions, which can be raised upon them, are limited. The regency in particular has been so "bolted," winnowed, and sifted, on former occasions, (1751, and the several bills and modifications of bills, through the long reign of George III.)—the constitutional casuistry of the question has been so thoroughly exhausted—the rights of individuals are so notorious, and so vigilantly protected by the Press, by Parliament, by the nation, that the widest range of possible differences between party and party is narrowed to a trifle. None but a professed alarmist can imagine any danger from that quarter beyond the stormy intrigues incident to a female minority and a female regency, with the sequel of a long female reign. One difficulty indeed besets the present case, of a very anomalous kind. Casulists in points of state difficulty have long been aware, that, in the singular contingency of a Queen Consort declaring herself enceinte on the demise of the crown, a very embarrassing dilemma arises:—On the one hand the crown is never in abeyance, not for a moment. In England, as in France, the cry is, and must be, "The Sovereign is dead: Long live the Sovereign!" But then, on the other hand, in this case who is the sovereign? It is not even known whether any at all will be born; for the queen-dowager may be delivered of a still-born child. Again, it is still less known whether the heir in contingency will prove a king or a queen. And according to all the analogies from our law regulating the succession to real property, in such a case the heir-presumptive has absolute rights, which, as regards the privileges of royalty, would make a most intractable collision with the rights of the contingent heir. Certainly the case is difficult; and it is also without precedent in England; consequently without provision. However, it is happily an improbable, though a possible, event. The continued duration of his present Majesty's life, if the general prayer of his subjects should be granted, will put an end to such an anticipation. In the worst result, it will be dealt with by Parliament according to the best lights which the analogies of our laws furnish. On this question only, the late ministers have satisfied the nation. Was it in their power to have done otherwise?

As to the Civil List, that subject comes before us under far greater incitements—provocations, we might say—to agitating dissensions. Seldom have we been compelled to such profound moral disapprobation of the whole course pursued by the Government. And though it is unquestionable that an opposition to the Duke of Wellington's administration, growing out of much deeper and more important grounds of indignation, was in fact what made this particular ground available for its dissolution; yet even upon this single and insulated topic we might take our stand,—and if our sense of expedience altogether coincided with our sense of justice, we could ensure ourselves a general sympathy in expressing an undivided satisfaction on the late ministerial defeat, taken in connexion with the prominent occasion of it. The moral sense is shocked, the just pride of the public mind is affronted, and the homeliest discretion is outraged by the line of argument taken by Sir Robert Peel, and afterwards* by Mr Goulburn. A system of delusion, which could not impose upon a child of five years' growth, plainly and obstinately advanced with the avowed purpose of perplexing this most enlightened nation, who, by means of the reports, must be presumed present at the whole of the debate—and an attentive party to the whole principle and items of the plot upon itself. As the reporters, or some of them at least, gave a very confused and incoherent account of what Sir Robert Peel really meant in first urging this logic of mystification, we shall in one sentence explain it fully to those who may have missed the two debates. Sir Robert then urged, seriously, by way of justifying the studied confusion of the Civil List, and the assembling under one head of provision many different services, having little or no connexion, that, supposing the Civil List to cover the royal household and personal expenses with a strict exclusion of every other charge—it would always be possible for disaffected

* This line of argument was much used and relied upon in the second debate by Mr Goulburn, and was in consequence treated as his exclusively in the attacks of a morning paper. But the truth was, that Sir Robert Peel had first brought it forward in the original debate when the resolutions were first proposed, and the subject first opened to the House.

persons to assign the exact sum, £400,000, or £450,000, which the nation paid for royalty, and to use it as one of the commonplaces in the rhetoric of sedition, for sharpening and converging the attention upon the particular disadvantages of monarchy in a contrast with republican simplicity. Whereas, in the present confusion of accounts, a standing contradiction was open to the loyal subject, in the known fact, that the general vote of a million, or thereabouts, provided for many branches of the public service, that must continue to exist even in a republic—such as the allowances of judges, ambassadors, &c. Now, considering that the Civil List has been thrown into a distinct classification of its items since the time of Mr Burke's reforms, that is, for sixty years back, as things stand at present, the seditious haranguer already possesses that power which Sir Robert professed to intercept; he can draw the line as sharply as he pleases, even at present, between a King of England and a President of the United States, or Columbia; this he can do at any rate, with no more light than Mr Goulburn allows us: and unfortunately, from the darkness which Sir Robert patronizes, and the mystery which now envelops the Civil List, he can just double the mischievous impression which the facts of the case allow: when no unfriendly critic is at hand to expose his misstatements, the public documents certainly warrant him in taking credit for the whole million as an appropriation to the king's household. And this at least is a delusion that he never could have attempted, had that separation of the public services existed, which Sir

Robert was opposing. On the other hand, in the very worst case, he could make his retreat into that exclusively regal allowance, which Sir Robert supposes it so necessary to muffle and mantle by a voluminous drapery of irrelevant provisions, pretty much as some ciphers (in the age of cryptical letter-writing) proceeded on the principle of enveloping the true and significant part of the letter in a world of impertinence. The truth is, and it cannot be disguised, that the House of Commons and the nation have not witnessed, without indignation, the attempt to enlist their loyal enthusiasm to the throne and the constitution in the service of a "job:" for though the word be ugly, that is the true description of a Civil List brought forward in this shape, (no matter with what advantages of ancient precedent,) and scandalously supported by appeals to the patriotic feeling of men as in a question between the constitution on the one hand, and sedition on the other.* It will not, and it cannot come to good—that at a time when the true friends of social order, and of our admirable establishments, more than ever before need the whole benefit of character, pure hands, and freedom from suspicion, grave and responsible servants of the king should attempt by a juggle to tie up the freedom of Parliament through an entire reign, and to disarm a wise minister, if such should arise, for all attempts at propitiating the democracy by the reforms in this part of our expenditure where reforms may really be found practicable.

The King's name was most iniquitously introduced; his interest is not the one which is truly at stake. The object of the opening of every reign is to be in under the King's wing, and in the moments of enthusiasm which greet the first accession of every prince, all and each of those classes amongst the receivers of public money, whose appointments are open to doubt and question. The ambassadors, we are told, are the King's representatives at foreign courts: their outfits are, in fact, the King's outfits, and so forth. Therefore they form part, in an extended sense, of the King's household; and their appointments must be provided for in the civil list. But so also are the roads the King's highways. And the ships of war are his Majesty's ships. Yet these and other departments are, and will be, kept separate from the civil list. Why? Because, with respect to those there is no disposition to shrink from public enquiry. But the pension list, the appointments of foreign ministers, and other sources of valuable patronage, which are most sensitively alive to the anxieties and perils of scrutiny—these are regularly locked up from all action upon their detail of the public mind by a hasty vote which pledges the nation for an indefinite extent of time. Periodically thrown open to enquiry by a constitutional necessity, they are instantly restored to a long repose, and a total immunity from that surveillance which haunts and vexes all other parts of the public service.

* Sir Robert was as unfortunate in his illustrations as in his argument. He produced one of the inflammatory hand-bills, now circulated in London, which represented the Marquis of Bute as receiving £50,000 a-year of the public money. Now this is a blank falsehood, and serves but ill to illustrate the mischiefs of publishing the truth. Were the pension list made as public as the items of the civil list even now are under every attempt to perplex them, it would then be impossible to circulate falsehoods of this magnitude with any hope of deluding the people extensively. The fact is, that here, as elsewhere, omne ignotum pro magifico. And the bishops, and many of the temporal peers, are at this time grievous sufferers by the ignorance which prevails on the money value of their appointments. In default of any true knowledge, incendiary reformers publish the most hyperbolical exaggerations of their profits. Witness the case of the Bishops of Durham, Winchester, and London.

We have said, however, that the practical questions which arise upon the civil list, properly or improperly so called, are limited. Undoubtedly they are so. Whatever may be the wishes in some classes of our population, no part of those who are likely (we trust) to obtain much weight in the House of Commons, cherish any desire to dismantle the Crown, or any branch of the national service which represents at home or abroad our civil grandeur as a nation, of any plumage that can add real grace or distinction to the objects of public favour and privilege. We speak the wishes of the sober-minded and moderate among the faithful supporters of the crown and its dignity, when we say that the following reformations would give entire satisfaction, without prejudice to vested interests, or to any just claim upon the public gratitude:—

First, that the statement of the accounts, in this department more even than in any other, may not be specially addressed to the purpose of deceit, but above all, to the purpose of throwing difficulties in the way of enquiry. One part of a salary is charged upon one fund, another part upon another fund; one part is quartered upon the English, another upon the Irish civil list; and these, with some half dozen more of senseless artifices, unworthy of a paternal government in its dealings with an affectionate people, have this effect beyond every other, that they prevent all unity of view or comprehensive survey from any one station that can be taken. What the Greeks call τὸ συνωστῆναι, or facility of combination into one point of view—is a matter of great importance in overlooking intricate accounts; and this it is one main purpose of the Civil List, as now presented, to evade:

Secondly, that all charges of the same class should be brought together under the same head, stated explicitly for what they are, and not dislocated. The House of Commons is told that the Pension List amounts to L.74,000; and the case is regarded by some, and debated by all, on that footing. Afterwards, when that part of the general question is disposed of, in some obscure nook a discovery is made of L.40,000 for the very same service on the Irish establishment, and L.25,000 on the Scottish; as though the government which administered those branches of patronage were distinct from the English. Members are ashamed to avow that they had overlooked items so important; and thus the burden is viewed, so far as it attracts any notice at all, under half its pressure. But a far more impressive instance of this plan for breaking the strength of the impression, by separating and distracting the parts under review, is to be found in the practice with regard to arrears at each demise of the crown. The country is hardly aware, that, in fact, a sum of more than L.50,000 per annum, beyond the parliamentary allowance, through the whole of the last century, has been, in a manner, settled upon the crown by itself. For the uniform practice, with one solitary exception, has been to apply to Parliament, at the beginning of each reign, for a vote of money in liquidation of arrears contracted during the course of the preceding reign.* In that way, a sum amounting to upwards of five millions will be found to have been voted during any period of 100 years, calculated either from the beginning or the end of Queen Anne's reign. Now, when it is recollected, that the particular part of the Civil List upon which these arrears arose, was that which regarded the royal household, (i. e. the three first heads in the present distribution,) and that this part of the total allowance did not much exceed L.400,000, it will be found, on review, that the crown assumed to itself an extra allowance of about 14 per cent throughout the whole of the last century.

We do not contend that this allowance was too much. Without specific enquiry, minute knowledge of the royal establishments, and a continual revisal of the whole estimates, under the varying value of money, no considerate man would attempt to fix either a maximum or a minimum for such a case. But undoubtedly it ought not, in the smallest proportion, to have been taken in that irregular way; and, above all, if the necessity existed, Parliament ought to have contemplated it from the first, and not to have continually deceived the nation by assigning a fixed income, which served no purpose of really fixing the expenditure.

But far beyond even this source of delusion to the nation, and all other arrears in other quarters of the royal family, have been the palaces. Here, as in so many hundreds of cases besides, we have an illustration of that inaccuracy of understanding in Mr Brougham, which, employed for ever in seeking topics for sarcasm and censure, uniformly blunders on the true subject of blame, or misdirects its application. How many sneers have we had from his quiver on this question of palaces! And even the grave has proved no screen from his unforgetting wrath. Yet, the late King was, by comparison, but little to blame. Ornamental building fell within that reasonable encouragement to the fine arts, which belonged to his station; to see that it did not exceed the just limits, and to have given it a more discreet direction, fell properly within the province of Parliament. How many ungracious rebukes, to say nothing of some harsh acts, within the House of Commons, have lent a bolder tone to disaffection without, which a few prospective measures of practical good sense would have evaded! Contrast the spectacle of Louis XIV. building sumptuous palaces, under the continual correction of his ministers' experience; or the grandfather of Louis using Sully as the controller of his architects' bills, with that of George IV. surrendered into the hands of private artists, each having his own ends to serve, and no interference from any powerful quarter being supposed warrantable, unless after some lavish expenditure. The fault, we repeat, was not in the King, but in the House of Commons. Instead of being reduced to stop the supplies suddenly in the midst of unfinished work, they ought uniformly to have placed all money voted for such purposes, under the management of select commissioners—some of them well qualified by knowledge of the fine arts, and others by knowledge of the world and practical business—with instructions to deal liberally with the King, but in concert with him to compass two objects; first, to conduct his buildings or alterations in a style that might do honour to the country, and raise them into national works; and, secondly, to save him from the hands of rapacious agents. In Eug-

* The single exception to this established usage is the case of George IV., who has left no arrears. This will be ascribed by the candid insulters of his memory to the shortness of his reign, in connexion with the unusual magnitude of the Civil List, which ran beyond L.1,200,000. But the reign is to be viewed as a short one, chiefly by comparison with the enormous one of his father. And then, for the magnitude of the Civil List, that was swollen mainly in those branches which did not regard the King's household.

land, it is notorious that even private gentlemen are seldom able to contend with success against the estimates of interested architects and capability-mongers. The policy pursued by such people is that of the lowest attorneys in seducing farmers, or others of that rank, into suits at law. The first step, under all the baits of novelty, is soon gained: the royal speculator is committed: to go back is impossible without immense loss. The oily artist has his compliments to the royal taste in one pocket, and his specious plans of economy in the other. He has procured marble direct from the Italian quarries, without paying the London merchant's commission. He will sell the old materials at high prices. And by thousands of other tricks, which it costs the labour of a committee to expose when all is too late, he dupes a prince—as he would probably have duped a more experienced person. Inexperience in such affairs is fit and becoming in a king of this country; and, with suitable provisions on the part of Parliament, it would not be mischievous. Without such provisions it is idle and unjust to complain of profusion in the king. Such, however, has hitherto been the course: and what is the result? Taking all items of building, un-building, furnishing, ornamenting grounds, &c. a sum of perhaps considerably more than twenty millions has been granted by Parliament in the one hundred years between 1730 and 1830: and, with the exception of Windsor Castle, which is pretty much what it was at the beginning of this period, for any thing which appeals to the public eye, we have absolutely nothing, in a national sense, to shew for it. How irritating for a great nation to look back upon such abuses of its generosity, and to know, that sums, which in the hands of a Sir Christopher Wren, would have raised up one of the glories of the earth, have been absolutely trifled away, in mere caprices of pulling down, throwing square things into round, round into square! Within the last six years, no less than three palaces have been pulled down, the king's villa in Windsor Park, Carlton Palace, and Buckingham House. Two of these have been swept away finally, and carted off as rubbish, after costing the nation beyond a million of money: and one of them had even more signally proclaimed the folly of the Royal advisers in its erection* than in its demolition. But one fact on this painful subject speaks volumes. After half a million of money had been spent on the new and yet unfinished Buckingham House, (we call it by its old name,) after the inventive talents of the architect had been cramped and overruled by the volunteer plan of retaining the outside shell, and after the king's peculiar wishes had been sacrificed to the same senseless principle, accident suggested to a member of the Committee appointed by the House of Commons this question,—Supposing that the old plan had been entirely abandoned, and a free range for the architect's skill had been obtained by totally destroying the walls, what addition would that have made to the cost? The answer was, “ten thousand pounds” at the utmost. Now, the total estimate of good judges for completing the palace was one million at the least; so that here again, as in so many former cases, an ocean of profusion, that might at least have terminated in giving the nation something to be proud of as a public building, is defeated and neutralized by an act of the most childish and inconsistent parsimony in the outset. If to this anecdote were added others equally well established in the secret history of George III.'s creations at Kew, the late King's at Brighton, &c. &c., it might truly be said that the very stones cry out

* With such rash haste is every thing of that nature undertaken in England, that in planning the domain and precincts of Carlton House, no provision was made for that privacy which is among the mere decencies of a royal household. The late Princess Charlotte of Wales, when walking in the gardens of that palace with the Prince of Orange, then standing on the footing of a lover, was suddenly shocked by discovering a group of chambermaids at the open windows of the adjoining houses, watching her motions, and speculating on the Royal fashion of making love. On the other front of the palace, matters were far worse.

against the folly of our public expenditure in this department. And the issue is this: after an expenditure, which the nations of the continent would hear with their hair on end, except for their internal decorations, we have not a palace worth shewing to a foreigner; and the first servant of the East India Company is lodged at Calcutta in a palace, to which the very numerous palaces of the King of England would not form menial offices of proportionate splendour. And the blame lies, we repeat again and again, in the false delicacy and the negligence of the House of Commons.* The nation expects that this system of folly should at last be reformed; and that whether nominally annexed or not to the consideration of the Civil List, it should be treated as virtually connected with that department of our civil economy, and remodelled with a reference to that subject in its total bearings.

Thirdly, It is undoubtedly the wish of the nation, with respect to the king's household itself, that some reforms should be made in a spirit adapted to the age. With every provision for splendour, it is certainly advisable, in placing that establishment upon a new basis, to abolish all superannuated offices and functions growing out of the feudal manners, in which the present arrangement originated. Another consideration of the same tendency should be kept in view:—Every body acquainted with parliamentary history must remember Mr Burke's pleasantry in the House of Commons on the public embarrassments created by the circumstance "that the king's turnspit was a member of parliament." Now, it must occur to all sensible men, when turning their thoughts to the best mode of reconciling splendour for the king and his court with the least possible burden to the people, that a very great increase of expenditure arises from the old traditional custom of confiding certain offices in the household, which in these days are but little in the public eye, to members of the haute noblesse. A duke, or a marquis, does not, in a histrionic sense, look the part he performs better than thousands of others would do: there is no porcelain class of patricians to match against the common delf ware of the vulgar; and no man carries his rank emblazoned on his person. There is, therefore, no advantage on that consideration for employing him. But, in another view, there is the very greatest disadvantage; for he is a far more costly servant to the state than a person of inferior pretensions. It would be easy to apply a remedy to this. In our peerage, we have few, if any houses, that can be regarded as absolutely decayed; but there are several which are depressed below the level of their order. Now, by introducing a principle of allowing a preference, ceteris paribus, to as many of these families as possible in court appointments, a real national purpose would be served; a resource would be provided to the sinking houses of the aristocracy. Offices of pomp and shew would become ministerial to a point of state prudence; and the pension list would be considerably lightened.

Such is the outline of those reasonable reforms which the nation will look for in this department, now that the public attention has been so powerfully called to it by the conspicuous and ever-memorable triumph which the question raised upon its

* There is too much reason to think that this negligence arises out of that contemptuous indifference to the fine arts which has unaccountably governed the political economy of this country long after it has given way to the general illumination of the nation in the practice of our aristocracy as individuals. From a date even antecedent to the illustrious example on this subject of Charles I., that is, for a clear period of 200 years, it is no more than justice to say, that the British aristocracy has exceeded the whole European nobility in splendour of patronage directed to the arts of painting, music, sculpture, and perhaps architecture. Yet the same persons, in their functions as senators, seem to think it as necessary to shew disregard of the arts, as a judge to show the influence of beauty in a prisoner at his bar. Hence it happens that the question which they ever raise in a case of this nature is about the amount of money to be voted; but with the application of the money, when once voted, they are anxious to disclaim all interference in the most ostentatious manner.

abuses has obtained for the late Opposition. Consideration for this casual and momentary effect has obliged us to enlarge a little more upon the subject, than its separate importance in the scale of our expenditure would have justified. For a great majority of people will suppose that the question upon the Civil List was the cause, and not merely the occasion, of the late event; though, in truth, were it not that the House of Commons had been led by other jealousies into a state of great irritability, that cause, taken singly, would have been found inadequate to so considerable an effect. Combustible materials had been rapidly accumulated, or that spark would have fallen innocuously. Either by acts that could not be forgotten, or menaces that could not be forgiven, it is too evident that the Duke of Wellington's Cabinet had alienated the popular mind, and forfeited the support of all parties whose support was of value.

What acts? what menaces? These are now become questions of mere speculation, as regards the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel; but they are questions of fearful importance for the prospects of this nation under any successors to their power, considering that the circumstances of Europe, and the growing demands of the people, will not allow of their being evaded. The acts of the Wellington Cabinet—that which they have done to alienate this nation, we shall recur to in our closing remarks. At present, let us consider their words, since the opening of this session, as well those which they have put into the mouth of the King, as those which they have added, by way of direct comment from themselves. These are the sole indications of the policy they had meant to pursue as a Cabinet, and (so far as they were distinctly expressed) will continue to be pledges for their conduct as a party. Three great, three overwhelming questions now occupy the national mind, each separately capable of involving our best interests in ruin: they are these—Reform; the insurrectionary spirit of our peasantry, English as well as Irish; and, finally, the condition of the Continent. On each of these, the late Cabinet delivered an opinion; but it was a divided opinion on the first, and a most equivocal one on the two last. We will first speak to the case of the Continent.

Belgium, and the extent of her privilege in framing new modes of government for herself, was the only shape under which the continental question was presented by the King's Speech. Apparently the Duke of Wellington had not contemplated any nearer or greater form of peril. But if that were the worst cloud impending, it has already, in a great measure, passed off. In the London papers of November 18, it is announced, that the Provisional Government at Brussels had accepted the overture of mediation from the five great powers. And the general impression is, (warranted by many scattered declarations published under the sanction of the most severe amongst these powers,) that Belgium will be allowed to adopt any form of government, except one purely republican. So that, in that quarter, the revolutionary frenzy may be supposed to have burnt itself pretty nearly out for the present; though there can be no doubt that stormy dissensions will arise in the Congress, and also between Congress and the Provisional Government. It is equally inevitable, that past experience of impunity will encourage future insurrections against any form of government that shall happen to be established. However, the recent events, the armistice, and the substitution of a diplomatic for an armed interference, has removed the danger which threatened Europe from this quarter to a little further distance. It seems also a plausible construction of the policy pursued in this instance by Austria, and still more by Prussia and Russia, that no war is meditated with France, but that a pacific course has been agreed on for all Europe; for neither Prussia nor Russia, connected as they are by close ties of relationship with the House of Orange, can be imagined to have shewn so little vigour in upholding the interest of that House upon any other consideration than that of a fixed indisposition to provoke hostilities with France. One step against the Belgians, on the part of Prussia or Russia, would have ensured a corresponding step in their behalf, on the part of the French Cabinet; and, if the Cabinet could venture upon hesitating, then a worse result for Europe would happen, of an instant collision between this imbecile Cabinet and the people. Hence it seems but reasonable to allow it, as a just inference from the late conduct of all those powers who are essentially parties to every anti-Gallican confederacy—that no such confederacy is meditated, and that the strongest disposition exists to prevent it. So much we grant. And were it probable that the absolute decision of this great question lay with Russia, Austria, Prussia, and England, we should cheerfully admit that no great danger threatened the harmony of Europe.

But Cabinets are not the officines belli in the new system of things. It is France who will determine this question for the future in the clubs of Paris. It is the people, not the government, of France, who are to be considered henceforwards the arbiter of European destinies. Out of France no resolution, wearing a pacific character, can be final: it is merely provisional until affirmed by the countersign of the French Jacobins, and merely hypothetical so long as it is liable to be negatived by their veto. And not merely the people of France, but through them the people of every other country in Europe, have a controlling interest above the decisions of their governments. No band of insurgents upon a sufficient scale can ever conduct the cause of agitation or rebellion with a continued appeal to French protection and countenance, as in the case of Belgium; but the several cabinets of Europe will be obliged to moderate and subdue the temper of their interference, as they have done with regard to that country, under a prospective regard to some warlike reaction in France. In reality France, Jacobin France, is virtually present and assisting at all Democratic assemblies throughout Europe: a sympathy and powerful understanding passes to and fro between Paris and all the outlying systems of revolution: every hope of the anti-monarchical party in every land in Christendom gravitates to that centre. Discountenance where and whenever to the popular voice is interpreted by a standing rule as an insult to France; and that construction is openly adopted into the cabinet policy of Europe.

This view of things is true for every condition of France under her new system of republicanism a little disguised. The aspects of the Cabinet may fluctuate, but the great foundations of power are immovably fixed upon a basis of democratic forces, which can never shift, except under the remote contingency, less inevitable than in former days, of a military despotism. That power of insolent dictation, which all Europe banded together to chain down into compulsory silence in 1813-14-15, has broke loose again in a far more formidable shape, because no angry collision now exists between the military instincts of the nation and their civic aspirations. Any momentary variations of the French Cabinet, therefore, can indicate no permanent resistance, or possibility of resistance, to the popular will.

Meantime, in what direction are the recent variations of that Cabinet which have just been completed? All tending, in the most headlong manner, to confirm and promote the wildest frenzy of the mob; all in a combination to complete the development of republican agencies, to knit the sinews of immature democracy, and to organize its future expansion. Lafitte, the banker of Napoleon, wields the destinies of France. A person of the same stamp and the same profession presided in the French councils during the first early budding of the revolutionary mania. The banker Neckar was prime minister then, as Lafitte is now: and to Neckar has been imputed much of the mischiefs which followed. The fact is, that bankers in France, and generally on the continent, are the natural enemies of the aristocracy, and have many facilities for making themselves centres to the aspiring factions of great cities. But Neckar, though weak, and a captive to infirm sensibilities, was amiable; and, according to his notions, he was patriotic and well meaning. He had been lifted into power by the voice of the country most powerfully expressed, and in opposition to the views of the court. Naturally, therefore, his first gratitude was directed to his patron—the people; and he held a civic tone in his speeches, his writings, and his measures. But his desire was to be dutiful to his sovereign; and he did not stand upon the support of a narrow party, or of personal intrigues. Lafitte, on the other hand, has made himself obnoxious to suspicions which, at one time, might have brought him to the scaffold, had they been pursued with a vindictive scrutiny: and this augurs ill for the moderation of his government, even if his party principles were not pledges for his determination to open a clear path to the very loudest expression of the very wildest democratic doctrines. It is true that, with us, a political party, after wearing one set of opinions as a sort of feather in their caps, or by way of a popular badge or cognizance, not unfrequently abandon or temper them in practice on coming into power. But this arises because the nominal or traditional distinctions of party have merely served as a centre about which has gathered a large body of personal attachments, and attachments to measures or modes of policy standing in no particular relation to the original principles which divided them from other state parties. Hence the secondary distinctions of a party come gradually to usurp the place of the older and more characteristic. For example, neither Whig nor Tory principles, in their radical distinctions, bore any relation to a war in Spain; and yet, by the course of events, power under certain circumstances in the one party, and opposition in the other, it so happened that Whigs and Tories were more rancorously divided upon that question, and, indeed, generally upon the question of war with Bonaparte, than upon any point of state policy that might bear a much closer relation to the differences in their characteristic creeds. Particular position at the moment, and not original principles, determine the conduct of political parties amongst ourselves when invested with power. But in France, where parties have had no time to cement in this personal sense by long hereditary adhesions of great families (even supposing that the condition of the aristocracy were otherwise favourable to the growth of such attachments), there is no language by which party differences can express themselves, or party fidelity be made conspicuous, but by pressing the distinguishing principles of that party to harsh extremities, and to a continual assertion. The single exception to this rule may be looked for where the peculiar profession of the party lies in the very abjuration of all extremities, and in avowed moderation, as was the case of that party which composed the first Cabinet of Louis Philippe. But the party of Lafitte is clamorous, rash, stormy, and uncompromising; nor could it long acknowledge a member who did not seek a triumphant career for its doctrines. It is remarkable also, that there is a growing disposition to recall to power all the most energetic (in their case, but another name for unprincipled) agents of Napoleon. To say nothing of many others from the military body, Sebastiani—the odious, hired assperser of this country during the peace of Amiens—is placed in a situation of eminent authority; and there is reason to think that he will soon be called to the superintendence of the army and war department, in which capacity he will do his utmost to foster and befriend the martial propensities of the country; and, indeed, his name in any ministry is a kind of pledge that the war spirit is predominant. Men such as Lafitte and Sebastiani are not only dangerous in themselves, but are also standing sureties and sponsors, as it were, to the world, that their system is triumphant and victorious over opposition—the system of anarchy in domestic affairs, and domineering insolence in foreign. For men of that faction do not accept office but in combinations. A divided triumph is none at all for them.

Another member of the present administration, Montalivet, less backed in intrigues, and more open to generous impressions than the rest, is rather more dangerous perhaps by his theories and his eager nationality. To say the truth, in the French Cabinet, there is a provision made, as in an organic body, for every variety of functions that can belong to a system of intense unity. The grave and the gay, the generous and the selfish, all find their appropriate organ in a Cabinet, varying through every mode of temperament and character, but pledged collectively to one system of doctrines. They will fall in powerfully with the predominant infirmities of the people. The approaching trial of Polignac and his brethren, and the preliminary discussion of the House of Peers upon their own competence as a tribunal for such an impeachment, will call out the worst passions of the multitude: the acquittal or execution, final reprieve or respite of the prisoners, will alike terminate in dreadful uproars and bloody excesses.* The appetite for blood once awakened, and a pretext furnished for suspecting the "civism" (to revive that Jacobin word) of eminent citizens, there will be a strong effort made to open anew the shambles of the terrorists. The present ministers are not the men to carry any weight of authority into the scale of moderation and political forbearance. They would find in the bloodthirsty tumults, and in the too evident risk that the nation was again on the brink of disgracing itself by massacres and party sacrifices, a motive for drawing off the national interest in any direction whatever, and thus a kind of virtuous "bounty"—a patriotic "drawback" would arise upon war.

War, therefore, not less by position than by party pledges and principle, the French Cabinet will be driven to seek in no distant period. And it is not all the pacific advances of Russia and Austria, nor even the dishonourable cession of capital rights, nor the unprecedented substitution for the old frank dealing by manifestos of the whispering dalliance by protocol and conference, that will avail to buy off the hostility of democratic France, or to propitiate the revolutionary leviathan. "Leviathan is not so tamed." War is now rapidly striding onward by gigantic steps on the continent; and three or four months probably will dissipate the delusion, that with the temper, the revolutionary ferment, and the vindictive recollections of France, that cup can be put aside.

In the approach to such a crisis, what ought to be the attitude of Cabinets? what has been recently the attitude of our own? First, let us look to the demeanour of foreign states—Austria, for example, and Prussia. Both powers are evidently aware of the great probabilities in favour of war by the active preparations they have been making to face it. Prussia during the last three months has made unexampled exertions for placing her military force of every arm in condition to take the field: and Austria has called out in Hungary alone an extraordinary levy of fifty thousand men. Concurrently with them France has created an immense addition to her military establishments, and has remounted the whole equipage of her army, under as close a system of disguise and dissimulation as is compatible with her open and loquacious press. Meantime, for the present, all these powers have practised the utmost suavity of deportment to each other, and have carried their forbearance (as we have already hinted) to an excess which is very likely to provoke insults from France. Waiving the excess, nobody can question that the principle is good, and the more so as the real approach of war is the nearer. True and solid grounds of alarm justify every honourable precaution in denying to them all fuel of irritation, such as giving even an open and public expression to those apprehensions upon which it may be necessary to act. But in these circumstances, what has been the conduct of our government? They have exactly reversed the old politic maxim, and have behaved suaviter in

* Perhaps the sole gleam of hope for the unhappy prisoners lies in a strong and combined effort of interposition on the part of England. A general appeal to the mercy and generosity of the French people from this country, would be well adapted to the French character and passion for theatrical effects. Unfortunately, there is one powerful objection: to be acceptable, it must be highly complimentary to the Revolution of July. Now that one feature of the address would present a bar to the weightiest class of English signatures. Yet, still the measure is singularly adapted to the good and the bad of the French character, and it is the only scheme which has any hope in it.

re (as to the actual preparations for war) but fortiter in modo (as to the verbal denunciations of the danger). An interference with the affairs of Belgium was proclaimed from the throne. Public opinion was so powerfully expressed against it, and so immediately, that in their later explanations, both the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel have found it convenient to shift their ground. They have attempted to persuade Parliament that nothing more was designed than an amicable interposition. But it is certain that the real intention of government went farther. And the proof lies in these two evidences—first, in the presumption, not to be evaded, that an interference for the purposes avowed could not but commit the parties interfering to a state of war in one alternative of the result; in reality, that decision rested with the Provisional Government at Brussels:—secondly, in the fact, that Sir Robert Peel, when closely pressed, did most unequivocally avow in the House of Commons, that the question of war, in the last resource, would depend upon the circumstances that might arise in the course of the negotiation: his words were, “that a pacific policy would be maintained unless the honour of the country should seem imperatively to require its abandonment.” Such words, from such a mouth, are intelligible to every body. No minister would make that avowal without war in his heart and expectation. And two great comments arise upon it:—First, that the late Cabinet had not the common discretion, which has governed every Cabinet on the continent, of reserving and dissembling their expectations until war should be found inevitable. Had they waited but a fortnight or so, they would have found, in the frank acceptance of the mediating overtures by the Provisional Government of Belgium, one principal presumption of war from that quarter of Europe invalidated: jealous equivocations, or even blank refusals, had been counted upon as a probable expectation, in the case of so mobbish a government, consciously supported by so powerful a neighbour. Secondly, it cannot but strike every person of reflecting and observing habits, that the Duke of Wellington’s Cabinet must have known less, than the least that is consistent with a tolerable success in government, of the public temper in this nation at this time, when they could allow themselves in such careless levity of allusion to a contingency so abominated by men of every party, as that of war and its burdens for us. Here we have one evidence, (and there are many others,) that, in whatever degree recommended by some of their constitutional principles to the conduct of our affairs, yet, on the other hand, mere indiscretions on their own part with regard to some capital interests, and the total ignorance* which they have so repeatedly manifested on the state of public feeling and public opinion, make it almost impossible for many, who even wish them well by comparison with some of their competitors, to grant them a cheerful or cordial support. War contemplated as though it had been a secondary trifle, and (worse than that) war needlessly announced as in the rear, before even their own case of necessity had begun to unfold itself! And this alarm scattered over Europe, with as much disregard to the natural effect, as though no more weight were attached to the words of a government than of a mob orator! And, finally, the burden of a war expenditure seriously entertained as a plausible speculation, at that very crisis when the exhaustion of the country is expressing itself by outrages amongst the very élite of our peasantry, such as we have never witnessed in England before, except once as to the kind, but never as to the degree; and when the strength and fury of the contagion is now diffusing them over the whole south-east quarter of the kingdom! This leads us to another of the three great questions before the public mind—the insurrectionary spirit in our rural population.

* One manifestation of this ignorance, and no slight cause of it, comes before us continually in the avowals both of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, that they keep up no acquaintance with the public journals. In cases where remarkable scenes of distress or outrage, deaths of eminent persons, scandalous promotions, &c. had occupied the columns of every newspaper in London, it has been the ordinary practice of these ministers, when questioned about them in Parliament, to say, that they had never heard of the matter before. Now, in so popular a government as ours, no weight of official business can excuse a minister from the duty of daily watching the course of public events and of public opinion, as recorded in the newspapers.

We shall not go into the subject at length. It is so immeasurably important, that we shall probably consider it in a separate paper on some early occasion; for the spirit of turbulence and outrage rests hitherto not upon political disaffection, (though that will soon co-operate with the other causes,) but upon distress; and that again rests upon causes that are not momentary, but will continue to operate until some act of the legislature restrains the unhappy surplus of Irish population from coming into ruinous competition with the local peasantry at the only season of the year which, but for this competition, would yield high wages to rural industry. For the present, however, we shall notice only those few points of the case which are in any degree connected with the subject of our present review. What strikes us as remarkable in the Duke of Wellington's Cabinet on this occasion is, that within a very few days they have approached the two extremes of timidity and of presumptuous confidence. We do not ourselves blame them in the business of the Lord Mayor's Day. We believe it to be almost certain that riots were meditated, perhaps a massacre. Some mysterious efforts are undeniably at work in London for incendiary purposes: the numerous inflammatory placards, distributed for some time back, have put that beyond a doubt. And the repeated attacks made of late upon the Duke of Wellington by mobs, particularly on the opening of the Session, shew that he was a personal object of the popular hatred. Still, if there had been any extraordinary means of repressing tumults, (and we think there were,) it is matter of regret that the visit was postponed. The postponement has brought much obloquy, and (what is worse) much ridicule upon the government; the people love a bold course; and there were many resources at hand. In particular, the Horse Guards might have been employed under colour of adding splendour to the shew. The Blues acquired the favour of the people some years back, under the same circumstances which made the other regiment of Horse Guards violently unpopular. Their presence would have intercepted mischief, and would not have been resented. Then, as to the apprehended extinction of the lights, it was singular that nobody should have recollected that the general illumination of the houses in the line of procession would have made that a matter next to impossible. The extinction of the coloured lamps, wax-lights, &c. employed in illuminations on the London plan, would only have been possible by obtaining possession of each separate house, after which there would still have remained the torches usually employed in all congregations of carriages by night. However, the postponement may be justified; but certainly, as a measure of caution verging on excess. Now, with such views of the popular spirit as the Wellington Cabinet acknowledged in this case, and considering the sudden and really alarming steps taken for putting the Bank into a state of defence, and the Tower into a state of preparation for supporting a siege of the most desperate character, the parliamentary language of the same cabinet on the Kent disturbances does certainly seem unaccountable. The Duke of Wellington treated the whole affair as of the most trivial importance,* and pronounced the whole kingdom to be in a state of "profound repose." Sir Robert Peel's language was not less surprising. He thought fit to vindicate the peasantry (as did Lord Darnley in the other house) from any participation in the nightly burnings. The Duke of Richmond, by the way, in the Lords, took equal pains to vindicate the farmers from having yielded to intimidation;

* We are glad, however, to find that he was sensible of its true cause, or aggravation however, from the influx of a supernumerary Irish population.

so that apparently nobody is to blame for any part of the disturbances. Now, of Sir Robert we would ask this question—To what purpose are the peasantry acquitted of burning haystacks and cornstacks, and the guilt charged upon strangers with political purposes, when it is notorious, that at all events, the peasantry are the breakers in open daylight of every kind of farming machinery? This kind of outrage, by the way, now extends from the extreme South of England into Buckinghamshire, affecting perhaps one-sixth of the English counties. With regard to the incendiaries, they are still unmasked; but Lord Darnley's defence of the peasantry on the charge of indifference or refusal to assist in working the fire-engines on a particular occasion has been met by the most pointed contradiction from a writer who appeals by name to too many eye-witnesses to permit doubts to remain that the charge is true. To the Duke of Richmond's vindication of the farmers, we could reply by scores of well-attested cases of intimidation. What else indeed than intimidation could have extorted an assent from various clergymen, when summoned by the infatuated peasantry to resign forever large proportions of their tithes? Scenes more childish or disgusting we have seldom heard of.* The truth is, that the labourers seem to be in a demoralized state; and the farmers, by all we can learn, are worse than they. It is remarkable, that at all the public meetings this body of men seemed in the closest sympathy with the labourer, and eager to suggest his landlord and the clergyman as the proper object^s of spoliation. What makes this peculiarly disgusting, is, that the two latter are often the chief subscribers to the relief of the peasantry, and that it is the farmer, on the other hand, who has chiefly impoverished them, by encouraging, for his own exclusive profit, the competition of Irish labour. But whatever may be thought of the several proportions of blame amongst the different ranks of the rural population, the disturbances are seriously alarming, and cannot be treated wisely with the negligence expressed by the Duke of Wellington. Sir Robert Peel has certainly not been negligent; but he has evidently misconceived the case. To treat it merely as a matter of police, as though the sole object were to ascertain the particular author of a particular fire, will answer no sufficient end. The outrages upon property are merely adopted as a language for expressing the discontent and distress. To stifle this expression will do nothing to remedy the evil. And the carelessness, with which the ministers treated that part of the case has left a very unfavourable impression of their wisdom and their regard for the people.

The third great question at this time before the public is that of reform in Parliament. On this, and its great dangers to the constitution, we have already spoken; and there is no occasion that we should say more at present. We notice it now only in connexion with the really puerile conduct of the Duke of Wellington, in wantonly raising up countless enemies by a manifesto of abstract

* Take by way of specimen the following scene of outrageous folly. A score of others might be cited. Now what but intimidation could draw a ready agreement to a proposal so knavish and so frantic?—At Guestling, near Hastings, the paupers gave notice to the heads of the parish, that their company was requested to meet them at ten o'clock in the forenoon of Monday; with this addition, that if they did not come they would be fetched. But few were absent from the meeting, at which about one hundred and twenty labourers were assembled. They informed their late masters, that they did not any longer intend to go on in misery; they had resolved on receiving higher wages. 'What wages did they seek?' The reply was, 2s. 3d. a-day till summer, and then 2s. 6d; we only want to be paid for our labour; and that you may meet this fair demand, you must share the tithes. Mr Parson, (he was there,) we say to you, that as your demand on the parish has been raised to above L.800 a-year for a very little done by you, we demand that you do immediately give up L.500 a-year to our employers.' The parson very readily agreed, and the men gave cheers.—Brighton Guardian.

hostility to reform, without question of the peculiar shape which it may assume. This was wholly needless to his own purpose: all which that required was—that each scheme of reform should be resisted on its own merits—a course which would still have left it open to him to resist all, without seeming, therefore, to have foreclosed his mind to every possible scheme before its tendency and provisions were known. This precipitate and juvenile declaration of unconditional hostility to Reform has armed against him the whole collective wrath of the reformers, without gaining any counterbalancing object. As to the favour of the ultra-tories, (to propitiate whom he is said to have made this declaration,) that was worth gaining. But certainly they would have been satisfied with the hostility, without asking for the public declaration of hostility—which, by making him an object of public indignation, must in that degree have made him less serviceable to their views. For ourselves, we are no enemies to every kind of reform, but to that only in any eminent and uncompromising degree which would go to weaken or abolish the power of the aristocracy in influencing the composition of the House of Commons. That and the Ballot in connexion, we shall not cease to repeat, would revolutionize this country. With the large abiding masses of hereditary property must remain a principal share of political power; or else the possibility of resisting the democracy of the land is gone. Let any change be wrought which shall have the effect of breaking down the power of the landed aristocracy, and every other barrier will soon give way to the impetus of the people, who will then find no real obstacle in their way. The dissociation of the property and the political power of a country, is the true secret of Agrarian revolutions. However, the more imperative the call to resist reform under this democratic shape, the more binding it is upon our consciences and our prudence to avoid any revolting violence, or rash intemperance, which may shock or alienate the half-informed and the irresolute. No statesman, that we have ever heard of, has so committed himself as the Duke of Wellington, and with so little temptation from necessity, or excuse from any previous excitement, raised up, by one single sentence, a standing body of prejudice against himself that will cleave to him through life.

With these memorable indiscretions, and these tortuous supports lent to the worst part of court abuses, under the shelter of the king's name, but for real purposes in which the king's interest is as little as that of the meanest of his subjects, it cannot well surprise us that the Duke of Wellington's government has fallen. A slight blow was sufficient to destroy it. For it was self-destroyed by conscious weakness, before external violence prevailed. And the result of our survey satisfies us that the weakness, rashness, incoherences, and self-contradictions we have noticed in this cabinet, (for in the matter of Reform, let it be remembered that Sir George Murray was in broad contradiction to his principal, and Sir Robert, again, in contradiction to both,) are simply the natural expression of that restlessness and distraction of mind which never fails to follow an eminent sacrifice of conscientious feeling, no matter to what mode of fantastic expediency. The same want of firmness, of moderation, and of good sense, which has been so conspicuously displayed through the early part of November, will continue, we cannot doubt, to haunt the public actions of these men so long as the sense of increasing unpopularity recalls them to the memory and embittered consciousness of their unavailing sacrifice. And hence, in answer to one question which we proposed at the beginning of our review, we may conclude, that the Wellington cabinet can never be much relied upon to support the objects of Tory politics. With the consciousness of high and untarnished character has vanished their strength and firmness, dignity and discretion. We do not wish to use harsh words: but our readers, we are sure, will have anticipated us in saying—that no casual attack in the House of Commons could have shaken them, had they not been already shaken by the general expressions conveyed to them, in a thousand ways, that the confidence of the country was withdrawn—never more to be restored.

The Duke of Wellington is a soldier, and perhaps undervalues the obligations which he violated with something of a military negligence. He is, besides, dogged and haughty; and to find himself unpopular is with him a reason for cleaving to that which has made him so. But Sir Robert Peel is of a more ingenuous nature. His conscience, perhaps, is originally more sensitive; and he has, besides, less power to control its "compunctious visitings" by artifices of pride or defiance. In Manchester—the place of his family influence, in Oxford—the university which it was his pride to represent, he has been memorably insulted. There, where once he was welcomed with festivals, and sat at good men's tables, every eye would be averted if he should venture to appear. In exchange for this heartfelt honour and affection, he has now the cold tribute of sneering praise from the Whigs. And even that tribute is paid reluctantly, on the same principle that the magistrate in public bestows a freezing countenance upon the professional informer whom in private he would not so much as ask to be seated in his presence. Whether we perfectly understand and do justice to the feelings of Sir Robert Peel, we cannot be certain. The mind has many modes of duping itself, and escaping for a time from its own reproaches. But be that as it may, the fall of the apostate Cabinet at a time when no serious opposition had been organized against it, and the tone of gratified justice in the general expressions on witnessing that fall, have forcibly carried home to men's hearts a public moral of ancient standing, but which cannot be too often impressed—that with the integrity of statesmen in a religious country like this, stands or falls their political respectability.

TO A PICTURE OF THE MADONNA.

BY MRS HEMANS.

Ave Maria! May our spirits dare
Look up to thine, and to thy Son's above?

BYRON.

FAIR vision! thou'rt from sunny skies,
Born where the rose hath richest dyes;
To thee a southern heart hath given
That glow of Love, that calm of Heaven,
And round thee cast th' ideal gleam,
The light that is but of a dream.

Far hence, where wandering music fills
The haunted air of Roman hills,
Or where Venetian waves of yore
Heard melodies, they hear no more,
Some proud old minster's gorgeous aisle
Hath known the sweetness of thy smile.

Or haply, from a lone, dim shrine,
'Mid forests of the Apennine,
Whose breezy sounds of cave and dell
Pass like a floating anthem-swell,
Thy soft eyes o'er the pilgrim's way
Shed blessings with their gentle ray.

Or gleaming through a chestnut wood,
Perchance thine island-chapel stood,
Where from the blue Sicilian sea,
The sailor's hymn hath come to thee,
And bless'd thy power to guide, to save,
Madonna! watcher of the wave!

Oh! might a voice, a whisper low,
Forth from those lips of beauty flow!
Couldst thou but speak of all the tears,
The conflicts, and the pangs of years,
Which, at thy secret shrine reveal'd,
Have gush'd from human hearts unseal'd!

Surely to thee hath woman come,
As a tired wanderer back to home!
Unveiling many a timid guest,
And treasured sorrow of her breast,
A buried love—a wasting care—
Oh! did those griefs win peace from prayer?

And did the poet's fervid soul
To thee lay bare its inmost scroll?
Those thoughts, which pour'd their quenchless fire
And passion o'er th' Italian lyre,
Did they to still submission die,
Beneath thy calm, religious eye?

And hath the crested helmet bow'd
Before thee, 'midst the incense-cloud?
Hath the crown'd leader's bosom lone,
To thee its haughty griefs made known?
Did thy glance break their frozen sleep,
And win the unconquer'd one to weep?

Hush'd is the anthem—closed the vow—
The votive garland wither'd now;

Yet holy still to me thou art,
 Thou that hast soothed so many a heart!
 And still must blessed influence flow
 From the meek glory of thy brow.

Still speak to suffering woman's love,
 Of rest for gentle hearts above;
 Of Hope, that hath its treasure there,
 Of Home, that knows no changeful air!
 Bright form, lit up with thoughts divine,
 Ave! such power be ever thine!

THE PALMER.

The faded palm-branch in his hand
 Shew'd pilgrim from the Holy Land.

SCOTT.

ART thou come from the far-off land at last?
 Thou that hast wander'd long!
 Thou art come to a home whence the smile hath pass'd,
 With the merry voice of song.
 For the sunny glance and the bounding heart,
 Thou wilt seek—but all are gone;
 They are parted ev'n as waters part,
 To meet in the deep alone!
 And thou—from thy lip is fled the glow,
 From thine eye the light of morn;
 And the shades of thought o'erhang thy brow,
 And thy cheek with life is worn.
 Say what hast thou brought from the distant shore,
 For thy wasted youth to pay?
 Hast thou treasure to bring thee joys once more?
 Hast thou vassals to smooth thy way?
 "I have brought but the palm-branch in my hand,
 Yet I call not my bright youth lost!
 I have won but high thought in the Holy Land,
 Yet I count not too dear the cost!
 "I look on the leaves of the deathless tree,—
 These records of my track;
 And better than youth in its flush of glee,
 Are the memories they give me back!
 "They speak of toil, and of high emprise,
 As in words of solemn cheer,
 They speak of lonely victories
 O'er Pain, and Doubt, and Fear.
 "They speak of scenes, which have now become Bright pictures in my breast;
 Where my spirit finds a glorious home,
 And the love of my heart can rest.
 "The colours pass not from these away,
 Like tints of shower or sun;
 Oh! beyond all treasures that know decay,
 Is the wealth my soul hath won!
 "A rich light thence o'er my life's decline,
 An inborn light is cast;
 For the sake of the Palm from the Holy Shrine,
 I bewail not my bright days past!"

LETTER ON THE POLITICAL CHANGES.

DEAR NORTH,

AS soon as it was seen that the Duke of Wellington proposed to work his way through the present session with the same mindless men who were his colleagues in the last, no rational man doubted that his ministry must be overthrown. It was despised for mental incapacity; no enemy could fear it, and no friend could feel proud in fighting under its banners. If the Duke of Wellington did not see this, he must be a man with political perception so dull, as to be unfit to be a minister. If he did see it, but had such confidence in his own powers, that he chose rather to have ignorant commonplace assistants, that would obey his bidding without question, than persons of a different stamp, who would take the liberty of acting upon their own judgment, then was his love of personal command too great to make it expedient or even safe for the country, that he should continue minister. Finally, if, seeing and duly estimating the mental mediocrity, or less than mediocrity, of his colleagues, he had not the courage to get rid of them, or the skill to search out and associate with himself abler men, then was he too weak for a political leader, and it was better he should give place to some one of stronger mind, and one more capable of availing himself of whatever mental efficiency the country possessed. In any point of view, the Duke of Wellington (for I shall not take the trouble of discussing such negative quantities as the merits of the rest of the Ministers) was in that condition that it became desirable to have his place filled by another, who would select more capable men to co-operate with him in carrying on the government of the country. It is a very singular fact, and might afford room for curious enquiry to those who speculate in the strange incongruities of human character, that there was less of greatness in the government of the late Premier, than of any minister of modern times, not even excepting the ridiculous government of Lord Goderich.

The mere manner of the Duke's government was not, indeed, of that small gossipy description, which made Cabinet discussions become, within a quarter of an hour, the news of the streets; but the business of government, though secret, was full of pettiness. It was notorious, that women had a good deal to do with it, and those whose habits unfitted them for domestic virtues, were not thought unworthy to guide the distribution of political patronage. Places were continually given away on grounds of mere personal favour, without reference to fitness or propriety. The inferior officers of the Treasury were unusually busy and important personages, and were continually urged to effect that which, with a different kind of government, would have required no such agency or urging. Every thing that became difficult to oppose was conceded; and it seemed as if the Duke considered his duty to be, to keep his little Cabinet army from defeat, by retreating whenever the enemy appeared in force against him.

Through the Session of 1828, the Duke's illustrious name—his inextinguishable fame as the conqueror of Napoleon—his reputation as a foreign negotiator—his influence with the Aristocracy—and the opinion formed of his Parliamentary skill in the defeat of Mr Canning's Corn bill, carried him on with triumphant success, which was not a little increased by the peremptory dismissal of the Liberals towards the close of the Session—a set of quacks, of whom the country was sick, and, doubtless, will soon be sick again.

With the beginning of the Session of 1829 came the Catholic Relief bill, that tremendous blow to the unity of party action in England: this great question carried, every thing else followed in its wake—the current was irresistible—political men were scattered and astounded—the Whigs were loud in their praise of the Duke—and the old Tories, except those of the Press, departed in disgust from the political arena, or remained nursing their hate in sullen silence.

With 1830 came a state of affairs which scarcely admits of description—the House of Commons felt itself too contemptible to do any business, and no business was done, except the repeal of the Beer-tax—the death of the sovereign took place, and a new Parliament was elected.

Whatever may be thought of the moral littleness of the intellectual cleverness of the present day, it cannot be denied that there is a generality of thought and mental exercise of every kind, that heretofore was not, and that in no period was a Ministry, without any mental attainments whatever, more likely to be despised by the people at large. Accordingly, wherever politics were discussed—and, at the time of a general election in England, what place is there so dull, or so insignificant, as not to be in some measure occupied by such discussion?—the ministers were treated with a curious universality of scorn, and, as was remarked by Mr Brougham in Yorkshire, no candidate was rash enough to try to recommend himself to electors by stating his respect for, or adherence to, the Ministry. But far above all in power and extensiveness of influence was the Press. Review, Magazine, Pamphlet, Newspaper—all joined in one storm of contempt; and only one pamphlet of the least pretension, ventured to uphold the Ministerial cause. Even this pamphlet was dull whenever the Ministry was introduced. The master hand who spiced it for the public, knew it was in the power of wit to make Mr Brougham ridiculous, but not in the power of reasoning to make the Ministry respectable. The consequence of all this seems to have been a determination on the part of the Ministry to assume a bolder tone, and to obtain, by dint of assurance, the influence which ability would command. Here it is that the Premier was to blame. The commencement of a new reign and of a new parliament—the result of the elections—the extraordinary events upon the continent, and their effects upon the public mind at home—all these things must have suggested to any man of the least practical foresight or political caution, that parliamentary discussion would necessarily assume a high degree of interest and importance,—that the ablest men in Parliament would task themselves to the uttermost at such a time—and that it was of the most obvious necessity to have persons of some intellectual pretension on the Treasury bench to speak the sentiments of government. But nothing of the kind was attempted; and the men who had been hooted with scorn from every place which it was of the least importance to represent,—who had been railed on, pitied, laughed at, and covered with every species of contempt, merely because of their weakness and incapacity for great affairs—at such a time as this, every one of these men was again brought forward to support the government, and to defend a state paper, put into the mouth of the King, which, as respected foreign affairs, was alarming, and, as respected domestic affairs, was by no means satisfactory to the popular party either within or without the House. This was downright folly of the Prime Minister. It was positively ridiculous in the very last degree to meet such a Parliament as had been elected, and in such times as these, with no one to say a word for the Ministry that would be listened to with patience but Sir Robert Peel. One more there was, no doubt, on the Treasury bench, though not of the Cabinet, who could have spoken if he would, and have grappled with even the best of the Opposition; but Mr Croker has hitherto refrained from seeking the troublesome distinction of an habitual debater.

The King's speech, I have said, was unpalatable. The speech of the Duke of Wellington, and his incautious and unnecessary declaration respecting reform, which reached the public ear almost along with the speech, was much worse. In these days very few men will venture to coincide with the Duke in his opposition to every thing in the nature of Parliamentary reform. Almost every one, with God knows how little sense or perception of probable consequences, has his own pet project of sage reform, and this sweeping declaration of the Duke was, except to a few Noble Lords and their connexions, a matter of general offence. This added much to the unpopularity of the Premier; but the affair of the abandonment of the King's visit to the city, made even the Duke of Wellington appear ridiculous and absurd, and either in the act itself, or in the manner of managing its announcement to the public, there was something so unfortunate, so absurdly exaggerated beyond the occasion, or at least beyond the occasion shewn in Parliament, that the public lost all patience. The people of London believed, and no doubt the belief spread fast enough to the provinces, that some fearful and very important conspiracy had certainly been discovered—that the Guildhall, or at the least some part of the way to it, had been undermined and charged with gunpowder, for the purpose of blowing up the King and all his Court, and the Court of Aldermen into the bargain. The more serious and incredulous were satisfied that a scheme of revolution had been discovered, and that the postponement of the King's visit was a matter of absolute and awful necessity. When therefore it was found that the postponement had no such serious grounds, that there was in fact no ground for it at all, or none supported by any competent authority—that the decision of Ministers upon a matter which gave such extreme alarm, and caused such very serious consequences in the public funds, was made without any sufficient reason—that the whole affair was matter to be laughed at, and actually was laughed at in the House of Commons, and the Ministry called insane for yielding to such idle fears—when all this was found out, it was also found, that the Ministry could be held in still greater contempt than they had been before.

“ And in that lowest deep, a lower still”

was discovered by the public. It would be idle to deny that there was occasion to dread some riotous disturbance in the streets of the metropolis on the night of the royal visit if it had taken place; and it may be argued with perfect truth, that no amusement to be derived by the staring crowd, from a pompous show of this sort, was to be put in the scale as an equivalent to the remotest probability of public riot and of the loss of lives; but granting these facts,—and the statements of Ministers themselves went no further,—could any thing be more absurdly injudicious than their manner of dealing with them; or did they not see that there were consequences connected with a pageant, in itself of no manner of importance, which rendered their hurried, incautious method of procedure matter of serious blame, as well as of certain ridicule?

While the full tide of unpopularity and contempt was running breast-high against the Ministry, they ventured to bring forward their Civil List arrangements. This subject, at any time of great and weighty importance, was rendered still more so, as it was to be the test of the voluntary pledge for economy, put forth by the Ministry in the King's Speech. It came before the House under most unhappy auspices for the Ministry. In the first place, there was a point connected with it which had the appearance of a public trick—the language of the King's Speech having been so framed as to give the public the idea that all the King's personal revenues, including of course the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall, were to be given up to the public. Those who knew any thing about those offices, did not of course participate in the impression which the words of the Speech were calculated to give to the uninitiated; but even Mr Brougham affects to have been one of the deceived, and he is not a man to affect a misunderstanding, except where there is something very capable of being misunderstood. I am sure that Ministers did not mean so shallow and shortlived an artifice to obtain popularity, as that of persuading the public they were about to give up that, which a few days would shew they were determined to retain; yet such is the language of the speech, that you can only exonerate ministers from the intention of deceiving, by admitting that they had most clumsily and obscurely expressed themselves. In the next place, the Civil List arrangements were introduced to the House in a speech so totally devoid of any one point of merit—so dull, stale, flat, and unprofitable, as to transcend in feebleness any thing which even the immense powers of mediocrity, known to be possessed by the speaker, could have given reason to expect. Along with all this feebleness, there was an apparent obstinacy, almost doggedness, of resolution, to take his own way with the Civil List, in spite of the wish generally expressed through the House, for a more particular and select examination; and the Opposition, taking advantage of the state of feeling in the House, moved the amendment which overthrew the Wellington Cabinet. The result, however, of the division of the 15th of November, was, to both parties, a very great surprise; certainly the Government did not expect it, whatever fears they might have had for the next evening, for which the Reform Question was fixed; and that the Opposition did not expect it, is evident from this, that Mr Brougham, seeing how very strong they mustered in the lobby, and not weary of the glory of heading a huge minority, made a speech to those around him, requesting them to wait, and divide on another amendment which would be proposed, if that on which they were then in division should not be carried. Had there been any sanguine hope of success, it would not have needed any lobby speech to induce the Opposition to remain and cry out victory.

Sir Robert Peel, who can say as much about nothing sometimes as any other man, had nothing to say, when put to the question, after the division by the member for Westminster, whose Parliamentary courage is frequently a little exuberant, at a certain hour after dinner—he prudently resolved not to be taken by surprise when he could avoid it, but before noon the next day the resignation of Ministers was in the hands of the King. Thus fell the Wellington Administration; and thus ought to fall “a Tory administration acting upon Whig principles;” which disgraceful description of it was uttered in Parliament by the mover of the address at the commencement of the last session, and was not contradicted by any member of the Government. I contend, that the defeat of the Duke’s Ministry is no defeat of Tory principles. It was not worthy of the name of a Tory Ministry; and if, on political grounds, I have more satisfaction than regret, in the change which has taken place, it is, because I hope that the Tory party, though, for the present, out of power, will once more have fair play—that no official necessities will drown or dilute their energy—and that the political battle will once more be fairly fought on the floors of the Houses of Parliament. But who are to be the combatants upon this field? This we must wait for a little time to develop; but they exceedingly deceive themselves, who, judging from the want of ability conspicuous in the greater number of the Members of the Wellington Cabinet, suppose that there are no materials for an effective Tory Opposition. Men whose energies have slumbered will now rouse themselves up; and though no factious opposition will be attempted for the sake of place, yet who can hope that, with Brougham for a Lord Chancellor, Lord Grey, Premier, Lord Melbourne at the Home Department, Lord Palmerston at the Foreign, and Lord Althorp Chancellor of the Exchequer, with all the rest either of the Whig party or “Liberals,” there will not be enough, and too much occasion, for the most strenuous efforts of the Tory party, to preserve the best institutions of the country from invasion, if not destruction? I write before these appointments are officially announced; but there seems to be no doubt that they will be announced; and I confess, that I cannot see how any Tory can look without dread and deep dissatisfaction at the prospect which they hold out of the management of the country’s affairs. According to the list which I have seen, there is but one exception to the Whig and “Liberal” character of the Ministry, and that is to be found in the appointment of the Duke of Richmond. His frank and manly bearing, the goodness of his heart, and the honesty of his principles, make me heartily wish him a more comfortable position, than that of standing alone with such a Ministry as he is stated to have joined. Does he deem it possible that, with honour to himself, and advantage to the country, he can join with Lord Holland, in deliberations upon political measures? I suspect his tenure of office, with such colleagues, will be but brief—he has not had much experience as a politician, and has yet to learn the annoyances attendant upon some political associations. With respect to the new Ministry, or rather with respect to those who, it is said, will form the new Ministry, it is not to be denied, that they are for the most part men of superior mental cleverness to those who have gone out; but, while it is quite true that men of small or feeble understanding can carry on no government respectably, it is also true, that ability is not enough, without right principles, to ensure its direction to a valuable end. That Mr Brougham is a man of transcendent ability, who can doubt? but it seems something monstrous and incredible, that such a man—the chosen of the Dissenters—the fierce promoter of discontent—the impetuous opponent of every thing established, except it be the written theory of the constitution—that he should be Lord Chancellor! That he should hold an office which is all but ecclesiastical in its character, from its intimate connexion with the affairs of the Church, and its judicial power to decide matters of conscience, for which the law has made no express provision. One can hardly believe it possible, that without, at least, some interval of judicial calm, in a less important office, he would be appointed to such duties; but if it be so, let the friends of the constitution be on their guard, for there is no safety in such a man. Possibly, he who has thus arrived at the climax of his most ambitious dreams, and who must necessarily give up the task of reforming the lower House of Parliament, may now think of a reform of himself. Undoubtedly, if he is to hold the office of Lord Chancellor, he could not effect a reform of more immediate importance to the country.

Granting the cleverness, (and that word is lofty enough to express the merit of any of the men named for the new Ministry, except the Premier and the Lord Chancellor,) granting the cleverness of the men who are said to have accepted office, they seem to have been strangely assorted, as to places, and I doubt whether they can fill them with any degree of respectable efficiency. Lord Lansdowne may preside over the Council with due dignity, and Lord Durham keep the Privy Seal safe enough, if he can but keep himself quiet; and poor Lord Frederick has, perhaps, head enough for the Colonies, but what shall be said of the Treasury bench in the House of Commons, or who is to face Sir Robert Peel, and Sir George Murray, and Mr Croker, suppose they become active in opposition? Lord Palmerston and Mr C. Grant can, either of them, make an exceedingly good speech, with a week's preparation, but that would be rather long, sometimes, to wait for a minister's reply. Lord Althorp, they say, will be Chancellor of the Exchequer, and leader of the House of Commons! If I do not exceedingly mistake, Goulburn would be an excellent match for him. His lordship has, to be sure, advantages of birth and fortune, and weight in the country, to ensure him that respect which his talents, never would; but all these, though they give force to an oppositionist, are not of very material use to an official servant. Lord Althorp would be a most valuable person as the chairman at a Quarter's Sessions, or to take the lead in an Assembly of Turnpike Trustees; but if he have really accepted the office assigned to him, I marvel at his rashness. Sir James Graham, they tell us, is to sit in the Cabinet as Lord of the Admiralty. A fine personage truly to put at the head of our naval concerns! What a strange association of the elegant Sir James, with the rude Jack tars of England! He will be of assistance as a talker in the House of Commons; but if he attempts Admiralty affairs, he may find a troublesome adversary. I consign him to the care of Mr Croker, but, being of a compassionate nature, I beg leave to recommend him to mercy.

But it is, perhaps, as yet too early to speculate upon the holders of particular offices; the general character, however, of the future ministry, cannot be doubted; it will be one that will present to the Tories what the lawyers would call a prima facie case for opposition, and, as I trust, there is no chance of a conversion of the former absurdity, which would give us a Whig ministry acting upon Tory principles, I think we may at least calculate upon more intelligibility of principle, and more manly discussion, than for some years we have been accustomed to. There will, I trust, be no longer an opportunity for men of mingled timidity and dishonesty to go on in a peddling pitiful way, with no fixed principle but their own personal advantage. They must dare to act with plainness and boldness, or sink to their fitting station of profitless contempt.

I remain, yours always,
